LUCY I could murder that impudent happy strumpet. I gave him his life, and that creature enjoys the sweets of it. Ungrateful Macheath!

AIR 42. South Sea ballad

*My love is all madness and folly,
Alone I lie,
Toss, tumble, and cry,
What a happy creature is Polly!
Was e'er such a wretch as I!
With rage I redden like scarlet,
That my dear inconstant varlet,
Stark blind to my charms,
Is lost in the arms
Of that jilt, that inveigling harlot!
Stark blind to my charms,
Is lost in the arms*

*Of that jilt, that inveigling harlot!
This, this my resentment alarms.*

LOCKIT    And so, after all this mischief, I must stay here to be entertained with your caterwauling, Mistress Puss! Out of my sight, wanton strumpet! You shall fast and mortify yourself into reason, with now and then a little handsome discipline to bring you to your senses. Go.

SCENE 2

LOCKIT

Peachum then intends to outwit me in this affair; but I'll be even with him. The dog is leaky<sup>2</sup> in his liquor, so I'll ply him that way, get the secret from him, and turn this affair to my own advantage. Lions, wolves, and vultures don't live together in herds, droves, or flocks. Of all animals of prey, man is the only sociable one. Every one of us preys upon his neighbor, and yet we herd together. Peachum is my companion, my friend. According to the custom of the world, indeed, he may quote thousands of precedents for cheating me. And shall not I make use of the privilege of friendship to make him a return?

AIR 43.    Packington's pound

*Thus gamesters united in friendship are found,
Though they know that their industry all is a cheat;
They flock to their prey at the dice-box's sound,
And join to promote one another's deceit.
But if by mishap
They fail of a chap,<sup>3</sup>
To keep in their hands, they each other entrap.
Like pikes, lank with hunger, who miss of their ends,
They bite their companions, and prey on their friends.*

Now, Peachum, you and I, like honest tradesmen, are to have a fair trial which of us two can overreach the other. Lucy! [Enter LUCY.] Are there any of Peachum's people now in the house?

LUCY    Filch, sir, is drinking a quartern<sup>4</sup> of strong waters in the next room with Black Moll.

LOCKIT    Bid him come to me.

LOCKIT, FILCH

LOCKIT    Why, boy, thou lookest as if thou wert half starved, like a shotten herring.<sup>5</sup>

FILCH    One had need have the constitution of a horse to go through the business. Since the favorite child-getter<sup>6</sup> was disabled by a mishap, I have picked up a little money by helping the ladies to a pregnancy against their being called down to sentence. But if a man cannot get an honest livelihood any easier way, I am sure 'tis what I can't undertake for another Session.

LOCKIT    Truly, if that great man should tip off,<sup>7</sup> 'twould be an irreparable loss. The vigor and prowess of a knight-errant never saved half the ladies in distress that he hath done. But, boy, can'st thou tell me where thy master is to be found?

FILCH    At his lock, sir, at the Crooked Billet.

LOCKIT    Very well. I have nothing more with you. [Exit FILCH.] I'll go to him there, for I have many important affairs to settle with him; and in the way of those transactions, I'll artfully get into his secret. So that Macheath shall not remain a day longer out of my clutches.

SCENE 4 A gaming-house

MACHEATH in a fine tarnished coat, BEN BUDGE, MATT OF THE MINT.

MACHEATH I am sorry, gentlemen, the road was so barren of money. When my friends are in difficulties, I am always glad that my fortune can be serviceable to them. [Gives them money.] You see, gentlemen, I am not a mere court friend, who professes everything and will do nothing.

AIR 44. Lillibullero

*The modes of the court so common are grown,
That a true friend can hardly be met;
Friendship for interest is but a loan,
Which they let out for what they can get.
'Tis true, you find
Some friends so kind,
Who will give you good counsel themselves to defend.
In sorrowful ditty,
They promise, they pity,
But shift you for money, from friend to friend.*

But we, gentlemen, have still honor enough to break through the corruptions of the world. And while I can serve you, you may command me.

BEN It grieves my heart that so generous a man should be involved in such difficulties, as oblige him to live with such ill company, and herd with gamesters.

MATT See the partiality of mankind! One man may steal a horse, better than another look over a hedge.<sup>8</sup> Of all mechanics,<sup>9</sup> of all servile handicraftsmen, a gamester is the vilest. But yet, as many of the quality are of the profession, he is admitted amongst the politest company. I wonder we are not more respected.

MACHEATH There will be deep play tonight at Marybone, and consequently money may be picked up upon the road. Meet me there, and I'll give you the hint who is worth setting.<sup>1</sup>

MATT The fellow with a brown coat with a narrow gold binding, I am told, is never without money.

MACHEATH What do you mean, Matt? Sure you will not think of meddling with him! He's a good honest kind of a fellow, and one of us.

BEN To be sure, sir, we will put ourselves under your direction.

MACHEATH Have an eye upon the moneylenders. A rouleau,<sup>2</sup> or two, would prove a pretty sort of an expedition. I hate extortion.

MATT Those rouleaus are very pretty things. I hate your bank bills; there is such a hazard in putting them off.<sup>3</sup>

MACHEATH There is a certain man of distinction, who in his time hath nicked me out of a great deal of the ready.<sup>4</sup> He is in my cash,<sup>5</sup> Ben. I'll point him out to you this evening, and you shall draw upon him for the debt. The company are met; I hear the dicebox in the other room. So, gentlemen, your servant. You'll meet me at Marybone.

SCENE 5 Peachum's Lock

A table with wine, brandy, pipes, and tobacco.

PEACHUM, LOCKIT

LOCKIT The Coronation account,<sup>6</sup> brother Peachum, is of so intricate a nature, that I believe it will never be settled.

PEACHUM It consists indeed of a great variety of articles. It was worth to our people, in fees of different kinds, above ten installments.<sup>7</sup> This is part of the account, brother, that lies open before us.

LOCKIT A lady's tail<sup>8</sup>—of rich brocade—that, I see, is disposed of.

PEACHUM To Mrs. Diana Trapes, the tallywoman, and she will make a good hand on't in shoes and slippers, to trick out young ladies, upon their going into keeping.<sup>9</sup>

LOCKIT But I don't see any article of the jewels.

PEACHUM Those are so well known, that they must be sent abroad. You'll find them entered under the article of exportation. As for the snuffboxes, watches, swords, etc., I thought it best to enter them under their several heads.

LOCKIT Seven and twenty women's pockets<sup>1</sup> complete, with the several things therein contained; all sealed, numbered, and entered.

PEACHUM But, brother, it is impossible for us now to enter upon this affair. We should have the whole day before us. Besides, the account of the last half year's plate<sup>2</sup> is in a book by itself, which lies at the other office.

LOCKIT Bring us then more liquor. Today shall be for pleasure, tomorrow for business. Ah brother, those daughters of ours are two slippery hussies. Keep a watchful eye upon Polly, and Macheath in a day or two shall be our own again.

AIR 45. Down in the North Country

*What gudgeons<sup>3</sup> are we men!
Every woman's easy prey.
Though we have felt the hook, again*

We bite and they betray.

*The bird that hath been trapped,
When he hears his calling mate,
To her he flies, again he's clapped
Within the wiry grate.*

PEACHUM But what signifies catching the bird, if your daughter Lucy will set open the door of the cage?

LOCKIT If men were answerable for the follies and frailties of their wives and daughters, no friends could keep a good correspondence together for two days. This is unkind of you, brother; for among good friends, what they say or do goes for nothing.

[Enter a SERVANT.]

SERVANT Sir, here's Mrs. Diana Trapes wants to speak with you.

PEACHUM Shall we admit her, brother Lockit?

LOCKIT By all means. She's a good customer, and a fine-spoken woman. And a woman who drinks and talks so freely, will enliven the conversation.

PEACHUM Desire her to walk in.

[Exit SERVANT.]

SCENE 6

PEACHUM, LOCKIT, MRS. TRAPES

PEACHUM Dear Mrs. Dye, your servant. One may know by your kiss that your gin is excellent.

MRS. TRAPES I was always very curious<sup>4</sup> in my liquors.

LOCKIT There is no perfumed breath like it. I have been long acquainted with the flavor of those lips, han't I, Mrs. Dye?

MRS. TRAPES Fill it up. I take as large draughts of liquor, as I did of love. I hate a flincher in either.

AIR 46. A shepherd kept sheep

In the days of my youth I could bill like a dove, fa, la, la, etc.

Like a sparrow at all times was ready for love, fa, la, la, etc.

The life of all mortals in kissing should pass, Lip to lip while we're young—then the lip to the glass, fa, etc.

But now, Mr. Peachum, to our business. If you have blacks of any kind, brought in of late, mantoos<sup>5</sup>—velvet scarfs, petticoats—let it be what it will, I am your chap. For all my ladies are very fond of mourning.

PEACHUM Why, look ye, Mrs. Dye, you deal so hard with us that we can afford to give the gentlemen who venture their lives for the goods little or nothing.

MRS. TRAPES The hard times oblige me to go very near<sup>6</sup> in my dealing. To be sure, of late years I have been a great sufferer by the Parliament—three thousand pounds would hardly make me amends. The Act for destroying the Mint<sup>7</sup> was a severe cut upon our business. 'Till then, if a customer stepped out of the way, we knew where to have her. No doubt you know Mrs. Coaxer. There's a wench now (till today) with a good suit of clothes of mine upon her back, and I could never set eyes upon her for three months together. Since the Act too against imprisonment for small sums,<sup>8</sup> my loss there too hath been very considerable, and it must be so, when a lady can borrow a handsome petticoat or a clean gown, and I not have the least hank<sup>9</sup> upon her! And o' my conscience, nowadays most ladies take a delight in cheating, when they can do it with safety.

PEACHUM     Madam, you had a handsome gold watch of us t'other day for seven guineas. Considering we must have our profit, to a gentleman upon the road, a gold watch will be scarce worth the taking.

MRS. TRAPES     Consider, Mr. Peachum, that watch was remarkable, and not of very safe sale. If you have any black velvet scarfs, they are a handsome winter wear, and take with most gentlemen who deal with my customers. 'Tis I that put the ladies upon a good foot. 'Tis not youth or beauty that fixes their price. The gentlemen always pay according to their dress, from half a crown to two guineas; and yet those hussies make nothing of bilking of me. Then too, allowing for accidents—I have eleven fine customers now down under the surgeon's hands. What with fees and other expenses, there are great goings-out, and no comings-in, and not a farthing to pay for at least a month's clothing. We run great risks, great risks indeed.

PEACHUM     As I remember, you said something just now of Mrs. Coaxer.

MRS. TRAPES     Yes, sir. To be sure I stripped her of a suit of my own clothes about two hours ago; and have left her as she should be, in her shift, with a lover of hers at my house. She called him upstairs, as he was going to Marybone in a hackney coach. And I hope, for her own sake and mine, she will persuade the Captain to redeem her, for the Captain is very generous to the ladies.

LOCKIT     What Captain?

MRS. TRAPES     He thought I did not know him. An intimate acquaintance of yours, Mr. Peachum. Only Captain Macheath—as fine as a lord.

PEACHUM     Tomorrow, dear Mrs. Dye, you shall set your own price upon any of the goods you like. We have at least half a dozen velvet scarfs, and all at your service. Will you give me leave to make you a present of this suit of night-clothes for your own wearing? But are you sure it is Captain Macheath?

MRS. TRAPES     Though he thinks I have forgot him, nobody knows him better. I have taken a great deal of the Captain's money in my time at second hand, for he always loved to have his ladies well dressed.

PEACHUM     Mr. Lockit and I have a little business with the Captain—you understand me—and we will satisfy you for Mrs. Coaxer's debt.

LOCKIT     Depend upon it. We will deal like men of honor.

MRS. TRAPES     I don't inquire after your affairs, so whatever happens, I wash my hands on't. It hath always been my maxim, that one friend should assist another. But if you please, I'll take one of the scarfs home with me. 'Tis always good to have something in hand.

SCENE 7 Newgate

LUCY

Jealousy, rage, love, and fear are at once tearing me to pieces.
How I am weather-beaten and shattered with distresses!

AIR 47. One evening, having lost my way

*I'm like a skiff on the ocean tossed,
Now high, now low, with each billow born,
With her rudder broke, and her anchor lost,
Deserted and all forlorn.
While thus I lie rolling and tossing all night,
That Polly lies sporting on seas of delight!
Revenge, revenge, revenge,
Shall appease my restless sprite.*

I have the ratsbane<sup>1</sup> ready. I run no risk, for I can lay her death upon the gin, and so many die of that naturally that I shall never be called in question. But say I were to be hanged—I never could be hanged for anything that would give me greater comfort than the poisoning that slut.

[Enter FILCH.]

FILCH Madam, here's our Miss Polly come to wait upon you.

LUCY Show her in.

SCENE 8

LUCY, POLLY

LUCY Dear madam, your servant. I hope you will pardon my passion when I was so happy to see you last. I was so overrun with the spleen<sup>2</sup> that I was perfectly out of myself. And really when one hath the spleen, everything is to be excused by a friend.

AIR 48. Now Roger, I'll tell thee, because thou'rt my son

*When a wife's in her pout,
(As she's sometimes, no doubt!)
The good husband as meek as a lamb,
Her vapors<sup>3</sup> to still,
First grants her her will,
And the quieting draught is a dram.
Poor man! And the quieting draught is a dram.*

I wish all our quarrels might have so comfortable a reconciliation.

POLLY I have no excuse for my own behavior, madam, but my misfortunes. And really, madam, I suffer too upon your account.

LUCY But, Miss Polly, in the way of friendship, will you give me leave to propose a glass of cordial to you?

POLLY Strong waters are apt to give me the headache. I hope, madam, you will excuse me.

LUCY Not the greatest lady in the land could have better in her closet,<sup>4</sup> for her own private drinking. You seem mighty low in spirits, my dear.

POLLY I am sorry, madam, my health will not allow me to accept of your offer. I should not have left you in the rude manner I did when we met last, madam, had not my papa hauled me away so unexpectedly. I was indeed somewhat provoked, and perhaps might use some expressions that were disrespectful. But really, madam, the Captain treated me with so much contempt and cruelty that I deserved your pity rather than your resentment.

LUCY But since his escape, no doubt all matters are made up again. Ah Polly, Polly! 'Tis I am the unhappy wife, and he loves you as if you were only his mistress.

POLLY Sure, madam, you cannot think me so happy as to be the object of your jealousy. A man is always afraid of a woman who loves him too well, so that I must expect to be neglected and avoided.

LUCY Then our cases, my dear Polly, are exactly alike. Both of us indeed have been too fond.

AIR 49. O Bessy Bell

POLLY *A curse attends that woman's love,
Who always would be pleasing.*

LUCY *The pertness of the billing dove,
Like tickling, is but teasing.*

POLLY What then in love can woman do?

LUCY If we grow fond they shun us.

POLLY And when we fly them, they pursue.

LUCY But leave us when they've won us.

Love is so very whimsical in both sexes, that it is impossible to be lasting. But my heart is particular, and contradicts my own observation.

POLLY But really, Mistress Lucy, by his last behavior I think I ought to envy you. When I was forced from him, he did not show the least tenderness. But perhaps he hath a heart not capable of it.

AIR 50. Would Fate to me Belinda give

Among the men, coquettes we find,

*Who court by turns all womankind;
And we grant all their hearts desired,
When they are flattered, and admired.*

The coquettes of both sexes are self-lovers, and that is a love no other whatever can dispossess. I fear, my dear Lucy, our husband is one of those.

LUCY    Away with these melancholy reflections. Indeed, my dear Polly, we are both of us a cup too low. Let me prevail upon you, to accept of my offer.

AIR 51.    Come, sweet lass

*Come sweet lass,
Let's banish sorrow
'Till tomorrow;
Come, sweet lass,
Let's take a chirping<sup>5</sup> glass.
Wine can clear
The vapors of despair,
And make us light as air;
Then drink, and banish care.*

I can't bear, child, to see you in such low spirits. And I must persuade you to what I know will do you good. [Aside.] I shall now soon be even with the hypocritical strumpet.

SCENE 9

POLLY

All this wheedling of Lucy cannot be for nothing. At this time too, when I know she hates me! The dissembling of a woman is always the forerunner of mischief. By pouring strong waters down my throat, she thinks to pump some secrets out of me. I'll be upon my guard, and won't taste a drop of her liquor, I'm resolved.

SCENE 10

LUCY, with strong waters. POLLY.

LUCY Come, Miss Polly.

POLLY Indeed, child, you have given yourself trouble to no purpose.
You must, my dear, excuse me.

LUCY Really, Miss Polly, you are so squeamishly affected about taking a cup of strong waters as a lady before company. I vow, Polly, I shall take it monstrously ill if you refuse me. Brandy and men (though women love them never so well) are always taken by us with some reluctance—unless 'tis in private.

POLLY I protest, madam, it goes against me.—What do I see! Macheath again in custody! Now every glimmering of happiness is lost. [Drops the glass of liquor on the ground.]

LUCY [Aside.] Since things are thus, I'm glad the wench hath escaped; for by this event, 'tis plain she was not happy enough to deserve to be poisoned.

SCENE 11<sup>6</sup>

LOCKIT, MACHEATH, PEACHUM, LUCY, POLLY

LOCKIT    Set your heart to rest, Captain. You have neither the chance of love or money for another escape, for you are ordered to be called down upon your trial immediately.

PEACHUM    Away, hussies! This is not a time for a man to be hampered with his wives. You see, the gentleman is in chains already.

LUCY    O husband, husband, my heart longed to see thee; but to see thee thus distracts me!

POLLY    Will not my dear husband look upon his Polly? Why hadst thou not flown to me for protection? With me thou hadst been safe.

AIR 52.    The last time I went o'er the moor

POLLY    Hither, dear husband, turn your eyes.

LUCY    Bestow one glance to cheer me.

POLLY    Think with that look, thy Polly dies.

LUCY    O shun me not, but hear me.

POLLY    'Tis Polly sues.

LUCY    —'Tis Lucy speaks.

POLLY    Is thus true love requited?

LUCY    My heart is bursting

POLLY    —Mine too breaks.

LUCY    Must I—

POLLY    —Must I be slighted?

MACHEATH    What would you have me say, ladies? You see, this affair will soon be at an end, without my disobliging either of you.

PEACHUM    But the settling this point, Captain, might prevent a lawsuit between your two widows.

AIR 53. Tom Tinker's my true love

MACHEATH *Which way shall I turn me? How can I decide?
Wives, the day of our death, are as fond as a bride.
One wife is too much for most husbands to hear,
But two at a time there's no mortal can bear.
This way, and that way, and which way I will,
What would comfort the one, t'other wife would take ill.*

POLLY But if his own misfortunes have made him insensible to mine, a father sure will be more compassionate. Dear, dear sir, sink<sup>z</sup> the material evidence, and bring him off at his trial. Polly upon her knees begs it of you.

AIR 54. I am a poor shepherd undone

*When my hero in court appears,
And stands arraigned for his life,
Then think of poor Polly's tears;
For ah! Poor Polly's his wife.
Like the sailor he holds up his hand,
Distressed on the dashing wave.
To die a dry death at land,
Is as bad as a wat'ry grave.
And alas, poor Polly!
Alack, and well-a-day!
Before I was in love,
Oh! every month was May.*

LUCY If Peachum's heart is hardened, sure you, sir, will have more compassion on a daughter. I know the evidence is in your power: how then can you be a tyrant to me? [Kneeling.]

AIR 55. Ianthe the lovely

*When he holds up his hand arraigned for his life,
Oh think of your daughter, and think I'm his wife!
What are cannons, or bombs, or clashing of swords?
For death is more certain by witnesses' words.
Then nail up their lips, that dread thunder allay;
And each month of my life will hereafter be May.*

LOCKIT Macheath's time is come, Lucy. We know our own affairs, therefore let us have no more whimpering or whining.

AIR 56. A cobbler there was

*Ourselves, like the great, to secure a retreat,
When matters require it, must give up our gang.
And good reason why,
Or, instead of the fry,
Even Peachum and I,
Like poor petty rascals, might hang, hang;
Like poor petty rascals, might hang.*

PEACHUM Set your heart at rest, Polly. Your husband is to die today.
Therefore, if you are not already provided, 'tis high time to look about for another. There's comfort for you, you slut.

LOCKIT We are ready, sir, to conduct you to the Old Bailey.

AIR 57. Bonny Dundee

MACHEATH *The charge is prepared; the lawyers are met;
The judges all ranged (a terrible show!).
I go, undismayed, for death is a debt,
A debt on demand. So take what I owe.*

*Then farewell my love—dear charmers, adieu.
Contented I die—'tis the better for you.
Here ends all dispute the rest of our lives,
For this way at once I please all my wives.*

Now, gentlemen, I am ready to attend you.

LUCY, POLLY, FILCH

POLLY Follow them, Filch, to the court. And when the trial is over, bring me a particular account of his behavior, and of everything that happened. You'll find me here with Miss Lucy. [Exit FILCH.] But why is all this music?

LUCY The prisoners whose trials are put off till next Session are diverting themselves.

POLLY Sure there is nothing so charming as music, I'm fond of it to distraction. But alas! Now all mirth seems an insult upon my affliction. Let us retire, my dear Lucy, and indulge our sorrows. The noisy crew, you see, are coming upon us. [Exeunt.]
[A Dance of Prisoners in Chains, etc.]

SCENE 13 *The condemned hold

MACHEATH, *in a melancholy posture.

AIR 58. Happy groves

*O cruel, cruel, cruel case!
Must I suffer this disgrace?*

AIR 59. Of all the girls that are so smart

*Of all the friends in time of grief,
When threat'ning death looks grimmer,
Not one so sure can bring relief,
As this best friend, a brimmer.<sup>8</sup>[Drinks.]*

AIR 60. Britons strike home

AIR 61. Chevy Chase

*But now again my spirits sink;
I'll raise them high with wine.
[Drinks a glass of wine.]*

AIR 62. To old Sir Simon the King

AIR 63. Joy to great Caesar

*If thus—A man can die
Much bolder with brandy.
[Pours out a bumper of brandy.]*

AIR 64. There was an old woman

*So I drink off this bumper. And now I can stand the test.
And my comrades shall see, that I die as brave as the best.[Drinks.]*

AIR 65. Did you ever hear of a gallant sailor

*But can I leave my pretty hussies,
Without one tear, or tender sigh?*

AIR 66. Why are mine eyes still flowing

*Their eyes, their lips, their busses<sup>9</sup>
Recall my love. Ah must I die?*

AIR 67. Green sleeves

*Since laws were made for every degree,
To curb vice in others, as well as me,
I wonder we han't better company,*

Upon Tyburn Tree!
But gold from law can take out the sting;
And if rich men like us were to swing,
'Twould thin the land, such numbers to string
Upon Tyburn Tree!

SCENE 14

MACHEATH, BEN BUDGE, MATT OF THE MINT

MACHEATH For my having broke prison, you see, gentlemen, I am ordered immediate execution. The sheriff's officers, I believe, are now at the door. That Jemmy Twitcher should peach me, I own surprised me! 'Tis a plain proof that the world is all alike, and that even our gang can no more trust one another than other people. Therefore, I beg you, gentlemen, look well to yourselves, for in all probability you may live some months longer.

MATT We are heartily sorry, Captain, for your misfortune. But 'tis what we must all come to.

MACHEATH Peachum and Lockit, you know, are infamous scoundrels. Their lives are as much in your power as yours are in theirs. Remember your dying friend! 'Tis my last request. Bring those villains to the gallows before you, and I am satisfied.

MATT We'll do't.

JAILER Miss Polly and Miss Lucy entreat a word with you.

MACHEATH Gentlemen, adieu.

SCENE 15

LUCY, MACHEATH, POLLY

MACHEATH Lucy, my dear Polly, whatsoever hath passed between us is now at an end. If you are fond of marrying again, the best advice I can give you, is to ship yourselves off for the West Indies,<sup>1</sup> where you'll have a fair chance of getting a husband apiece; or by good luck, two or three, as you like best.

POLLY How can I support this sight!

LUCY There is nothing moves one so much as a great man in distress.

AIR 68. All you that must take a leap

LUCY Would I might be hanged!

POLLY And I would so too!

LUCY To be hanged with you.

POLLY My dear, with you.

MACHEATH O leave me to thought! I fear! I doubt!

I tremble! I droop! See, my courage is out.

[Turns up the empty bottle.]

POLLY No token of love?

MACHEATH See, my courage is out.

[Turns up the empty pot.]

LUCY No token of love?

POLLY Adieu.

LUCY Farewell.

MACHEATH But hark! I hear the toll of the bell.<sup>2</sup>

CHORUS Tol de rol lol, etc.

JAILER Four women more, Captain, with a child apiece! See, here they come. [Enter women and children.]

MACHEATH    What—four wives more! This is too much. Here—tell the sheriff's officers I am ready. [Exit MACHEATH guarded.]

SCENE 16

To them, enter PLAYER and BEGGAR.

PLAYER But, honest friend, I hope you don't intend that Macheath shall be really executed.

BEGGAR Most certainly, sir. To make the piece perfect, I was for doing strict poetical justice. Macheath is to be hanged; and for the other personages of the drama, the audience must have supposed they were all either hanged or transported.

PLAYER Why then, friend, this is a downright deep tragedy. The catastrophe is manifestly wrong, for an opera must end happily.

BEGGAR Your objection, sir, is very just, and is easily removed. For you must allow that in this kind of drama 'tis no matter how absurdly things are brought about. So—you rabble there—run and cry a reprieve. Let the prisoner be brought back to his wives in triumph.

PLAYER All this we must do, to comply with the taste of the town.

BEGGAR Through the whole piece you may observe such a similitude of manners in high and low life, that it is difficult to determine whether (in the fashionable vices) the fine gentlemen imitate the gentlemen of the road, or the gentlemen of the road the fine gentlemen. Had the play remained as I at first intended, it would have carried a most excellent moral. 'Twould have shown that the lower sort of people have their vices in a degree as well as the rich, and that they are punished for them.<sup>3</sup>

SCENE 17

To them, MACHEATH with rabble, etc.

MACHEATH    So, it seems, I am not left to my choice, but must have a wife at last. Look ye, my dears, we will have no controversy now. Let us give this day to mirth, and I am sure she who thinks herself my wife will testify her joy by a dance.

ALL    Come, a dance, a dance.

MACHEATH    Ladies, I hope you will give me leave to present a partner to each of you. And (if I may without offense) for this time, I take Polly for mine. [To POLLY.] And for life, you slut, for we were really married. As for the rest—But at present keep your own secret.

A DANCE

AIR 69.    Lumps of pudding

*Thus I stand like the Turk, with his doxies around;
From all sides their glances his passion confound;
For black, brown, and fair, his inconstancy burns,
And the different beauties subdue him by turns;
Each calls forth her charms, to provoke his desires;
Though willing to all, with but one he retires.
But think of this maxim, and put off your sorrow,
The wretch of today may be happy tomorrow.*

CHORUS    But think of this maxim, etc.

LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU

1689–1762

In her early teens Lady Mary Pierrepont did something that well-bred young women were not supposed to do: she secretly taught herself Latin. The act reveals many of the traits that would also characterize her as a mature woman: curiosity, love of learning, intelligence, ambition, and independence of mind. The eldest daughter of a wealthy Whig peer (he later became marquess of Dorchester), she grew up amid a glittering London circle that included Addison, Steele, Congreve, and later Pope and Gay. She began writing, circulating some of her poems among friends but also publishing, including a contribution to the Spectator. She was not content to live the life of a dutiful aristocratic daughter. Unlike most women in her time, she married for love, and when her husband, Edward Wortley Montagu, was appointed ambassador to Constantinople in 1716, she took advantage of the opportunity by traveling through Europe and studying the language and customs of Turkey. Returning home in 1718, she spent unhappy years that included bitter political quarrels with Pope and the gradual failure of her marriage. Then, in middle age, she fell in love with a young Italian author, Francesco Algarotti. In 1739 she traveled to Italy hoping to see him; but the passion that had kindled in their letters was soon quenched when he failed to join her. The rest of her life was passed abroad, in Avignon, France, and in Brescia and Venice, Italy. She died soon after her return to London, in 1762.

In a century that included many of the great letter writers in English—Gray, Horace Walpole, William Cowper, and others—Montagu is one of the greatest. She had saved her correspondence from 1716 to 1718, which centered on her experiences in the Ottoman Empire, and in the year before she died, she deposited a manuscript version with a Protestant clergyman, intending it to be published. Letters . . . Written during Her Travels appeared, posthumously, in 1763. “What fire, what ease, what knowledge of Europe and Asia!” the eminent historian Edward Gibbon exclaimed of the work. Montagu had traveled as a young woman with the deliberate ambition to gain such knowledge. Before arriving in Turkey, she undertook the project of understanding its culture in conversations with an Islamic scholar in Belgrade, and her curiosity led her to a multitude of revealing, provocative situations, on which she reflects with acuity and wit. She approvingly describes the liberties given to women by Turkish customs and institutions, such as the veils that rendered a woman incognito in the street (the better, she thought, to conduct secret love affairs). Letter XXXI explains the technique of smallpox inoculation in Turkey. Montagu would earn a place in medical history for her brave introduction of the practice to Britain on her return (her son and daughter were among the first to be inoculated), arousing resistance from doctors (as she predicts) and from fearful people in general. The admiring frankness of Montagu’s description of the communal nudity of women in Turkish baths, in Letter XXVI, disturbed and shocked readers when the letters were finally published. Her correspondence presents two subjects to which many British readers at the time were unaccustomed: a complex, formidable civilization beyond Europe’s borders, and the independent, brilliant perceptions of a woman able to view the norms of her own society critically in light of those of another.

From an early age Montagu wrote in many literary forms: essays, poems, fiction, and even a translated play. In her own time she was especially admired as a poet. When Pope, after their quarrel, gave her the name “Sappho” in his poem “Epistle to a Lady,” he was doubtless betraying the nervousness that many men felt in the presence of intelligent women (the Greek poet Sappho, after all, preferred women to men); yet Pope was also associating her with the classic author of lyric verse. Montagu's poems, although often casual, reveal the mind of a woman who is not willing to accept the stereotypes imposed upon her by men. Like her friend Mary Astell, Montagu puts her trust in education and reason, not in the opinions of others, and she insists on preserving her freedom of choice. A woman, Montagu's poems suggest, need not defer to a man who is less than her equal; she must look to her own satisfaction before she looks to his, and she retains the right to say no. Her poetry, like her travel writing, displays an energetic, witty, candid mind, alert to contradictions and differences in points of view, which she deftly orchestrates to present her reader with a fuller, more interesting world.

Saturday. The Small Pox<sup>1</sup>

FLAVIA:<sup>2</sup>

The wretched Flavia on her couch reclined,
Thus breathed the anguish of a wounded mind;
A glass<sup>o</sup> reversed in her right hand she bore,
For now she shunned the face she sought before.
5        "How am I changed! alas! how am I grown
A frightful specter, to myself unknown!
Where's my complexion? where the radiant bloom,<sup>o</sup>
That promised happiness for years to come?
Then with what pleasure I this face surveyed!
To look once more, my visits oft delayed!
10        Charmed with the view, a fresher red would rise,
And a new life shot sparkling from my eyes!
      Ah! faithless glass, my wonted bloom restore;
Alas! I rave, that bloom is now no more!
The greatest good the gods on men bestow,
15        Ev'n youth itself, to me is useless now.
There was a time (oh! that I could forget!)
When opera-tickets poured before my feet;
And at the Ring,<sup>3</sup> where brightest beauties shine,
The earliest cherries of the spring were mine.
20        Witness, O Lilly; and thou, Motteux, tell
How much Japan<sup>4</sup> these eyes have made ye sell.
With what contempt ye saw me oft despise
The humble offer of the raffled prize;
For at the raffle still each prize I bore,
25        With scorn rejected, or with triumph wore!
Now beauty's fled, and presents are no more!<sup>5</sup>
      For me the patriot has the House<sup>o</sup> forsook,

And left debates to catch a passing look:
For me the soldier has soft verses writ;
30 For me the beau has aimed to be a wit.
For me the wit to nonsense was betrayed;
The gamester<sup>o</sup> has for me his dun<sup>6</sup> delayed,
And overseen<sup>o</sup> the card I would have played.
The bold and haughty by success made vain,
35 Awed by my eyes has trembled to complain:
The bashful 'squire touched by a wish unknown,
Has dared to speak with spirit not his own;
Fired by one wish, all did alike adore;
Now beauty's fled, and lovers are no more!
40 As round the room I turn my weeping eyes,
New unaffected scenes of sorrow rise!
Far from my sight that killing<sup>o</sup> picture bear,
The face disfigure, and the canvas tear!
That picture which with pride I used to show,
45 The lost resemblance but upbraids me now.
And thou, my toilette! where I oft have sat,
While hours unheeded passed in deep debate,
How curls should fall, or where a patch<sup>z</sup> to place:
If blue or scarlet best became my face;
50 Now on some happier nymph thy aid bestow;
On fairer heads, ye useless jewels glow!
No borrowed luster can my charms restore;
Beauty is fled, and dress is now no more!
Ye meaner<sup>o</sup> beauties, I permit ye shine;
55 Go, triumph in the hearts that once were mine;
But midst your triumphs with confusion know,
'Tis to my ruin all your arms<sup>8</sup> ye owe.
Would pitying heaven restore my wonted mien,
Ye still might move unthought-of and unseen.
60 But oh! how vain, how wretched is the boast
Of beauty faded, and of empire lost!
What now is left but weeping, to deplore

My beauty fled, and empire now no more!
 Ye, cruel chemists,<sup>o</sup> what withheld your aid!
 65 Could no pomatums<sup>o</sup> save a trembling maid?
 How false and trifling is that art<sup>o</sup> you boast;
 No art can give me back my beauty lost.
 In tears, surrounded by my friends I lay,
 Masked o'er and trembled at the sight of day;
 70 Mirmillo<sup>9</sup> came my fortune to deplore,
 (A golden-headed cane, well-carved he bore)
 Cordials,<sup>o</sup> he cried, my spirits must restore:
 Beauty is fled, and spirit is no more!
 Galen, the grave; officious Squirt<sup>1</sup> was there,
 75 With fruitless grief and unavailing care:
 Machaon<sup>2</sup> too, the great Machaon, known
 By his red cloak and his superior frown;
 And why, he cried, this grief and this despair?
 You shall again be well, again be fair;
 80 Believe my oath; (with that an oath he swore)
 False was his oath; my beauty is no more!
 Cease, hapless maid, no more thy tale pursue,
 Forsake mankind, and bid the world adieu!
 Monarchs and beauties rule with equal sway;
 85 All strive to serve, and glory to obey:
 Alike unpitied when deposed they grow;
 Men mock the idol of their former vow.
 Adieu! ye parks!—in some obscure recess,
 Where gentle streams will weep at my distress,
 90 Where no false friend will in my grief take part,
 And mourn my ruin with a joyful heart;
 There let me live in some deserted place,
 There hide in shades this lost inglorious face.
 Ye, operas, circles,<sup>3</sup> I no more must view!
 95 My toilette, patches, all the world adieu!"

- Note 1:

A deadly disease, smallpox was also deplored for the scars it left on hitherto beautiful complexions. Montagu's brother died of it, and she herself nearly did. Her family members said she wrote this poem just after she recovered from the illness in 1715, at age twenty-six (though she would publish it decades later). The following year, she traveled with her husband to Turkey, where she would learn about and embrace inoculation against smallpox as practiced there. The title of the book in which this poem first appeared, Six Town Eclogues, with Some Other Poems, published in 1747, ironically alludes to the Eclogues (ca. 38–39 B.C.E.) of Virgil (70–19 B.C.E.), pastoral poems peopled with fancifully elegant shepherds and shepherdesses in the countryside: Montagu's eclogues, each titled after a day of the week (Monday through Saturday), treat modern, urban figures with problems common in the "town," the fashionable part of London.

Return to reference 1

- Note 2: The name means "blonde." Each of Montagu's eclogues is devoted to a speech of a single figure, as here, or to a pair of characters in dialogue. (All were women except Tuesday's amorous male dialogists.)Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Fashionable drive in Hyde Park.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Lacquerware made in Japan, or imitations made elsewhere. "Lilly": Charles Lillie (d. 1746), an innovative perfumer who also sold scented snuffs and other items at a shop in the Strand, and was a publisher of Addison and Steele's Tatler and Spectator, both of which mention him and his shop frequently. "Motteux": the Huguenot merchant and playwright Pierre Antoine Motteux (1663–1718) and, later, his widow, ran a shop that sold lacquerware in Leadenhall Street.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Montagu reworks Pope's changing refrain in his fourth pastoral, published in 1709: for example, "Fair Daphne's dead, and Love is now no more!"Return to reference 5
- Note 6: What he is owed, his winnings.Return to reference 6

- Note 7: A beauty patch of black silk worn on the face.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Beauty portrayed as a martial weapon. The word charms appears in a manuscript copy.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: The name of a character, representing Dr. William Gibbons (1649–1728), in the very popular mock-heroic poem The Dispensary (1699) by the wit Samuel Garth (1661–1719), who was also Montagu’s family physician. She repurposes the name here to refer to Dr. Richard Mead (1674–1754), who researched smallpox extensively and promoted inoculation, and was known for his “golden-headed cane” (line 72). With Garth, he treated Montagu during her 1715 smallpox illness.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: A slang term for physician, and a character in The Dispensary (where he is also called “officious Squirt”). “Galen”: Aelius Galenus or Claudius Galenus (129–216 C.E.), Greek physician and surgeon in the Roman Empire, who exercised a dominant influence on western medicine; here he possibly represents Dr. John Woodward (1665/8–1728), who read a letter in favor of smallpox inoculation to the Royal Society in 1714, and also treated Montagu in 1715.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Son of the Greek god of medicine Asclepius, and so a nickname for physicians, as in The Dispensary, in which he represents Sir Thomas Millington (1628–1704); Montagu uses it here to refer to Garth himself, who wore a distinctive “red cloak” (line 78).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: “A company; an assembly” (Johnson’s Dictionary).Return to reference 3

The Lover: A Ballad

At length, by so much importunity pressed,
Take, (Molly),<sup>1</sup> at once, the inside of my breast;
This stupid indifference so often you blame
Is not owing to nature, to fear, or to shame;
5 I am not as cold as a Virgin in lead.<sup>2</sup>
Nor is Sunday's sermon so strong in my head;
I know but too well how time flies along,
That we live but few years and yet fewer are young.

But I hate to be cheated, and never will buy
Long years of repentance for moments of joy.
10 Oh was there a man (but where shall I find Good sense and good nature so equally joined?)
Would value his pleasure, contribute to mine,
Not meanly would boast, nor lewdly design,<sup>3</sup>
Not over severe, yet not stupidly vain, 15 For I would have the power though not give the pain;

No pedant yet learnèd, not rakehelly gay
Or laughing because he has nothing to say,
To all my whole sex obliging and free,
Yet never be fond of any but me;
20 In public preserve the decorums are just,
And show in his eyes he is true to his trust,
Then rarely approach, and respectfully bow,
Yet not fulsomely pert, nor yet foppishly low.

But when the long hours of public are past 25 And we meet with champagne and a chicken at last,
May every fond pleasure that hour endear,

Be banished afar both discretion and fear,
 Forgetting or scorning the airs of the crowd
 He may cease to be formal, and I to be proud,
 30 Till lost in the joy we confess that we live,
 And he may be rude, and yet I may forgive.

And that my delight may be solidly fixed,
 Let the friend and the lover be handsomely mixed,
 In whose tender bosom my soul might confide, 35 Whose kindness can sooth me, whose counsel could guide.
 From such a dear lover as here I describe No danger should fright me, no millions should bribe;
 But till this astonishing creature I know,
 40 As I long have lived chaste, I will keep myself so.

I never will share with the wanton coquette,
 Or be caught by a vain affectation of wit.
 The toasters and songsters may try all their art
 But never shall enter the pass of my heart.
 45 I loathe the lewd rake, the dressed fopling despise;
 Before such pursuers the nice<sup>o</sup> virgin flies;
 And as Ovid has sweetly in parables told
 We harden like trees, and like rivers are cold.<sup>3</sup>

Epistle from Mrs. Yonge to Her Husband<sup>1</sup>

Think not this paper comes with vain pretense
To move your pity, or to mourn th' offense.
Too well I know that hard obdurate heart;
No softening mercy there will take my part,
Nor can a woman's arguments prevail,
5 When even your patron's wise example fails.<sup>2</sup>
But this last privilege I still retain;
Th' oppressed and injured always may complain.
Too, too severely laws of honor bind
The weak submissive sex of womankind.
10 If sighs have gained or force compelled our hand,
Deceived by art, or urged by stern command,
Whatever motive binds the fatal tie,
The judging world expects our constancy.
Just heaven! (for sure in heaven does justice
15 reign,
Though tricks below that sacred name profane)
To you appealing I submit my cause,
Nor fear a judgment from impartial laws.
All bargains but conditional<sup>o</sup> are made;
The purchase void, the creditor unpaid;
20 Defrauded servants are from service free;
A wounded slave regains his liberty.
For wives ill used no remedy remains,
To daily racks condemned, and to eternal chains.
From whence is this unjust distinction grown?
25 Are we not formed with passions like your own?
Nature with equal fire our souls endued,
Our minds as haughty, and as warm our blood;
O'er the wide world your pleasures you pursue,

30 The change is justified by something new;
 But we must sigh in silence—and be true. }
 Our sex's weakness you expose and blame
 (Of every prattling fop the common theme),
 Yet from this weakness you suppose is due 35 Sublimer virtue than your Cato<sup>3</sup> knew.
 Had heaven designed us trials so severe,
 It would have formed our tempers them to bear.
 And I have borne (oh what have I not borne!)
 The pang of jealousy, the insults of scorn.
 Wearied at length, I from your sight remove,
 40 And place my future hopes in secret love.
 In the gay bloom of glowing youth retired,
 I quit the woman's joy to be admired,
 With that small pension your hard heart allows,
 Renounce your fortune, and release your vows.
 45 To custom (though unjust) so much is due;
 I hide my frailty from the public view.
 My conscience clear, yet sensible of shame,
 My life I hazard, to preserve my fame.
 And I prefer this low inglorious state
 50 To vile dependence on the thing I hate— }
 But you pursue me to this last retreat.
 Dragged into light, my tender crime is shown
 And every circumstance of fondness known.
 Beneath the shelter of the law you stand,
 55 And urge my ruin with a cruel hand,
 While to my fault thus rigidly severe,
 Tamely submissive to the man you fear.<sup>4</sup>
 This wretched outcast, this abandoned wife,
 Has yet this joy to sweeten shameful life:
 60 By your mean conduct, infamously loose,
 You are at once my accuser and excuse.
 Let me be damned by the censorious prude
 (Stupidly dull, or spiritually lewd),

65 My hapless case will surely pity find
 From every just and reasonable mind.
 When to the final sentence I submit,
 The lips condemn me, but their souls acquit.
 No more my husband, to your pleasures go,
 The sweets of your recovered freedom know.
 70 Go: court the brittle friendship of the great,
 Smile at his board,<sup>o</sup> or at his levee<sup>5</sup> wait;
 And when dismissed, to madam's toilet<sup>6</sup> fly,
 More than her chambermaids, or glasses,<sup>o</sup> lie,
 Tell her how young she looks, how heavenly fair,
 75 Admire the lilies and the roses there.
 Your high ambition may be gratified,
 Some cousin of her own be made your bride,
 And you the father of a glorious race
 Endowed with Ch—l's strength and Low—r's face.<sup>7</sup>

1724 Endnotes

1972

- Note 1: In 1724 the notorious libertine William Yonge, separated from his wife, Mary, discovered that she (like him) had committed adultery. He sued her lover, Colonel Norton, for damages and collected £1500. Later that year, according to the law of the time, he petitioned the Houses of Parliament for a divorce. The case was tried in public, Mary Yonge's love letters were read aloud, and two men testified that they had found her and Norton "together in naked bed." William Yonge was granted the divorce, his wife's dowry, and the greater part of her fortune.Return to reference 1

["THE WOMEN'S COFFEE HOUSE"; OR, THE TURKISH BATHS]

I am now got into a new world, where every thing I see appears to me a change of scene; and I write to your ladyship with some content of mind, hoping, at least, that you will find the charm of novelty in my letters, and no longer reproach me that I tell you nothing extraordinary. I won't trouble you with a relation of our tedious journey; but I must not omit what I saw remarkable at Sophia,<sup>3</sup> one of the most beautiful towns in the Turkish empire and famous for its hot baths, that are resorted to both for diversion and health. I stopped here one day on purpose to see them; and designing to go incognito, I hired a Turkish coach. These voitures<sup>4</sup> are not at all like ours, but much more convenient for the country, the heat being so great that glasses<sup>5</sup> would be very troublesome. They are made a good deal in the manner of the Dutch coaches, having wooden lattices painted and gilded; the inside being painted with baskets and nosegays of flowers, intermixed commonly with little poetical mottos. They are covered all over with scarlet cloth, lined with silk, and very often richly embroidered and fringed. This covering entirely hides the persons in them, but may be thrown back at pleasure, and thus permit the ladies to peep through the lattices. They hold four people very conveniently, seated on cushions, but not raised.

In one of these covered wagons, I went to the bagnio<sup>6</sup> about ten o'clock. It was already full of women. It is built of stone, in the shape of a dome, with no windows but in the roof, which gives light enough. There were five of these domes joined together, the outmost being less<sup>7</sup> than the rest, and serving only as a hall, where the portress stood at the door. Ladies of quality generally give this woman the value of a crown or ten shillings, and I did not forget that ceremony. The next room is a very large one, paved with marble, and all round it raised two sofas of marble, one above another. There were four fountains of cold water in this room, falling first into marble basins, and then running on the floor in little channels made for that purpose, which carried the streams into the next room, something less than this, with the same sort of marble sofas, but so hot with steams of sulphur proceeding from the baths joining to it, 'twas impossible to stay there with one's clothes on. The two other domes were the hot baths, one of which had cocks<sup>8</sup> of cold water turning into it, to temper it to what degree of warmth the bathers pleased to have.

I was in my traveling habit, which is a riding dress, and certainly appeared very extraordinary to them. Yet there was not one of them that showed the least surprise or impertinent curiosity, but received me with all the obliging civility possible. I know no European court where the ladies would have behaved themselves in so polite a manner to such a stranger. I believe, upon the whole, there were two hundred women, and yet none of those disdainful smiles or satirical whispers that never fail in our assemblies when anybody appears that is not dressed exactly in fashion. They repeated over and over to me, "Uzelle, pek uzelle," which is nothing but "charming, very charming."—The first sofas were covered with cushions and rich carpets, on which sat the ladies; and on the second, their slaves behind them, but without any distinction of rank by their dress, all being in the state of nature, that is, in plain English, stark naked, without any beauty or defect concealed. Yet there was not the least wanton smile or immodest gesture amongst them. They walked and moved with the same majestic grace which Milton describes our General Mother<sup>9</sup> with. There were many amongst them as exactly proportioned as ever any goddess was drawn by the pencil of Guido or Titian,<sup>1</sup> and most of their skins shinningly white, only adorned by their beautiful hair, divided into many tresses hanging on their shoulders, braided either with pearl or ribbon, perfectly representing the figures of the graces.<sup>2</sup>

I was here convinced of the truth of a reflection I had often made, that if it were the fashion to go naked, the face would be hardly observed. I perceived that the ladies of the most delicate skins and finest shapes had the greatest share of my admiration, though their faces were sometimes less beautiful than those of their companions. To tell you the truth, I had wickedness enough to wish secretly that Mr. Gervase<sup>3</sup> could have been there invisible. I fancy it would have very much improved his art to see so many fine women naked in different postures, some in conversation, some working, others drinking coffee or sherbet, and many negligently lying on their cushions while their slaves (generally pretty girls of seventeen or eighteen) were employed in braiding their hair in several pretty fancies. In short, 'tis the women's coffee house, where all the news of the town is told, scandal invented, etc. They generally take this diversion once a week, and stay there at least four or five hours without getting cold, by immediate coming out of the hot bath into the cool room, which was very surprising to me. The lady that seemed the most considerable amongst them entreated me to sit by her, and would fain have undressed me for the bath. I excused myself with some difficulty. They being however all so earnest in persuading me, I was at last forced to open my skirt and show them my stays,<sup>4</sup> which satisfied them very well, for I saw they believed I was locked up in that machine, and that it was not in my own power to open it, which contrivance they attributed to my husband. I was charmed with their civility and beauty and should have been very glad to pass more time with them, but Mr. W[ortley] resolving to pursue his journey the next morning early, I was in haste to see the ruins of Justinian's church,<sup>5</sup> which did not afford me so agreeable a prospect as I had left, being little more than a heap of stones.

Adieu, Madam. I am sure I have now entertained you with an account of such a sight as you never saw in your life, and what no book of travels could inform you of, as 'tis no less than death for a man to be found in one of these places.

[READING POETRY IN TURKEY]

I dare say you expect, at least, something very new in this letter, after I have gone a journey, not undertaken, by any Christian, for some hundred years. The most remarkable accident that happened to me was my being very near over-turned into the Hebrus;<sup>6</sup> and, if I had much regard for the glories that one's name enjoys after death, I should certainly be sorry for having missed the romantic conclusion of swimming down the same river in which the musical head of Orpheus repeated verses, so many ages since:

*Caput a cervice revulsum,
Gurgite cum medio, portans Oeagrius Hebrus
Volveret, Euridicen vox ipsa, et frigida lingua
Ah! miseram Euridicen! anima fugiente vocabat,
Euridicen toto referebant flumine ripæ.*<sup>7</sup>

Who knows but some of your bright wits might have found it a subject affording many poetical turns, and have told the world, in an heroic elegy, that,

As equal were our souls, so equal were our fates?<sup>8</sup>

I despair of ever hearing so many fine things said of me, as so extraordinary a death would have given occasion for.

I am at this present moment writing in a house situated on the banks of the Hebrus, which runs under my chamber window. My garden is full of tall cypress trees, upon the branches of which several couple of true turtles are saying soft things to one another from morning till night. How naturally do boughs and vows come into my mind, at this minute? And must not you confess, to my praise, that 'tis more than an ordinary discretion, that can resist the wicked suggestions of poetry, in a place where truth, for once, furnishes all the ideas of pastoral.<sup>9</sup> The summer is already far advanced, in this part of the world; and for some miles round Adrianople, the whole ground is laid out in gardens, and the banks of the rivers are set with rows of fruit trees, under which all the most considerable Turks divert themselves every evening, not with walking, that is not one of their pleasures; but a set party of them choose out a green spot, where the shade is very thick, and there they spread a carpet, on which they sit drinking their coffee, and are generally attended by some slave with a fine voice, or that plays on some instrument. Every twenty paces you may see one of these little companies, listening to the dashing of the river; and this taste is so universal that the very gardeners are not without it. I have often seen them and their children sitting on the banks of the river, and playing on a rural instrument, perfectly answering the description of the ancient fistula,<sup>1</sup> being composed of unequal reeds, with a simple but agreeable softness in the sound.

Mr. Addison might here make the experiment he speaks of in his travels; there not being one instrument of music among the Greek or Roman statues, that is not to be found in the hands of the people of this country.<sup>2</sup> The young lads generally divert themselves with making garlands for their favorite lambs, which I have often seen painted and adorned with flowers, lying at their feet, while they sung or played. It is not that they ever read romances. But these are the ancient amusements here, and as natural to them as cudgel-playing and football to our British swains;<sup>3</sup> the softness and warmth of the climate forbidding all rough exercises, which were never so much as heard of amongst them, and naturally inspiring a laziness and aversion to labor, which the great plenty indulges. These gardeners are the only happy race of country people in Turkey. They furnish all the city with fruits and herbs, and seem to live very easily. They are most of them Greeks, and have little houses in the midst of their gardens, where their wives and daughters take a liberty not permitted in the town, I mean to go unveiled. These wenches are very neat and handsome, and pass their time at their looms under the shade of the trees.

I no longer look upon Theocritus as a romantic writer;<sup>4</sup> he has only given a plain image of the way of life amongst the peasants of his country; who, before oppression had reduced them to want, were, I suppose, all employed as the better sort of them are now. I don't doubt, had he been born a Briton, but his Idylliums had been filled with descriptions of threshing and churning, both which are unknown here, the corn being all trod out by oxen; and butter (I speak it with sorrow) unheard of.

I read over your Homer<sup>5</sup> here, with an infinite pleasure, and find several little passages explained, that I did not before entirely comprehend the beauty of: many of the customs, and much of the dress then in fashion, being yet retained. I don't wonder to find more remains here of an age so distant, than is to be found in any other country, the Turks not taking that pains to introduce their own manners, as has been generally practiced by other nations that imagine themselves more polite. It would be too tedious to you to point out all the passages that relate to present customs. But I can assure you that the princesses and great ladies pass their time at their looms, embroidering veils and robes, surrounded by their maids, which are always very numerous, in the same manner as we find Andromache and Helen described. The description of the belt of Menelaus exactly resembles those that are now worn by the great men, fastened before with broad golden clasps, and embroidered round with rich work. The snowy veil that Helen throws over her face is still fashionable; and I never see half a dozen of old bashaws<sup>6</sup> (as I do very often) with their reverend beards, sitting basking in the sun, but I recollect good King Priam and his counsellors. Their manner of dancing is certainly the same that Diana is sung to have danced on the banks of Eurotas.<sup>7</sup> The great lady still leads the dance, and is followed by a troop of young girls, who imitate her steps, and, if she sings, make up the chorus. The tunes are extremely gay and lively, yet with something in them wonderfully soft. The steps are varied according to the pleasure of her that leads the dance, but always in exact time, and infinitely more agreeable than any of our dances, at least in my opinion. I sometimes make one in the train, but am not skillful enough to lead; these are the Grecian dances, the Turkish being very different.

I should have told you, in the first place, that the Eastern manners give a great light into many Scripture-passages that appear odd to us, their phrases being commonly what we should call Scripture-language. The vulgar Turk is very different from what is spoke at court, or amongst the people of figure; who always mix so much Arabic and Persian in their discourse that it may very well be called another language. And 'tis as ridiculous to make use of the expressions commonly used, in speaking to a great man or lady, as it would be to speak broad Yorkshire or Somersetshire in the drawing-room. Besides this distinction, they have what they call the sublime, that is, a style proper for poetry, and which is the exact Scripture style. I believe you will be pleased to see a genuine example of this; and I am very glad I have it in my power to satisfy your curiosity, by sending you a faithful copy of the verses that Ibrahim Bassa,<sup>8</sup> the reigning favorite, has made for the young princess, his contracted wife, whom he is not yet permitted to visit without witnesses, though she is gone home to his house. He is a man of wit and learning; and whether or no he is capable of writing good verse, you may be sure that, on such an occasion, he would not want the assistance of the best poets in the empire. Thus the verses may be looked upon as a sample of their finest poetry, and I don't doubt you'll be of my mind, that it is most wonderfully resembling The Song of Solomon, which was also addressed to a royal bride.<sup>9</sup>

Turkish Verses Addressed to the Sultana, Eldest Daughter of Sultan Achmet III

The nightingale now wanders in the vines;
Her passion is to seek roses.

I went down to admire the beauty of the vines;

The sweetness of your charms has ravished my soul.

Your eyes are black and lovely
But wild and disdainful as those of a stag;

2

The wished possession is delayed from day to day,
The cruel Sultan Achmet will not permit me
To see those cheeks, more vermilion than roses.

I dare not snatch one of your kisses,
The sweetness of your charms has ravished my soul.

Your eyes are black and lovely,
But wild and disdainful as those of a stag.

3

The wretched Ibrahim sighs in these verses,
One dart from your eyes has pierced thro' my heart.

Ah! when will the hour of possession arrive?
Must I yet wait a long time?
The sweetness of your charms has ravished my soul.

Ah! Sultana! stag-eyed—an angel amongst angels!
I desire,—and my desire remains unsatisfied.
Can you take delight to prey upon my heart?

4

My cries pierce the heavens!
My eyes are without sleep!
Turn to me, Sultana—let me gaze on thy beauty.

Adieu—I go down to the grave.
If you call me—I return.
My heart is—hot as sulphur;—sigh, and it will flame.

Crown of my life, fair light of my eyes!
My Sultana! my princess!
I rub my face against the earth; I am drowned in scalding tears—I rave!
Have you no compassion? Will you not turn to look upon me?

I have taken abundance of pains to get these verses in a literal translation; and if you were acquainted with my interpreters, I might spare myself the trouble of assuring you, that they have received no poetical touches from their hands. In my opinion (allowing for the inevitable faults of a prose translation into a language so very different) there is a good deal of beauty in them. The epithet of stag-eyed (though the sound is not very agreeable in English) pleases me extremely; and I think it a very lively image of the fire and indifference in his mistress's eyes. Monsieur Boileau<sup>1</sup> has very justly observed, that we are never to judge of the elevation of an expression in an ancient author, by the sound it carries with us; since it may be extremely fine with them, when, at the same time, it appears low or uncouth to us. You are so well acquainted with Homer, you cannot but have observed the same thing, and you must have the same indulgence for all oriental<sup>2</sup> poetry. The repetitions at the end of the two first stanzas are meant for a sort of chorus, and are agreeable to the ancient manner of writing. The music of the verses apparently changes in the third stanza, where the burden<sup>3</sup> is altered; and I think he very artfully seems more passionate at the conclusion, as 'tis natural for people to warm themselves by their own discourse, especially on a subject in which one is deeply concerned; 'tis certainly far more touching than our modern custom of concluding a song of passion, with a turn which is inconsistent with it. The first verse is a description of the season of the year; all the country now being full of nightingales, whose amours with roses is an Arabian fable, as well known here as any part of Ovid amongst us, and is much the same as if an English poem should begin by saying,—‘Now Philomela<sup>4</sup> sings.’ Or what if I turned the whole into the style of English poetry, to see how it would look?

Now Philomel renews her tender strain.
Indulging all the night her pleasing pain;

I sought the groves to hear the wanton sing,
There saw a face, more beauteous than the spring,

Your large stag-eyes where thousand glories play,
As bright, as lively, but as wild as they.

2

In vain I’m promised such a heavenly prize,
Ah! cruel Sultan! who delay’st my joys!

While piercing charms transfix my amorous heart,
I dare not snatch one kiss, to ease the smart.

Those eyes! like, etc.

3

Your wretched lover in these lines complains;
From those dear beauties rise his killing pains.

When will the hour of wished-for bliss arrive?
Must I wait longer?—Can I wait and live?

Ah! bright Sultana! Maid divinely fair!
Can you, unpitying, see the pains I bear?

The heavens relenting, hear my piercing cries,
 I loathe the light, and sleep forsakes my eyes,
 Turn thee Sultana, 'ere thy lover dies;

Sinking to earth, I sigh the last adieu,
 Call me, my goddess, and my life renew.

My queen! My angel! My fond heart's desire.
 I rave—my bosom burns with heavenly fire!
 Pity that passion, which thy charms inspire.

I have taken the liberty in the second verse, of following what I suppose the true sense of the author, though not literally expressed. By his saying, he went down to admire the beauty of the vines, and her charms ravished his soul, I understand a poetical fiction, of having first seen her in a garden, where he was admiring the beauty of the spring. But I could not forbear retaining the comparison of her eyes with those of a stag, though perhaps the novelty of it may give it a burlesque sound in our language. I cannot determine, upon the whole, how well I have succeeded in the translation, neither do I think our English proper to express such violence of passion, which is very seldom felt amongst us. We want also those compound words which are very frequent and strong in the Turkish language.

You see I am pretty far gone in Oriental learning, and to say truth, I study very hard. I wish my studies may give me an occasion of entertaining your curiosity, which will be the utmost advantage hoped for from them, by,

Yours, etc.

[THE TURKISH METHOD OF INOCULATION FOR THE SMALL POX]

Apropos of distempers,<sup>5</sup> I am going to tell you a thing that will make you wish yourself here. The small pox, so fatal and so general amongst us, is here entirely harmless by the invention of engrafting, which is the term they give it. There is a set of old women who make it their business to perform the operation, every autumn, in the month of September, when the great heat is abated. People send to one another to know if any of their family has a mind to have the small pox; they make parties for this purpose, and when they are met (commonly fifteen or sixteen together) the old woman comes with a nutshell full of the matter of the best sort of small pox,<sup>6</sup> and asks what veins you please to have opened. She immediately rips open that you offer to her, with a large needle (which gives you no more pain than a common scratch) and puts into the vein as much matter as can lie upon the head of her needle, and after that, binds up the little wound with a hollow bit of shell, and in this manner opens four or five veins. The Grecians have commonly the superstition of opening one in the middle of the forehead, one in each arm, and one on the breast to mark the sign of the cross; but this has a very ill effect, all these wounds leaving little scars, and is not done by those that are not superstitious, who choose to have them in the legs, or that part of the arm that is concealed. The children or young patients play together all the rest of the day and are in perfect health to the eighth. Then the fever begins to seize them, and they keep their beds two days, very seldom three. They have very rarely above twenty or thirty in their faces, which never mark, and in eight days' time they are as well as before their illness. Where they are wounded, there remains running sores during the distemper, which I don't doubt is a great relief to it. Every year thousands undergo this operation, and the French ambassador says pleasantly that they take the small pox here by way of diversion, as they take the waters in other countries. There is no example of anyone that has died in it, and you may believe I am very well satisfied of the safety of this experiment, since I intend to try it on my dear little son. I am patriot enough to take pains to bring this useful invention into fashion in England, and I should not fail to write to some of our doctors very particularly about it, if I knew any one of them that I thought had virtue enough to destroy such a considerable branch of their revenue, for the good of mankind. But that distemper is too beneficial to them, not to expose to all their resentment the hardy wight<sup>7</sup> that should undertake to put an end to it. Perhaps if I live to return, I may, however, have courage to war with them. Upon this occasion, admire the heroism in the heart of your friend, etc.

ELIZA HAYWOOD

1693?–1756

Not much is known about the early life of Elizabeth Fowler or about the “unfortunate marriage,” as she described it, that made her Eliza Haywood. She first came before the public as an actress in 1714 in Dublin, then moved to London. But “the stage not answering my expectation,” as she later confessed, soon “made me turn my genius another way,” to the life of a professional writer. Her first novel, the racy, best-selling Love in Excess; or, The Fatal Inquiry (1719), launched her long career as one of the most popular, prolific, and versatile authors of her time. She retailed gossip and also was gossiped about, becoming involved with the poet Richard Savage—a friend of Pope and later of Samuel Johnson—and with William Hatchett, a playwright and actor who seems to have been her longtime companion. Pope mocked her scandal mongering, and her two illegitimate children, in his own scandal-mongering The Dunciad (1728), and Fielding caricatured her as “Mrs. Novel.” But nothing could keep her from writing. In addition to many kinds of fiction, she produced poems, translations, plays, political satires, essays, criticism, and books of advice and conduct—whatever might sell. In the 1730s she returned to the stage, as a playwright and actress, until the government cracked down on the theater in 1737. From 1744 to 1746 she had another great success with the Female Spectator, a wide-ranging periodical written for women. Later, The History of Miss Betsy Thoughtless (1751), the story of an indiscreet charmer who eventually reforms and finds her Mr. Trueworth, proved how well Haywood could adjust to the new style of edifying novels. And right up to the moment of her death she continued to work.

Fantomina first appeared among Haywood's Secret Histories, Novels, and Poems (1725), and the title page calls it "A Secret History of an Amour between Two Persons of Condition." The popular genre of "secret histories" promised a peep at what went on behind the scenes of fashionable society; and even though Haywood's story is obviously made up, it suggests that private lives, and especially love lives, are very different from what the public sees. Right at the start, the aristocratic heroine (whose name we never learn) is fascinated by the dalliance between "respectable" gentlemen and loose women of the town. She soon becomes a player herself. Cleverly switching roles, she gratifies her own desire by exploiting her lover's fickle passions. The story unsettles conventional views of social position, identity, morality, and gender. But most of all it shows that love is not only an irresistible impulse but also a risky, exciting game.

Fantomina; or, Love in a Maze

*In love the victors from the vanquished fly.
They fly that wound, and they pursue that die.*

A young lady of distinguished birth, beauty, wit, and spirit, happened to be in a box one night at the playhouse; where, though there were a great number of celebrated toasts,<sup>2</sup> she perceived several gentlemen extremely pleased themselves with entertaining a woman who sat in a corner of the pit and, by her air and manner of receiving them, might easily be known to be one of those who come there for no other purpose, than to create acquaintance with as many as seem desirous of it. She could not help testifying her contempt of men who, regardless either of the play or circle, threw away their time in such a manner, to some ladies that sat by her. But they, either less surprised by being more accustomed to such sights than she who had been bred for the most part in the country, or not of a disposition to consider anything very deeply, took but little notice of it. She still thought of it, however; and the longer she reflected on it, the greater was her wonder that men, some of whom she knew were accounted to have wit, should have tastes so very depraved.—This excited a curiosity in her to know in what manner these creatures were addressed.—She was young, a stranger to the world, and consequently to the dangers of it; and having nobody in town, at that time, to whom she was obliged to be accountable for her actions, did in everything as her inclinations or humors rendered most agreeable to her: therefore thought it not in the least a fault to put in practice a little whim which came immediately into her head, to dress herself as near as she could in the fashion of those women who make sale of their favors, and set herself in the way of being accosted as such a one, having at that time no other aim than the gratification of an innocent curiosity.—She no sooner designed this frolic than she put it in execution; and muffling her hoods over her face, went the next night into the gallery-box, and practicing, as much as she had observed at that distance, the behavior of that woman, was not long before she found her disguise had answered the ends she wore it for.—A crowd of purchasers of all degrees and capacities were in a moment gathered about her, each endeavoring to outbid the other, in offering her a price for her embraces.—She listened to 'em all, and was not a little diverted in her mind at the disappointment she should give to so many, each of which thought himself secure of gaining her.—She was told by 'em all, that she was the most lovely woman in the world; and some cried, Gad, she is mighty like my fine Lady Such-a-one—naming her own name. She was naturally vain, and received no small pleasure in hearing herself praised, though in the person of another, and a supposed prostitute; but she dispatched as soon as she could all that had hitherto attacked her, when she saw the accomplished Beauplaisir<sup>3</sup> was making his way through the crowd as fast as he was able, to reach the bench she sat on. She had often seen him in the drawing-room, had talked with him; but then her quality<sup>4</sup> and reputed virtue kept him from using her with that freedom she now expected he would do, and had discovered something in him which had made her often think she should not be displeased, if he would abate some part of his reserve.—Now was the time to have her wishes answered.—He looked in her face, and fancied, as many others had done, that she very much resembled that lady whom she really was; but the vast disparity there appeared between their characters prevented him from entertaining even the most distant thought that they could be the same.—He addressed her at first with the usual salutations of her pretended profession, as, Are you engaged, Madam?—Will you permit me to wait on you home after the play?—By Heaven, you are a fine girl!—How long have you used this house?—and such like questions; but perceiving she had a turn of wit, and a genteel manner in her raillery, beyond what is frequently to be found among those wretches, who are for the most part gentlewomen but by necessity, few of 'em having had an education suitable to what they affect to appear, he changed the form of his conversation, and showed her it was not because he understood no better, that he had made use of expressions so little polite.—In fine, they were infinitely charmed with each other. He was transported to find so much beauty and wit in a woman who he doubted not but on very easy terms he might enjoy; and she found a vast deal of pleasure in conversing with him in this free and unrestrained manner. They passed their time all the play with an equal satisfaction; but when it was over, she found herself involved in a difficulty which before never entered into her head, but which she knew not well how to get over.—The passion he professed for her was not of that humble nature which can be content with distant adorations.—He resolved not to part from her without the gratifications of those desires she had inspired; and presuming on the liberties which her supposed function allowed of, told her she must either go with him to some convenient house of his procuring, or permit him to wait on her to her own lodgings.—Never had she been in such a dilemma. Three or four times did she open her mouth to confess her real quality; but the influence of her ill stars prevented it, by putting an excuse into her head which did the business as well, and at the same time did not take from her the power of seeing and entertaining him a second time with the same freedom she had done this.—She told him, she was under obligations to a man who maintained her, and whom she durst not disappoint, having promised to meet him that night at a house hard by.—This story, so like what those ladies sometimes tell, was not at all suspected, by Beauplaisir; and assuring her he would be far from doing her a prejudice,<sup>5</sup> desired that in return for the pain he should suffer in being deprived of her company that night, that she would order her affairs so as not to render him unhappy the next. She gave a solemn promise to be in the same box on the morrow evening, and they took leave of each other; he to the tavern to drown the remembrance of his disappointment; she in a hackney-chair<sup>6</sup> hurried home to indulge contemplation on the frolic she had taken, designing nothing less on her first reflections than to keep the promise she had made him, and hugging herself with joy, that she had the good luck to come off undiscovered.

But these cogitations were but of a short continuance, they vanished with the hurry of her spirits, and were succeeded by others vastly different and ruinous.—All the charms of Beauplaisir came fresh into her mind; she languished, she almost died for another opportunity of conversing with him; and not all the admonitions of her discretion were effectual to oblige her to deny laying hold of that which offered itself the next night.—She depended on the strength of her virtue to bear her fate through trials more dangerous than she apprehended this to be, and never having been addressed by him as Lady—, was resolved to receive his devoirs as a town-mistress,<sup>7</sup> imagining a world of satisfaction to herself in engaging him in the character of such a one and in observing the surprise he would be in to find himself refused by a woman who he supposed granted her favors without exception.—Strange and unaccountable were the whimsies she was possessed of—wild and incoherent her desires—unfixed and undetermined her resolutions, but in that of seeing Beauplaisir in the manner she had lately done. As for her proceedings with him, or how a second time to escape him without discovering who she was, she could neither assure herself, nor whether or not in the last extremity she would do so.—Bent, however, on meeting him, whatever should be the consequence, she went out some hours before the time of going to the playhouse, and took lodgings in a house not very far from it, intending, that if he should insist on passing some part of the night with her, to carry him there, thinking she might with more security to her honor entertain him at a place where she was mistress than at any of his own choosing.

The appointed hour being arrived, she had the satisfaction to find his love in his assiduity. He was there before her; and nothing could be more tender than the manner in which he accosted her. But from the first moment she came in, to that of the play being done, he continued to assure her no consideration should prevail with him to part from her again, as she had done the night before; and she rejoiced to think she had taken that precaution of providing herself with a lodging, to which she thought she might invite him without running any risk, either of her virtue or reputation.—Having told him she would admit of his accompanying her home, he seemed perfectly satisfied; and leading her to the place, which was not above twenty houses distant, would have ordered a collation to be brought after them. But she would not permit it, telling him she was not one of those who suffered themselves to be treated at their own lodgings; and as soon she was come in, sent a servant belonging to the house to provide a very handsome supper and wine, and everything was served to table in a manner which showed the director neither wanted money, nor was ignorant how it should be laid out.

This proceeding, though it did not take from him the opinion that she was what she appeared to be, yet it gave him thoughts of her which he had not before.—He believed her a mistress, but believed her to be one of a superior rank, and began to imagine the possession of her would be much more expensive than at first he had expected. But not being of a humor to grudge anything for his pleasures, he gave himself no farther trouble than what were occasioned by fears of not having money enough to reach her price about him.

Supper being over, which was intermixed with a vast deal of amorous conversation, he began to explain himself more than he had done; and both by his words and behavior let her know he would not be denied that happiness the freedoms she allowed had made him hope.—It was in vain; she would have retracted the encouragement she had given.—In vain she endeavored to delay, till the next meeting, the fulfilling of his wishes.—She had now gone too far to retreat.—He was bold;—he was resolute. She fearful—confused, altogether unprepared to resist in such encounters, and rendered more so by the extreme liking she had to him.—Shocked, however, at the apprehension of really losing her honor, she struggled all she could, and was just going to reveal the whole secret of her name and quality, when the thoughts of the liberty he had taken with her, and those he still continued to prosecute, prevented her, with representing the danger of being exposed, and the whole affair made a theme for public ridicule.—Thus much, indeed, she told him, that she was a virgin, and had assumed this manner of behavior only to engage him. But that he little regarded, or if he had, would have been far from obliging him to desist;—nay, in the present burning eagerness of desire, 'tis probable, that had he been acquainted both with who and what she really was, the knowledge of her birth would not have influenced him with respect sufficient to have curbed the wild exuberance of his luxurious wishes, or made him in that longing, that impatient moment, change the form of his addresses. In fine, she was undone; and he gained a victory, so highly rapturous, that had he known over whom, scarce could he have triumphed more. Her tears, however, and the distraction she appeared in, after the ruinous ecstasy was past, as it heightened his wonder, so it abated his satisfaction.—He could not imagine for what reason a woman, who, if she intended not to be a mistress, had counterfeited the part of one, and taken so much pains to engage him, should lament a consequence which she could not but expect, and till the last test, seemed inclinable to grant; and was both surprised and troubled at the mystery.—He omitted nothing that he thought might make her easy; and still retaining an opinion that the hope of interest<sup>8</sup> had been the chief motive which had led her to act in the manner she had done, and believing that she might know so little of him as to suppose, now she had nothing left to give, he might not make that recompense she expected for her favors: to put her out of that pain, he pulled out of his pocket a purse of gold, entreating her to accept of that as an earnest of what he intended to do for her; assuring her, with ten thousand protestations, that he would spare nothing which his whole estate could purchase, to procure her content and happiness. This treatment made her quite forget the part she had assumed, and throwing it from her with an air of disdain, Is this a reward (said she) for condescensions,<sup>9</sup> such as I have yielded to?—Can all the wealth you are possessed of make a reparation for my loss of honor?

—Oh! no, I am undone beyond the power of heaven itself to help me!—She uttered many more such exclamations; which the amazed Beauplaisir heard without being able to reply to, till by degrees sinking from that rage of temper, her eyes resumed their softening glances, and guessing at the consternation he was in, No, my dear Beauplaisir, (added she) your love alone can compensate for the shame you have involved me in; be you sincere and constant, and I hereafter shall, perhaps, be satisfied with my fate, and forgive myself the folly that betrayed me to you.

Beauplaisir thought he could not have a better opportunity than these words gave him of inquiring who she was, and wherefore she had feigned herself to be of a profession which he was now convinced she was not; and after he had made her a thousand vows of an affection as inviolable and ardent as she could wish to find in him, entreated she would inform him by what means his happiness had been brought about, and also to whom he was indebted for the bliss he had enjoyed.—Some remains of yet unextinguished modesty, and sense of shame, made her blush exceedingly at this demand; but recollecting herself in a little time, she told him so much of the truth, as to what related to the frolic she had taken of satisfying her curiosity in what manner mistresses, of the sort she appeared to be, were treated by those who addressed them; but forbore discovering her true name and quality, for the reasons she had done before, resolving, if he boasted of this affair, he should not have it in his power to touch her character. She therefore said she was the daughter of a country gentleman, who was come to town to buy clothes, and that she was called Fantomina. He had no reason to distrust the truth of this story, and was therefore satisfied with it; but did not doubt by the beginning of her conduct, but that in the end she would be in reality the thing she so artfully had counterfeited; and had good nature enough to pity the misfortunes he imagined would be her lot. But to tell her so, or offer his advice in that point, was not his business, at least as yet.

They parted not till towards morning; and she obliged him to a willing vow of visiting her the next day at three in the afternoon. It was too late for her to go home that night, therefore she contented herself with lying there. In the morning she sent for the woman of the house to come up to her; and easily perceiving, by her manner, that she was a woman who might be influenced by gifts, made her a present of a couple of broad pieces,<sup>1</sup> and desired her, that if the gentleman who had been there the night before should ask any questions concerning her, that he should be told, she was lately come out of the country, had lodged there about a fortnight, and that her name was Fantomina. I shall (also added she) lie but seldom here; nor, indeed, ever come but in those times when I expect to meet him. I would, therefore, have you order it so, that he may think I am but just gone out, if he should happen by any accident to call when I am not here; for I would not, for the world, have him imagine I do not constantly lodge here. The landlady assured her she would do everything as she desired, and gave her to understand she wanted not<sup>2</sup> the gift of secrecy.

Everything being ordered at this home for the security of her reputation, she repaired to the other, where she easily excused to an unsuspecting aunt, with whom she boarded, her having been abroad all night, saying, she went with a gentleman and his lady in a barge to a little country seat of theirs up the river, all of them designing to return the same evening; but that one of the bargemen happening to be taken ill on the sudden, and no other waterman to be got that night, they were obliged to tarry till morning. Thus did this lady's wit and vivacity assist her in all but where it was most needful.—She had discernment to foresee and avoid all those ills which might attend the loss of her reputation, but was wholly blind to those of the ruin of her virtue; and having managed her affairs so as to secure the one, grew perfectly easy with the remembrance she had forfeited the other.—The more she reflected on the merits of Beauplaisir, the more she excused herself for what she had done; and the prospect of that continued bliss she expected to share with him took from her all remorse for having engaged in an affair which promised her so much satisfaction, and in which she found not the least danger of misfortune.—If he is really (said she, to herself) the faithful, the constant lover he has sworn to be, how charming will be our amour?—And if he should be false, grow satiated, like other men, I shall but, at the worst, have the private vexation of knowing I have lost him;—the intrigue being a secret, my disgrace will be so too.—I shall hear no whispers as I pass,—She is forsaken.—The odious word forsaken will never wound my ears; nor will my wrongs excite either the mirth or pity of the talking world.—It would not be even in the power of my undoer himself to triumph over me; and while he laughs at, and perhaps despises the fond, the yielding Fantomina, he will revere and esteem the virtuous, the reserved lady.—In this manner did she applaud her own conduct, and exult with the imagination that she had more prudence than all her sex beside. And it must be confessed, indeed, that she preserved an economy<sup>3</sup> in the management of this intrigue beyond what almost any woman but herself ever did: in the first place, by making no person in the world a confidant in it; and in the next, in concealing from Beauplaisir himself the knowledge who she was; for though she met him three or four days in a week at that lodging she had taken for that purpose, yet as much as he employed her time and thoughts, she was never missed from any assembly she had been accustomed to frequent.—The business of her love has engrossed her till six in the evening, and before seven she has been dressed in a different habit, and in another place.—Slippers, and a night-gown loosely flowing, has been the garb in which he has left the languishing Fantomina;—laced and adorned with all the blaze of jewels has he, in less than an hour after, beheld at the royal chapel, the palace gardens, drawing-room, opera, or play, the haughty awe-inspiring lady.—A thousand times has he stood amazed at the prodigious likeness between his little mistress and this court beauty; but was still as far from imagining they were the same as he was the first hour he had accosted her in the playhouse, though it is not impossible but that her resemblance to this celebrated lady might keep his inclination alive something longer than otherwise they would have been; and that it was to the thoughts of this (as he supposed) unenjoyed charmer she owed in great measure the vigor of his latter caresses.

But he varied not so much from his sex as to be able to prolong desire to any great length after possession. The rifled charms of Fantomina soon lost their poignancy,<sup>4</sup> and grew tasteless and insipid; and when the season of the year inviting the company to the Bath,<sup>5</sup> she offered to accompany him, he made an excuse to go without her. She easily perceived his coldness, and the reason why he pretended her going would be inconvenient, and endured as much from the discovery as any of her sex could do. She dissembled it, however, before him, and took her leave of him with the show of no other concern than his absence occasioned. But this she did to take from him all suspicion of her following him, as she intended, and had already laid a scheme for.—From her first finding out that he designed to leave her behind, she plainly saw it was for no other reason than that being tired of her conversation, he was willing to be at liberty to pursue new conquests; and wisely considering that complaints, tears, swoonings, and all the extravagancies which women make use of in such cases have little prevalence over a heart inclined to rove, and only serve to render those who practice them more contemptible, by robbing them of that beauty which alone can bring back the fugitive lover, she resolved to take another course; and remembering the height of transport she enjoyed when the agreeable Beauplaisir kneeled at her feet, imploring her first favors, she longed to prove the same again. Not but a woman of her beauty and accomplishments might have beheld a thousand in that condition Beauplaisir had been; but with her sex's modesty, she had not also thrown off another virtue equally valuable, though generally unfortunate, constancy. She loved Beauplaisir; it was only he whose solicitations could give her pleasure; and had she seen the whole species despairing, dying for her sake, it might, perhaps, have been a satisfaction to her pride, but none to her more tender inclination.—Her design was once more to engage him; to hear him sigh, to see him languish, to feel the strenuous pressures of his eager arms, to be compelled, to be sweetly forced to what she wished with equal ardor, was what she wanted, and what she had formed a stratagem to obtain, in which she promised herself success.

She no sooner heard he had left the town, than making a pretense to her aunt that she was going to visit a relation in the country, went towards Bath, attended but by two servants, who she found reasons to quarrel with on the road and discharged. Clothing herself in a habit she had brought with her, she forsook the coach and went into a wagon, in which equipage she arrived at Bath. The dress she was in was a round-eared cap, a short red petticoat, and a little jacket of gray stuff; all the rest of her accoutrements were answerable to<sup>6</sup> these, and joined with a broad country dialect, a rude unpolished air, which she, having been bred in these parts, knew very well how to imitate, with her hair and eye-brows blacked, made it impossible for her to be known, or taken for any other than what she seemed. Thus disguised did she offer herself to service in the house where Beauplaisir lodged, having made it her business to find out immediately where he was. Notwithstanding this metamorphosis she was still extremely pretty; and the mistress of the house happening at that time to want a maid, was very glad of the opportunity of taking her. She was presently<sup>7</sup> received into the family; and had a post in it (such as she would have chose, had she been left at her liberty), that of making the gentlemen's beds, getting them their breakfasts, and waiting on them in their chambers. Fortune in this exploit was extremely on her side; there were no others of the male sex in the house than an old gentleman who had lost the use of his limbs with the rheumatism, and had come thither for the benefit of the waters, and her beloved Beauplaisir; so that she was in no apprehensions of any amorous violence, but where she wished to find it. Nor were her designs disappointed. He was fired with the first sight of her; and though he did not presently take any farther notice of her than giving her two or three hearty kisses, yet she, who now understood that language but too well, easily saw they were the prelude to more substantial joys.—Coming the next morning to bring his chocolate, as he had ordered, he caught her by the pretty leg, which the shortness of her petticoat did not in the least oppose; then pulling her gently to him, asked her, how long she had been at service?—How many sweethearts she had? If she had ever been in love? and many other such questions, befitting one of the degree<sup>8</sup> she appeared to be. All which she answered with such seeming innocence, as more enflamed the amorous heart of him who talked to her. He compelled her to sit in his lap; and gazing on her blushing beauties, which, if possible, received addition from her plain and rural dress, he soon lost the power of containing himself.—His wild desires burst out in all his words and actions: he called her little angel, cherubim, swore he must enjoy her, though death were to be the consequence, devoured her lips, her breasts with greedy kisses, held to his burning bosom her half-yielding, half-reluctant body, nor suffered her to get loose till he had ravaged all, and glutted each rapacious sense with the sweet beauties of the pretty Celia, for that was the name she bore in this second expedition.—Generous as liberality itself to all who gave him joy this way, he gave her a handsome sum of gold, which she durst not now refuse, for fear of creating some mistrust, and losing the heart she so lately had regained; therefore taking it with an humble curtsy, and a well counterfeited show of surprise and joy, cried, O law, Sir! what must I do for all this? He laughed at her simplicity, and kissing her again, though less fervently than he had done before, bad her not be out of the way when he came home at night. She promised she would not, and very obediently kept her word.

His stay at Bath exceeded not a month; but in that time his supposed country lass had persecuted him so much with her fondness that in spite of the eagerness with which he first enjoyed her, he was at last grown more weary of her than he had been of Fantomina: which she perceiving, would not be troublesome, but quitting her service remained privately in the town till she heard he was on his return; and in that time provided herself of another disguise to carry on a third plot, which her inventing brain had furnished her with, once more to renew his twice-decayed ardors. The dress she had ordered to be made was such as widows wear in their first mourning, which, together with the most afflicted and penitential countenance that ever was seen, was no small alteration to her who used to seem all gaiety.—To add to this, her hair, which she was accustomed to wear very loose, both when Fantomina and Celia, was now tied back so straight, and her pinn<sup>9</sup>ers coming so very forward, that there was none of it to be seen. In fine, her habit and her air were so much changed, that she was not more difficult to be known in the rude country girl, than she was now in the sorrowful widow.

She knew that Beauplaisir came alone in his chariot to the Bath, and in the time of her being servant in the house where he lodged, heard nothing of anybody that was to accompany him to London, and hoped he would return in the same manner he had gone. She therefore hired horses and a man to attend her to an inn about ten miles on this side Bath, where having discharged them, she waited till the chariot should come by; which when it did, and she saw that he was alone in it, she called to him that drove it to stop a moment, and going to the door saluted the master with these words:

The distressed and wretched, Sir (said she), never fail to excite compassion in a generous mind; and I hope I am not deceived in my opinion that yours is such.—You have the appearance of a gentleman, and cannot, when you hear my story, refuse that assistance which is in your power to give to an unhappy woman, who without it may be rendered the most miserable of all created beings.

It would not be very easy to represent the surprise so odd an address created in the mind of him to whom it was made.—She had not the appearance of one who wanted charity; and what other favor she required he could not conceive; but telling her she might command anything in his power, gave her encouragement to declare herself in this manner. You may judge (resumed she), by the melancholy garb I am in, that I have lately lost all that ought to be valuable to womankind; but it is impossible for you to guess the greatness of my misfortune, unless you had known my husband, who was master of every perfection to endear him to a wife's affections.—But, notwithstanding I look on myself as the most unhappy of my sex in out-living him, I must so far obey the dictates of my discretion as to take care of the little fortune he left behind him, which being in the hands of a brother of his in London, will be all carried off to Holland, where he is going to settle; if I reach not the town before he leaves it, I am undone for ever.—To which end I left Bristol, the place where we lived, hoping to get a place in the stage<sup>1</sup> at Bath, but they were all taken up before I came; and being, by a hurt I got in a fall, rendered incapable of traveling any long journey on horseback, I have no way to go to London, and must be inevitably ruined in the loss of all I have on earth, without<sup>2</sup> you have good nature enough to admit me to take part of your chariot.

Here the feigned widow ended her sorrowful tale, which had been several times interrupted by a parenthesis of sighs and groans; and Beauplaisir, with a complaisant and tender air, assured her of his readiness to serve her in things of much greater consequence than what she desired of him; and told her it would be an impossibility of denying a place in his chariot to a lady, who he could not behold without yielding one in his heart. She answered the compliments he made her but with tears, which seemed to stream in such abundance from her eyes that she could not keep her handkerchief from her face one moment. Being come into the chariot, Beauplaisir said a thousand handsome things to persuade her from giving way to so violent a grief, which, he told her, would not only be destructive to her beauty, but likewise her health. But all his endeavors for consolation appeared ineffectual, and he began to think he should have but a dull journey, in the company of one who seemed so obstinately devoted to the memory of her dead husband that there was no getting a word from her on any other theme.—But bethinking himself of the celebrated story of the Ephesian matron,<sup>3</sup> it came into his head to make trial, she who seemed equally susceptible of sorrow, might not also be so too of love: and having began a discourse on almost every other topic, and finding her still incapable of answering, resolved to put it to the proof, if this would have no more effect to rouse her sleeping spirits.—With a gay air, therefore, though accompanied with the greatest modesty and respect, he turned the conversation, as though without design, on that joy-giving passion, and soon discovered that was indeed the subject she was best pleased to be entertained with; for on his giving her a hint to begin upon, never any tongue ran more voluble than hers, on the prodigious power it had to influence the souls of those possessed of it, to actions even the most distant from their intentions, principles, or humors.—From that she passed to a description of the happiness of mutual affection;—the unspeakable ecstasy of those who meet with equal ardency; and represented it in colors so lively, and disclosed by the gestures with which her words were accompanied, and the accent of her voice so true a feeling of what she said, that Beauplaisir, without being as stupid as he was really the contrary, could not avoid perceiving there were seeds of fire not yet extinguished in this fair widow's soul, which wanted but the kindling breath of tender sighs to light into a blaze.—He now thought himself as fortunate, as some moments before he had the reverse; and doubted not but that before they parted, he should find a way to dry the tears of this lovely mourner, to the satisfaction of them both. He did not, however, offer, as he had done to Fantomina and Celia, to urge his passion directly to her, but by a thousand little softening artifices, which he well knew how to use, gave her leave to guess he was enamored. When they came to the inn where they were to lie, he declared himself somewhat more freely, and perceiving she did not resent it past forgiveness, grew more encroaching still.—He now took the liberty of kissing away her tears, and catching the sighs as they issued from her lips; telling her if grief was infectious, he was resolved to have his share; protesting he would gladly exchange passions with her, and be content to bear her load of sorrow, if she would as willingly ease the burden of his love.—She said little in answer to the strenuous pressures with which at last he ventured to enfold her, but not thinking it decent, for the character she had assumed, to yield so suddenly, and unable to deny both his and her own inclinations, she counterfeited a fainting, and fell motionless upon his breast.—He had no great notion that she was in a real fit, and the room they supped in happening to have a bed in it, he took her in his arms and laid her on it, believing that whatever her distemper was, that was the most proper place to convey her to.—He laid himself down by her, and endeavored to bring her to herself; and she was too grateful to her kind physician at her returning sense, to remove from the posture he had put her in, without his leave.

It may, perhaps, seem strange that Beauplaisir should in such near intimacies continue still deceived. I know there are men who will swear it is an impossibility, and that no disguise could hinder them from knowing a woman they had once enjoyed. In answer to these scruples, I can only say, that besides the alteration which the change of dress made in her, she was so admirably skilled in the art of feigning that she had the power of putting on almost what face she pleased, and knew so exactly how to form her behavior to the character she represented that all the comedians<sup>4</sup> at both playhouses are infinitely short of her performances. She could vary her very glances, tune her voice to accents the most different imaginable from those in which she spoke when she appeared herself.—These aids from nature, joined to the wiles of art, and the distance between the places where the imagined Fantomina and Celia were, might very well prevent his having any thought that they were the same, or that the fair widow was either of them. It never so much as entered his head, and though he did fancy he observed in the face of the latter, features which were not altogether unknown to him, yet he could not recollect when or where he had known them;—and being told by her, that from her birth she had never removed from Bristol, a place where he never was, he rejected the belief of having seen her, and supposed his mind had been deluded by an idea of some other, whom she might have a resemblance of.

They passed the time of their journey in as much happiness as the most luxurious gratification of wild desires could make them; and when they came to the end of it, parted not without a mutual promise of seeing each other often.—He told her to what place she should direct a letter to him; and she assured him she would send to let him know where to come to her, as soon as she was fixed in lodgings.

She kept her promise; and charmed with the continuance of his eager fondness, went not home but into private lodgings, whence she wrote to him to visit her the first opportunity, and inquire for the Widow Bloomer.—She had no sooner dispatched this billet<sup>5</sup> than she repaired to the house where she had lodged as Fantomina, charging the people if Beauplaisir should come there, not to let him know she had been out of town. From thence she wrote to him, in a different hand, a long letter of complaint, that he had been so cruel in not sending one letter to her all the time he had been absent, entreated to see him, and concluded with subscribing herself his unalterably affectionate Fantomina. She received in one day answers to both these. The first contained these lines:

To the Charming Mrs. BLOOMER,

It would be impossible, my Angel! for me to express the thousandth part of that infinity of transport, the sight of your dear letter gave me.—Never was woman formed to charm like you: never did any look like you,—write like you,—bless like you;—nor did ever man adore as I do.—Since yesterday we parted, I have seemed a body without a soul; and had you not by this inspiring billet, gave me new life, I know not what by tomorrow I should have been.—I will be with you this evening about five.—O, 'tis an age till then!—But the cursed formalities of duty oblige me to dine with my lord—who never rises from table till that hour;—therefore adieu till then sweet lovely mistress of the soul and all the faculties of

Your most faithful,
BEAUPLAISIR.

The other was in this manner:

To the Lovely FANTOMINA,

If you were half so sensible as you ought of your own power of charming, you would be assured, that to be unfaithful or unkind to

you would be among the things that are in their very natures impossibilities.—It was my misfortune, not my fault, that you were not persecuted every post with a declaration of my unchanging passion; but I had unluckily forgot the name of the woman at whose house you are, and knew not how to form a direction that it might come safe to your hands.—And, indeed, the reflection how you might misconstrue my silence, brought me to town some weeks sooner than I intended—If you knew how I have languished to renew those blessings I am permitted to enjoy in your society, you would rather pity than condemn

Your most faithful,
BEAUPLAISIR.

P.S. I fear I cannot see you till tomorrow; some business has unluckily fallen out that will engross my hours till then.—Once more, my dear, Adieu.

Traitor! (cried she) as soon as she had read them, 'tis thus our silly, fond, believing sex are served when they put faith in man. So had I been deceived and cheated, had I like the rest believed, and sat down mourning in absence, and vainly waiting recovered tendernesses.—How do some women (continued she) make their life a hell, burning in fruitless expectations, and dreaming out their days in hopes and fears, then wake at last to all the horror of despair?—But I have outwitted even the most subtle of the deceiving kind, and while he thinks to fool me, is himself the only beguiled person.

She made herself, most certainly, extremely happy in the reflection on the success of her stratagems; and while the knowledge of his inconstancy and levity of nature kept her from having that real tenderness for him she would else have had, she found the means of gratifying the inclination she had for his agreeable person in as full a manner as she could wish. She had all the sweets of love, but as yet had tasted none of the gall, and was in a state of contentment which might be envied by the more delicate.

When the expected hour arrived, she found that her lover had lost no part of the fervency with which he had parted from her; but when the next day she received him as Fantomina, she perceived a prodigious difference; which led her again into reflections on the unaccountableness of men's fancies, who still<sup>6</sup> prefer the last conquest, only because it is the last.—Here was an evident proof of it; for there could not be a difference in merit, because they were the same person; but the Widow Bloomer was a more new acquaintance than Fantomina, and therefore esteemed more valuable. This, indeed, must be said of Beauplaisir, that he had a greater share of good nature than most of his sex, who, for the most part, when they are weary of an intrigue, break it entirely off, without any regard to the despair of the abandoned nymph. Though he retained no more than a bare pity and complaisance<sup>7</sup> for Fantomina, yet believing she loved him to an excess, would not entirely forsake her, though the continuance of his visits was now become rather a penance than a pleasure.

The Widow Bloomer triumphed some time longer over the heart of this inconstant, but at length her sway was at an end, and she sunk in this character to the same degree of tastelessness as she had done before in that of Fantomina and Celia.—She presently perceived it, but bore it as she had always done; it being but what she expected, she had prepared herself for it, and had another project in embryo which she soon ripened into action. She did not, indeed, complete it altogether so suddenly as she had done the others, by reason there must be persons employed in it; and the aversion she had to any confidants in her affairs, and the caution with which she had hitherto acted, and which she was still determined to continue, made it very difficult for her to find a way without breaking through that resolution to compass what she wished.—She got over the difficulty at last, however, by proceeding in a manner, if possible, more extraordinary than all her former behavior.—Muffling herself up in her hood one day, she went into the park about the hour when there are a great many necessitous gentlemen, who think themselves above doing what they call little things for a maintenance, walking in the Mall, to take a Camelion treat,<sup>8</sup> and fill their stomachs with air instead of meat. Two of those, who by their physiognomy she thought most proper for her purpose, she beckoned to come to her; and taking them into a walk more remote from company, began to communicate the business she had with them in these words: I am sensible, gentlemen (said she), that, through the blindness of fortune and partiality of the world, merit frequently goes unrewarded, and that those of the best pretensions meet with the least encouragement.—I ask your pardon (continued she), perceiving they seemed surprised, if I am mistaken in the notion that you two may, perhaps, be of the number of those who have reason to complain of the injustice of fate; but if you are such as I take you for, I have a proposal to make you which may be of some little advantage to you. Neither of them made any immediate answer, but appeared buried in consideration for some moments. At length, We should, doubtless, madam (said one of them), willingly come into any measures to oblige you, provided they are such as may bring us into no danger, either as to our persons or reputations. That which I require of you (resumed she), has nothing in it criminal. All that I desire is secrecy in what you are entrusted, and to disguise yourselves in such a manner as you cannot be known, if hereafter seen by the person on whom you are to impose.—In fine, the business is only an innocent frolic, but if blazed abroad might be taken for too great a freedom in me.—Therefore, if you resolve to assist me, here are five pieces to drink my health and assure you, that I have not discoursed you on an affair I design not to proceed in; and when it is accomplished fifty more lie ready for your acceptance. These words, and above all the money, which was a sum which, 'tis probable, they had not seen of a long time, made them immediately assent to all she desired, and press for the beginning of their employment. But things were not yet ripe for execution; and she told them that the next day they should be let into the secret, charging them to meet her in the same place at an hour she appointed. 'Tis hard to say, which of these parties went away best pleased; they, that fortune had sent them so unexpected a windfall; or she, that she had found persons who appeared so well qualified to serve her.

Indefatigable in the pursuit of whatsoever her humor was bent upon, she had no sooner left her new-engaged emissaries than she went in search of a house for the completing her project.—She pitched on one very large and magnificently furnished, which she hired by the week, giving them the money beforehand to prevent any inquiries. The next day she repaired to the park, where she met the punctual squires of low degree; and ordering them to follow her to the house she had taken, told them they must condescend to appear like servants, and gave each of them a very rich livery. Then writing a letter to Beauplaisir, in a character vastly different from either of those she had made use of as Fantomina, or the fair Widow Bloomer, ordered one of them to deliver it into his own hands, to bring back an answer, and to be careful that he sifted out nothing of the truth.—I do not fear (said she), that you should discover to him who I am, because that is a secret of which you yourselves are ignorant; but I would have you be so careful in your replies, that he may not think the concealment springs from any other reasons than your great integrity to your trust.—Seem therefore to know my whole affairs; and let your refusing to make him partaker in the secret appear to be only the effect of your zeal for my interest and reputation. Promises of entire fidelity on the one side, and reward on the other, being past, the messenger made what haste he could to the house of Beauplaisir; and being there told where he might find him, performed exactly the injunction that had been given him. But never astonishment exceeding that which Beauplaisir felt at the reading this billet, in which he found these lines:

To the All-conquering BEAUPLAISIR.

I imagine not that 'tis a new thing to you, to be told you are the greatest charm in nature to our sex. I shall therefore, not to fill up my letter with any impertinent praises on your wit or person, only tell you that I am infinite in love with both, and if you have a heart not too deeply engaged, should think myself the happiest of my sex in being capable of inspiring it with some tenderness.—There is but one thing in my power to refuse you, which is the knowledge of my name, which believing the sight of my face will render no secret, you must not take it ill that I conceal from you.—The bearer of this is a person I can trust; send by him your answer; but endeavor not to dive into the meaning of this mystery, which will be impossible for you to unravel, and at the same time very much disoblige me.—But that you may be in no apprehensions of being imposed on by a woman unworthy of your regard, I will venture to assure you, the first and greatest men in the kingdom would think themselves blessed to have that influence over me you have, though unknown to yourself acquired.—But I need not go about to raise your curiosity, by giving you any idea of what my person is; if you think fit to be satisfied, resolve to visit me tomorrow about three in the afternoon; and though my face is hid, you shall not want sufficient demonstration that she who takes these unusual measures to commence a friendship with you is neither old, nor deformed. Till then I am,

Yours,
INCOGNITA.

He had scarce come to the conclusion before he asked the person who brought it, from what place he came;—the name of the lady he served;—if she were a wife, or widow, and several other questions directly opposite to the directions of the letter; but silence would have availed him as much as did all those testimonies of curiosity. No Italian Bravo,<sup>9</sup> employed in a business of the like nature, performed his office with more artifice; and the impatient inquirer was convinced, that nothing but doing as he was desired could give him any light into the character of the woman who declared so violent a passion for him; and little fearing any consequence which could ensue from such an encounter, resolved to rest satisfied till he was informed of everything from herself, not imagining this Incognita varied so much from the generality of her sex as to be able to refuse the knowledge of anything to the man she loved with that transcendancy of passion she professed, and which his many successes with the ladies gave him encouragement enough to believe. He therefore took pen and paper, and answered her letter in terms tender enough for a man who had never seen the person to whom he wrote. The words were as follows:

To the Obliging and Witty INCOGNITA.

Though to tell me I am happy enough to be liked by a woman such, as by your manner of writing, I imagine you to be, is an honor which I can never sufficiently acknowledge, yet I know not how I am able to content myself with admiring the wonders of your wit alone. I am certain a soul like yours must shine in your eyes with a vivacity which must bless all they look on.—I shall, however, endeavor to restrain myself in those bounds you are pleased to set me, till by the knowledge of my inviolable fidelity, I may be thought worthy of gazing on that heaven I am now but to enjoy in contemplation.—You need not doubt my glad compliance with your obliging summons. There is a charm in your lines which gives too sweet an idea of their lovely author to be resisted.—I am all impatient for the blissful moment which is to throw me at your feet, and give me an opportunity of convincing you that I am,

Your everlasting slave,

BEAUPLAISIR.

Nothing could be more pleased than she to whom it was directed, at the receipt of this letter; but when she was told how inquisitive he had been concerning her character and circumstances, she could not forbear laughing heartily to think of the tricks she had played him, and applauding her own strength of genius and force of resolution, which by such unthought-of ways could triumph over her lover's inconstancy, and render that very temper,<sup>1</sup> which to other women is the greatest curse, a means to make herself more blessed.—Had he been faithful to me (said she, to herself), either as Fantomina, or Celia, or the Widow Bloomer, the most violent passion, if it does not change its object, in time will wither. Possession naturally abates the vigor of desire, and I should have had, at best, but a cold, insipid, husband-like lover in my arms; but by these arts of passing on him as a new mistress whenever the ardor, which alone makes love a blessing, begins to diminish for the former one, I have him always raving, wild, impatient, longing, dying.—O that all neglected wives and fond abandoned nymphs would take this method!—Men would be caught in their own snare, and have no cause to scorn our easy, weeping, wailing sex! Thus did she pride herself as if secure she never should have any reason to repent the present gaiety of her humor. The hour drawing near in which he was to come, she dressed herself in as magnificent a manner as if she were to be that night at a ball at court, endeavoring to repair the want of those beauties which the vizard<sup>2</sup> should conceal, by setting forth the others with the greatest care and exactness. Her fine shape, and air, and neck appeared to great advantage; and by that which was to be seen of her, one might believe the rest to be perfectly agreeable. Beauplaisir was prodigiously charmed, as well with her appearance as with the manner she entertained him. But though he was wild with impatience for the sight of a face which belonged to so exquisite a body, yet he would not immediately press for it, believing before he left her he should easily obtain that satisfaction.—A noble collation being over, he began to sue for the performance of her promise of granting everything he could ask, excepting the sight of her face, and knowledge of her name. It would have been a ridiculous piece of affectation in her to have seemed coy in complying with what she herself had been the first in desiring. She yielded without even a show of reluctance: and if there be any true felicity in an amour such as theirs, both here enjoyed it to the full. But not in the height of all their mutual raptures could he prevail on her to satisfy his curiosity with the sight of her face. She told him that she hoped he knew so much of her as might serve to convince him she was not unworthy of his tenderest regard; and if he could not content himself with that which she was willing to reveal, and which was the conditions of their meeting, dear as he was to her, she would rather part with him for ever than consent to gratify an inquisitiveness which, in her opinion, had no business with his love. It was in vain that he endeavored to make her sensible of her mistake; and that this restraint was the greatest enemy imaginable to the happiness of them both. She was not to be persuaded, and he was obliged to desist his solicitations, though determined in his mind to compass what he so ardently desired, before he left the house. He then turned the discourse wholly on the violence of the passion he had for her; and expressed the greatest discontent in the world at the apprehensions of being separated;—swore he could dwell for ever in her arms, and with such an undeniable earnestness pressed to be permitted to tarry with her the whole night, that had she been less charmed with his renewed eagerness of desire, she scarce would have had the power of refusing him; but in granting this request, she was not without a thought that he had another reason for making it besides the extremity of his passion, and had it immediately in her head how to disappoint him.

The hours of repose being arrived, he begged she would retire to her chamber; to which she consented, but obliged him to go to bed first; which he did not much oppose, because he supposed she would not lie in her mask, and doubted not but the morning's dawn would bring the wished discovery.—The two imagined servants ushered him to his new lodging; where he lay some moments in all the perplexity imaginable at the oddness of this adventure. But she suffered not these cogitations to be of any long continuance. She came, but came in the dark; which being no more than he expected by the former part of her proceedings, he said nothing of; but as much satisfaction as he found in her embraces, nothing ever longed for the approach of day with more impatience than he did. At last it came; but how great was his disappointment, when by the noises he heard in the street, the hurry of the coaches, and the cries of penny-merchants,<sup>3</sup> he was convinced it was night nowhere but with him? He was still in the same darkness as before; for she had taken care to blind the windows in such a manner that not the least chink was left to let in day.—He complained of her behavior in terms that she would not have been able to resist yielding to, if she had not been certain it would have been the ruin of her passion.—She therefore answered him only as she had done before; and getting out of the bed from him, flew out of the room with too much swiftness for him to have overtaken her, if he had attempted it. The moment she left him, the two attendants entered the chamber, and plucking down the implements which had screened him from the knowledge of that which he so much desired to find out, restored his eyes once more to day.—They attended to assist him in dressing, brought him tea, and by their obsequiousness, let him see there was but one thing which the mistress of them would not gladly oblige him in.—He was so much out of humor, however, at the disappointment of his curiosity, that he resolved never to make a second visit.—Finding her in an outer room, he made no scruple of expressing the sense he had of the little trust she reposed in him, and at last plainly told her, he could not submit to receive obligations from a lady who thought him incapable of keeping a secret, which she made no difficulty of letting her servants into.—He resented,—he once more entreated,—he said all that man could do, to prevail on her to unfold the mystery; but all his adjurations were fruitless; and he went out of the house determined never to re-enter it, till she should pay the price of his company with the discovery of her face and circumstances.—She suffered him to go with this resolution, and doubted not but he would recede from it, when he reflected on the happy moments they had passed together; but if he did not, she comforted herself with the design of forming some other stratagem, with which to impose on him a fourth time.

She kept the house and her gentlemen-equipage for about a fortnight, in which time she continued to write to him as Fantomina and the Widow Bloomer, and received the visits he sometimes made to each; but his behavior to both was grown so cold, that she began to grow as weary of receiving his now insipid caresses as he was of offering them. She was beginning to think in what manner she should drop these two characters, when the sudden arrival of her mother, who had been some time in a foreign country, obliged her to put an immediate stop to the course of her whimsical adventures.—

That lady, who was severely virtuous, did not approve of many things she had been told of the conduct of her daughter; and though it was not in the power of any person in the world to inform her of the truth of what she had been guilty of, yet she heard enough to make her keep her afterwards in a restraint, little agreeable to her humor, and the liberties to which she had been accustomed.

But this confinement was not the greatest part of the trouble of this now afflicted lady. She found the consequences of her amorous follies would be, without almost a miracle, impossible to be concealed.—She was with child; and though she would easily have found means to have screened even this from the knowledge of the world, had she been at liberty to have acted with the same unquestionable authority over herself as she did before the coming of her mother, yet now all her invention was at a loss for a stratagem to impose on a woman of her penetration.—By eating little, lacing prodigious straight, and the advantage of a great hoop-petticoat, however, her bigness was not taken notice of, and, perhaps, she would not have been suspected till the time of her going into the country, where her mother designed to send her, and from whence she intended to make her escape to some place where she might be delivered with secrecy, if the time of it had not happened much sooner than she expected.—A ball being at court, the good old lady was willing she should partake of the diversion of it as a farewell to the town.—It was there she was seized with those pangs, which none in her condition are exempt from.—She could not conceal the sudden rack<sup>4</sup> which all at once invaded her; or had her tongue been mute, her wildly rolling eyes, the distortion of her features, and the convulsions which shook her whole frame, in spite of her, would have revealed she labored under some terrible shock of nature.—Everybody was surprised, everybody was concerned, but few guessed at the occasion.—Her mother grieved beyond expression, doubted not but she was struck with the hand of death; and ordered her to be carried home in a chair,<sup>5</sup> while herself followed in another.—A physician was immediately sent for; but he presently perceiving what was her distemper, called the old lady aside and told her, it was not a doctor of his sex, but one of her own, her daughter stood in need of.—Never was astonishment and horror greater than that which seized the soul of this afflicted parent at these words. She could not for a time believe the truth of what she heard; but he insisting on it, and conjuring her to send for a midwife, she was at length convinced of it.—All the pity and tenderness she had been for some moment before possessed of now vanished, and were succeeded by an adequate<sup>6</sup> shame and indignation.—She flew to the bed where her daughter was lying, and telling her what she had been informed of, and which she was now far from doubting, commanded her to reveal the name of the person whose insinuations<sup>7</sup> had drawn her to this dishonor.—It was a great while before she could be brought to confess anything, and much longer before she could be prevailed on to name the man whom she so fatally had loved; but the rack of nature growing more fierce, and the enraged old lady protesting no help should be afforded her while she persisted in her obstinacy, she, with great difficulty and hesitation in her speech, at last pronounced the name of Beauplaisir. She had no sooner satisfied her weeping mother, than that sorrowful lady sent messengers at the same time for a midwife, and for that gentleman who had occasioned the other's being wanted.—He happened by accident to be at home, and immediately obeyed the summons, though prodigiously surprised what business a lady so much a stranger to him could have to impart.—But how much greater was his amazement, when taking him into her closet,<sup>8</sup> she there acquainted him with her daughter's misfortune, of the discovery she had made, and how far he was concerned in it?—All the idea one can form of wild astonishment was mean to what he felt.—He assured her that the young lady her daughter was a person whom he had never, more than at a distance, admired;—that he had indeed spoke to her in public company, but that he never had a thought which tended to her dishonor.—His denials, if possible, added to the indignation she was before enflamed with.—She had no longer patience; and carrying him into the chamber, where she was just delivered of a fine girl, cried out, I will not be imposed on: the truth by one of you shall be revealed.—Beauplaisir being brought to the bedside, was beginning to address himself to the lady in it, to beg she would clear the mistake her mother was involved in; when she, covering herself with the clothes, and ready to die a second time with the inward agitations of her soul, shrieked out, Oh, I am undone!—I cannot live, and bear this shame!—But the old lady believing that now or never was the time to dive into the bottom of this mystery, forcing her to rear her head, told her she should not hope to escape the scrutiny of a parent she had dishonored in such a manner, and pointing to Beauplaisir, Is this the gentleman (said she), to whom you owe your ruin? or have you deceived me by a fictitious tale? Oh! no (resumed the trembling creature), he is indeed the innocent cause of my undoing.—Promise me your pardon (continued she), and I will relate the means. Here she ceased, expecting what she would reply, which, on hearing Beauplaisir cry out, What mean you, madam? I your undoing, who never harbored the least design on you in my life, she did in these words: Though the injury you have done your family (said she) is of a nature which cannot justly hope forgiveness, yet be assured, I shall much sooner excuse you when satisfied of the truth than while I am kept in a suspense, if possible, as vexatious as the crime itself is to me. Encouraged by this she related the whole truth. And 'tis difficult to determine if Beauplaisir, or the lady, were most surprised at what they heard; he, that he should have been blinded so often by her artifices; or she, that so young a creature should have the skill to make use of them. Both sat for some time in a profound reverie; till at length she broke it first in these words: Pardon, sir (said she), the trouble I have given you. I must confess it was with a design to oblige you to repair the supposed injury you had done this unfortunate girl, by marrying her, but now I know not what to say.—The blame is wholly hers, and I have nothing to request further of you, than that you will not divulge the distracted folly she has been guilty of.—He answered her in terms perfectly polite; but made no offer of that which, perhaps, she expected, though could not, now informed of her daughter's proceedings, demand. He assured her, however, that if she would commit the newborn lady to his care, he would discharge it faithfully. But neither of them would consent to that; and he took his leave, full of cogitations, more confused than ever he had known in his whole life. He continued to visit there, to inquire after her health every day; but the old lady perceiving there was nothing likely to ensue from these civilities but, perhaps, a renewing of the crime, she entreated him to refrain; and as soon as her daughter was in a condition, sent her to a monastery in France, the abbess of which had been her particular friend. And thus ended an intrigue which, considering the time it lasted, was as full of variety as any, perhaps, that many ages has produced.

The Rise of the Novel

The origins of English literature's most popular form, the novel, have long been seen to lie in the eighteenth century. Critics have traced a great tradition arising from the fictions of Daniel Defoe, Samuel Richardson, Henry Fielding, and others, carrying forward to the nineteenth century in the work of Jane Austen and Walter Scott, George Eliot and Charles Dickens, to the outstanding experiments in fiction in the twentieth, and the diverse novelistic voices heard in English in the twenty-first. Yet there have been prose fictions in literature for millennia, from works of antiquity such as the Satyricon by the Roman author Petronius (ca. 27–66 C.E.) to Don Quixote (1605, 1616) by the Spanish master Miguel de Cervantes (1547–1616). As far back as the sixteenth century, English fictions were sometimes called “novels” on their title pages (a term, initially signifying a short story about love, taken from Continental Europe). And many eighteenth-century works now classified as novels first appeared under other labels: tale, history, secret history, romance, “the life of,” or “the adventures of.” Why does this period's fiction feel more novelistic to readers of English now than the romances, fables, and other narratives that appeared centuries before? What changes in the conventions and subject matter of fictional prose, in literature's social contexts, and in modes of literary production and consumption led to the emergence in the eighteenth century of the novel as many now recognize it?

Scholars confronting these questions must face the sheer variety of eighteenth-century fictions. Autobiographical adventures that claim to be true, such as Aphra Behn's Oroonoko (1688; see p. 152) and Defoe's Robinson Crusoe (1719; see below), and parodies of such stories like Swift's Gulliver's Travels (1726; see p. 377), draw one strand of fictional narrative through outdoor settings as expansive as the globe. But more intimate stories of desire, seduction, and resistance also proliferated in the period, from tales of disguise and sexual curiosity such as Eliza Haywood's Fantomina (1725; see p. 650) to Samuel Richardson's revelations of private domestic spaces and the inner recesses of his characters' minds. Henry Fielding's flair for theatrical comedy and intricate plots, and his self-consciously literary style, enliven his masterpieces Joseph Andrews (1742) and Tom Jones (1749). After midcentury, the novel haunted Gothic castles or flowed with the tears and passions of sensibility, though often with ironic twists, as in Laurence Sterne's Tristram Shandy (1759–67) and A Sentimental Journey (1768). Frances Burney's novels interweave emotional plots of courtship with keen satirical accounts of elegant social mingling (or attempts at it), while those of Tobias Smollett practice a rougher satire and barrel through less refined settings. Fiction could also offer opportunities for explicit reflections on the meaning of life, as in Samuel Johnson's Rasselas (see p. 802). As the selection of works in the present volume shows, the eighteenth-century novel takes in so much—from the fantastic to the everyday, the narratively propulsive to the philosophically meditative, the talk of ordinary people to the sophisticated language of the great or the learned—that it has been a challenge to say what one thing it essentially is or does.

One distinctive feature noticed by some novel writers themselves about their works is the closeness of their plots and characters to readers' experiences of real life. Novels "come near us," William Congreve says in his essay early in this section, and are "not so distant from our belief" as the marvelous tales of romance that dominated prose fiction in earlier times. The critic Ian Watt, in his classic scholarly work The Rise of the Novel (1957), saw believability as the modern novel's dominant trait and called the ensemble of techniques that achieved it "formal realism," suited especially, he thought, to the practical tastes of a growing readership among the middle ranks of commercial Britain. Scholars of the novel in the decades after Watt's book have supplemented, qualified, and questioned his view by finding other motives shaping the novel form. Defoe's fictions not only grapple with life's hard, empirical facts but also heed the supernatural whisper of Providence and seek spiritual redemption; the scandalous tales and secret histories by writers such as Delarivier Manley (ca. 1670–1724) present the intrigues of the fabulously rich and powerful, not ordinary people. And the conventions of romance—a love requiring implausible coincidences to prevail, a birthmark that reveals the hero's true identity—never quite go away. The eighteenth-century novel includes a range of impulses much broader than what Watt's theory of formal realism first took into account. Celebrity gossip, religious inspiration, true (or half-true) crime, political allegories, ghost stories, and patterns for proper conduct variously “come near us” by engaging our aspirations, fears, and excited imaginations.

But the understanding in recent decades of the origins of the modern novel has most decisively been enhanced by recognizing the contributions of women authors to its success, widening Watt's focus on Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding. As novelists, women shaped the course of literature as they never had before. From Aphra Behn's fictions at the end of the seventeenth century, a tradition of British women's writing arose, including Manley and Haywood, Penelope Aubin (1679?–1738), Mary Davys (1674–1732), Elizabeth Rowe (1674–1737), Sarah Fielding (1710–1768), Sarah Scott (1720–1795), Charlotte Lennox (1730/31?–1804), and Burney—this list could be much expanded. Offering more than mere romantic tales, women fiction writers treated politics and religion, delivered tough-minded satire of women's credulity, men's cruelty, and the culture's unfair gender standards, and surveyed social ills and opportunities. Women authors helped establish the novel's unparalleled flexibility of theme and style, and their works sold at least as well as those of men.

The novel's success in the eighteenth century was buoyed by a growing industry that included booksellers (ancestors of present-day publishers), printers and all the labors associated with printing, and authors, catering to an increasingly literate populace of a Britain growing ever more prosperous. The publishing of works of all kinds dramatically increased: while a mere six thousand separate printed titles were published in the 1630s, the 1710s saw twenty-two thousand, and by the 1790s, about sixty thousand appeared. Readers not only bought but also borrowed books, from new institutions such as subscription libraries and circulating libraries (which both charged sometimes hefty membership fees). These terms were often used interchangeably, but the former tended to cultivate their collections to suit subscribers' tastes, and the latter bought and sold off their books as public demand changed—and hence offered many novels. (Free public libraries were virtually nonexistent.) A tale of multiple risings—of the middle classes, of literacy, of the book trades, and of new ways to disseminate books to the public—has provided a background for plotting the rise of the novel. And increasing literacy rates among women ensured they were decisively important as consumers of novels as well as producers—a fact often noted with alarm by commentators of the period. In his popular Sermons to Young Women (1766), James Fordyce inveighs that the preponderance of novels are “in their nature so shameful, in their tendency so pestiferous, and contain such rank treason against the royalty of Virtue, such horrible violation of all decorum, that she who can bear to peruse them must in her soul be a prostitute, let her reputation in life be what it will” (see below). The vigor of such denunciations testifies to a sense that the novel's power over women was growing.

Yet a complete picture of the novel's production, consumption, breadth of appeal, and social effects contains some surprising facts. Based on sales data and extant records from circulating libraries, we know men read novels at least as much as women, including ones with putatively “feminine” themes like love and courtship. Scholars have also challenged the idea that the “middling sort”—shopkeepers, apprentices, small tradesmen, and others connected with commerce—constituted the novel's principal readership. The gentry, and clergymen and professional men and their families, bought and borrowed the most novels. The rate of new novels' publication rose and fell unevenly through the century. Though Watt concentrated on novelists from the first half, a real surge of new novels came in the late 1780s, and bigger ones followed. And as copious as the publication of novels was in the period, it amounted to only a small proportion of booksellers' and libraries' offerings. Readers seemed to gravitate even more to sermons and other works of religious devotion, histories, legal and medical works, and especially periodicals.

A vibrant print culture nonetheless provided the energy and promise of financial gain that the novel needed to flourish. A form that arose "from below," inspired by readers' curiosities and the demands of a growing marketplace, the novel only slowly gained respectability and was by many considered merely an ephemeral entertainment. Unlike high, ancient genres like epic and tragedy, the novel did not have a tradition of learned criticism and commentary to draw on. Many of the most revealing remarks on the theory and practice of novelistic writing appear in what book historians call the paratext of published novels: prefaces, introductions, letters to the reader, dedications, and other matter ancillary to the main text. Outstanding examples of this kind of writing in the cluster that follows help bring the literary aspirations and professional and personal difficulties of the period's novelists to life. In them, authors beckon to their readers, anticipate criticisms, praise their own invention, and at times lie by insisting they are offering a true story. Some play with familiar literary labels when explaining what they seek to achieve in fiction, as when Fielding calls his Joseph Andrews “a comic epic-poem in prose”; others like Richardson extol their work’s high moral purpose.

As the century advanced, periodicals devoted to reviewing newly published works, including novels, were founded, such as the Monthly Review (1749–1845) and the Critical Review (1756–1817), of which Smollett was first editor. Other periodical essays, outstanding among them Samuel Johnson’s Rambler 4 (see below), theorize about the nature and value of fiction. The first full-length book in English discussing the history and significant examples of prose fiction, The Progress of Romance by Clara Reeve (see below), appeared in 1785. As a result of the work of critics and literary historians such as Reeve, the English novel as we know it began to take shape: its canon of great early texts, its foundational oppositions (between, for instance, feeling Richardson and ribald Fielding), its special relationship, evolving through the century, to women as authors and readers, and its grip on an enthusiastic if not always discriminating reading public. No form of English literature would have a more illustrious future.

WILLIAM CONGREVE

William Congreve (1670–1729) is famous for comedies that have been admired by audiences and readers since their first performances, such as Love for Love and The Way of the World (see p. 221). But his first publication was Incognita; or, Love and Duty Reconciled: A Novel (1692), which appeared when he was twenty-two under a pastoral pseudonym, Cleophil. After the title page proudly identifies its literary type, the preface extols the believability and nearness to ordinary human concerns of novels, in contrast to romances. Yet Congreve's remarks also exemplify the novel's way of leaning on other, more traditionally prestigious genres—in this case, comic drama—to gain literary credit for itself. The setting of Incognita in Italy and its love intrigues, masks, and mistaken identities recall motifs common in English stage comedy of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Though elegantly crafted, Incognita never entered the canon of English fiction. "I would rather praise it than read it," remarked Samuel Johnson in his Life of Congreve (1779). But its preface offers a vivid sense of how writers understood what the novel is, decades before the more celebrated fictions of Defoe, Fielding, and Richardson.

From The Preface to the Reader

* * * Romances are generally composed of the constant loves and invincible courages of heroes, heroines, kings and queens, mortals of the first rank, and so forth; where lofty language, miraculous contingencies, and impossible performances elevate and surprise the reader into a giddy delight, which leaves him flat upon the ground whenever he gives off,<sup>1</sup> and vexes him to think how he has suffered himself to be pleased and transported, concerned and afflicted at the several passages which he has read, viz. these knights' success to their damsels' misfortunes, and such like, when he is forced to be very well convinced that 'tis all a lie. Novels are of a more familiar nature; come near us, and represent to us intrigues in practice,<sup>2</sup> delight us with accidents and odd events, but not such as are wholly unusual or unprecedented, such which not being so distant from our belief bring also the pleasure nearer us. Romances give more of wonder, novels more delight. And with reverence be it spoken, and the parallel kept at a due distance, there is something of equality in the proportion which they bear in reference to one another, with that between comedy and tragedy; but the drama is the long extracted from<sup>3</sup> romance and history: 'tis the midwife to industry, and brings forth alive the conceptions of the brain. Minerva walks upon the stage before us, and we are more assured of the real presence of wit when it is delivered viva voce<sup>4</sup>—

Segnius irritant animos demissa per aurem,
Quam quae sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus, & quae
Ipse sibi tradit spectator.<sup>5</sup>—Horace.

Since all traditions must indisputably give place to<sup>6</sup> the drama, and since there is no possibility of giving that life to the writing or repetition of a story which it has in the action, I resolved in another beauty<sup>7</sup> to imitate dramatic writing, namely, in the design, contexture and result of the plot. I have not observed it before in a novel. Some I have seen begin with an unexpected accident, which has been the only surprising part of the story, cause enough to make the sequel<sup>8</sup> look flat, tedious, and insipid; for 'tis but reasonable the reader should expect it not to rise, at least to keep upon a level in the entertainment; for so he may be kept on in hopes that at some time or other it may mend; but the other is such a balk<sup>9</sup> to a man, 'tis carrying him up stairs to show him the dining room, and after forcing him to make a meal in the kitchen. This I have not only endeavored to avoid, but also have used a method for the contrary purpose. The design of the novel is obvious, after the first meeting of Aurelian and Hippolito with Incognita and Leonora,<sup>1</sup> and the difficulty is in bringing it to pass, maugre<sup>2</sup> all apparent obstacles, within the compass of two days. How many probable casualties<sup>3</sup> intervene in opposition to the main design, viz. of marrying two couple so oddly engaged in an intricate amour, I leave the reader at his leisure to consider; as also whether every obstacle does not in the progress of the story act as subservient to that purpose, which at first it seems to oppose. In a comedy this would be called the unity of action.<sup>4</sup>

DANIEL DEFOE

Daniel Defoe (1660–1731) had many careers and wrote in many forms and styles before he began, at the age of nearly sixty, to publish the sequence of works for which he is best remembered: prose “autobiographies” of figures with sensational lives, all claiming to be true, all eventually called novels by later generations of grateful readers. He was raised as a Presbyterian and educated at a Dissenting academy at Newington Green in north London. (Not conforming to the doctrines of the Church of England, he could not attend Cambridge or Oxford.) Through the 1680s and early 1690s, he pursued high-stakes business ventures and made risky investments, going bankrupt in 1692 for the spectacular sum of £17,000, and ended up in debtors’ prison. After his release, publishing his work took an increasingly large place among his business enterprises. His long, very popular satirical poem The True-Born Englishman (1701) defended his hero, the Protestant and Dutch king of England, William III, by pointing out that people of many faiths and nations have helped create English identity. His satire The Shortest Way with the Dissenters (1702) impersonated the bigotry against Nonconformists effectively enough to anger both sides: he endured prison and the pillory for it. In 1704, he launched The Review, a journal that criticized the government and commented on other topics of public interest, which he ran almost single-handedly until 1713. Soon, however, he was drafted into government service, working as a spy in England and Scotland. For the remainder of the 1710s, he wrote a lot—conduct books, political pamphlets, scandalous “secret histories”—though more was attributed to him, he complained, than he ever wrote. (Correctly identifying Defoe’s writings, many published anonymously, remains a thorny problem for scholars.)

In 1719, The Life and Strange Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe appeared, “Written by Himself,” the title page informs us.

Defoe had recognized the popularity of travel writing in his time and gave the public more of what it wanted, basing Crusoe on stories of famous actual castaways such as Alexander Selkirk. But a pamphlet almost immediately identified Defoe's tale as untrue and attributed it to him. His most famous fictional work thus entered the world not as a novel—a story acknowledging itself as invented, to be admired for its plot's probability and lifelike characters—but rather as something like a fraud. Defoe wrote fascinating but competing things about the truth of his fictions: Crusoe was, first, "a just history of fact"—then, while insisting again that it featured "fact" not fictional "romance," he defended "what may be called invention" in the story as justifiable because moral. The sequel, The Farther Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, came out the same year, and a final installment, The Serious Reflections of Robinson Crusoe (1720), offered mostly contemplative and religious musings. After Crusoe, Defoe produced more "autobiographies" that would come to be seen as classic English novels: Moll Flanders (1722), A Journal of the Plague Year (1722), and Roxana (1724), among others. But Robinson Crusoe remained his most popular work in Britain and worldwide, never receding from the public consciousness: by some measures, it was the best-selling novel of the 1750s, some twenty years after his death, running to six editions in that decade. In the 1770s and 1780s, booksellers and circulating libraries began openly designating Defoe's first-person biographies as imaginative fiction, and as his: the canon of his novels began to take shape, though scholars have occasionally doubted his authorship of nearly all of them except Crusoe.

The power of Robinson Crusoe, in its long history as a classic of world literature, lies in its way of connecting Crusoe's extraordinary circumstances to readers' ordinary fantasies and fears and in the large, near-mythic meanings that this connection suggests. Washing up on an uninhabited island, Crusoe excites the reader's basic sense of what is needed to survive in the world, any world, alone. He eventually creates, or imitates, a comfortable mode of life by assuming a range of roles—landowner and farm laborer, builder, tailor, cobbler, potter, soldier, miller of wheat and baker of bread—usually performed by an entire society. Economists from the eighteenth century on have used him as an allegory of, or foil to, society's division of labor, and its production and consumption of commodities. After building his world, he realizes he is not alone. First a single human footprint on the beach, then a scene of people of the islands that terrifies him, then his violent attack on them and acquisition from among them of his "man" and friend, Friday: all this has served as a parable of British colonialism and encounters with indigenous peoples. Throughout, Crusoe's hauntingly solitary spirituality, his straining to hear the voice of Providence and assure himself of his salvation, offers an image of religious experience in which readers have recognized themselves. Defoe sustains these large meanings not with lofty, learned disquisitions but with a propulsive style personalized to Crusoe. The prose builds and pushes forward like the wave that carries his body to his island. The momentum of the sentences and their sometimes chaotic way of taking in everything moving across the focus of narration—Crusoe's immediate consciousness—carry readers forward also, immersing them in his fictional yet vivid world. Often its details are so concretely haphazard that it seems the only motive to include them must be that they are true—like the "two shoes that were not fellows" washed ashore among his mates' former possessions. Due to Defoe's magnificently full realization of him and his predicament, Crusoe has become the rarest of literary creations: a symbol of the most broadly significant cultural and historical forces, and a unique personage, dynamic, individual, and vivid.

Written by Himself

From Preface

If ever the story of any private man's adventures in the world were worth making public, and were acceptable when published, the editor of this account thinks this will be so.

The wonders of this man's life exceed all that (he thinks) is to be found extant; the life of one man being scarce capable of a greater variety.

The story is told with modesty, with seriousness, and with a religious application of events to the uses to which wise men always apply them, viz. to the instruction of others by this example, and to justify and honor the wisdom of Providence in all the variety of our circumstances, let them happen how they will.

The editor believes the thing to be a just history of fact; neither is there any appearance of fiction in it. And however thinks, because all such things are dispatched,<sup>2</sup> that the improvement of it, as well to the diversion, as to the instruction of the reader, will be the same; and as such, he thinks, without farther compliments to the world, he does them a great service in the publication.

[CRUSOE WASHES ASHORE]

Nothing can describe the confusion of thought which I felt when I sunk into the water;<sup>3</sup> for though I swam very well, yet I could not deliver myself from the waves so as to draw breath, till that wave having driven me, or rather carried me a vast way on towards the shore, and having spent itself, went back, and left me upon the land almost dry, but half dead with the water I took in. I had so much presence of mind as well as breath left, that seeing myself nearer the mainland<sup>4</sup> than I expected, I got upon my feet, and endeavored to make on towards the land as fast as I could before another wave should return and take me up again. But I soon found it was impossible to avoid it; for I saw the sea come after me as high as a great hill, and as furious as an enemy, which I had no means or strength to contend with: my business was to hold my breath, and raise myself upon the water, if I could; and so, by swimming to preserve my breathing, and pilot myself towards the shore, if possible; my greatest concern now being that the sea, as it would carry me a great way towards the shore when it came on, might not carry me back again with it when it gave back towards the sea.

The wave that came upon me again buried me at once twenty or thirty foot deep in its own body, and I could feel myself carried with a mighty force and swiftness towards the shore a very great way; but I held my breath, and assisted myself to swim still forward with all my might. I was ready to burst with holding my breath, when, as I felt myself rising up, so, to my immediate relief, I found my head and hands shoot out above the surface of the water; and though it was not two seconds of time that I could keep myself so, yet it relieved me greatly, gave me breath and new courage. I was covered again with water a good while, but not so long but I held it out; and finding the water had spent itself, and began to return, I strook forward against the return of the waves, and felt ground again with my feet. I stood still a few moments to recover breath, and till the water went from me, and then took to my heels, and run with what strength I had farther towards the shore. But neither would this deliver me from the fury of the sea, which came pouring in after me again; and twice more I was lifted up by the waves and carried forwards as before, the shore being very flat.

The last time of these two had well near been fatal to me; for the sea having hurried me along as before, landed me, or rather dashed me against a piece of rock, and that with such force, as it left me senseless, and indeed helpless, as to my own deliverance; for the blow taking my side and breast, beat the breath as it were quite out of my body; and had it returned again immediately, I must have been strangled in the water; but I recovered a little before the return of the waves, and seeing I should be covered again with the water, I resolved to hold fast by a piece of the rock, and so to hold my breath, if possible, till the wave went back; now as the waves were not so high as at first, being nearer land, I held my hold till the wave abated, and then fetched another run, which brought me so near the shore that the next wave, though it went over me, yet did not so swallow me up as to carry me away; and the next run I took, I got to the mainland, where, to my great comfort, I clambered up the cliffs of the shore and sat me down upon the grass, free from danger, and quite out of the reach of the water.

I was now landed, and safe on shore, and began to look up and thank God that my life was saved, in a case wherein there was some minutes before scarce any room to hope. I believe it is impossible to express to the life<sup>5</sup> what the ecstasies and transports of the soul are, when it is so saved, as I may say, out of the very grave; and I do not wonder now at that custom, viz. that when a malefactor, who has the halter about his neck, is tied up, and just going to be turned off,<sup>6</sup> and has a reprieve brought to him: I say, I do not wonder that they bring a surgeon with it, to let him bleed that very moment they tell him of it, that the surprise may not drive the animal spirits<sup>7</sup> from the heart, and overwhelm him:

For sudden joys, like griefs, confound at first.<sup>8</sup>

I walked about on the shore lifting up my hands, and my whole being, as I may say, wrapped up in the contemplation of my deliverance; making a thousand gestures and motions which I cannot describe; reflecting upon all my comrades that were drowned, and that there should not be one soul saved but myself; for, as for them, I never saw them afterwards, or any sign of them, except three of their hats, one cap, and two shoes that were not fellows.

I cast my eyes to the stranded vessel, when the breach and froth of the sea being so big, I could hardly see it, it lay so far off, and considered, Lord! how was it possible I could get on shore?

After I had solaced my mind with the comfortable part of my condition, I began to look round me to see what kind of place I was in, and what was next to be done; and I soon found my comforts abate, and that in a word I had a dreadful deliverance; for I was wet, had no clothes to shift me,<sup>9</sup> nor anything either to eat or drink to comfort me, neither did I see any prospect before me but that of perishing with hunger, or being devoured by wild beasts; and that which was particularly afflicting to me was that I had no weapon either to hunt and kill any creature for my sustenance, or to defend myself against any other creature that might desire to kill me for theirs. In a word, I had nothing about me but a knife, a tobacco-pipe, and a little tobacco in a box; this was all my provision; and this threw me into terrible agonies of mind, that for a while I run about like a madman. Night coming upon me, I began with a heavy heart to consider what would be my lot if there were any ravenous beasts in that country, seeing at night they always come abroad for their prey.

All the remedy that offered to my thoughts at that time was to get up into a thick bushy tree like a fir, but thorny, which grew near me, and where I resolved to set all night, and consider the next day what death I should die, for as yet I saw no prospect of life. I walked about a furlong<sup>1</sup> from the shore, to see if I could find any fresh water to drink, which I did, to my great joy; and having drank and put a little tobacco into my mouth to prevent hunger, I went to the tree, and getting up into it, endeavored to place myself so, as that if I should sleep I might not fall; and having cut me a short stick, like a truncheon, for my defense, I took up my lodging, and having been excessively fatigued, I fell fast asleep, and slept as comfortably as, I believe, few could have done in my condition, and found myself more refreshed with it, than I think I ever was on such an occasion.

When I waked it was broad day, the weather clear, and the storm abated, so that the sea did not rage and swell as before. But that which surprised me most was that the ship was lifted off in the night from the sand where she lay, by the swelling of the tide, and was driven up almost as far as the rock which I at first mentioned, where I had been so bruised by the wave dashing me against it; this being within about a mile from the shore where I was, and the ship seeming to stand upright still, I wished myself on board, that at least I might save some necessary things for my use.

When I came down from my apartment in the tree, I looked about me again, and the first thing I found was the boat,<sup>2</sup> which lay as the wind and the sea had tossed her up upon the land, about two miles on my right hand. I walked as far as I could upon the shore to have got to her; but found a neck or inlet of water between me and the boat which was about half a mile broad; so I came back for the present, being more intent upon getting at the ship, where I hoped to find something for my present subsistence.

A little after noon I found the sea very calm, and the tide ebbed so far out, that I could come within a quarter of a mile of the ship; and here I found a fresh renewing of my grief; for I saw evidently, that if we had kept on board we had been all safe, that is to say, we had all got safe on shore, and I had not been so miserable as to be left entirely destitute of all comfort and company as I now was; this forced tears from my eyes again, but as there was little relief in that, I resolved, if possible, to get to the ship, so I pulled off my clothes, for the weather was hot to extremity, and took the water; but when I came to the ship, my difficulty was still greater to know how to get on board, for as she lay aground, and high out of the water, there was nothing within my reach to lay hold of. I swam round her twice, and the second time I spied a small piece of rope, which I wondered I did not see at first, hang down by the fore-chains so low, as that with great difficulty I got hold of it, and by the help of that rope I got up into the fore-castle of the ship. Here I found that the ship was bulged,<sup>3</sup> and had a great deal of water in her hold, but that she lay so on the side of a bank of hard sand, or rather earth, that her stern lay lifted up upon the bank, and her head low almost to the water; by this means all her quarter<sup>4</sup> was free, and all that was in that part was dry; for you may be sure my first work was to search and to see what was spoiled and what was free; and first I found that all the ship's provisions were dry and untouched by the water, and being very well disposed to eat, I went to the bread room and filled my pockets with biscuit, and eat it as I went about other things, for I had no time to lose. I also found some rum in the great cabin, of which I took a large dram,<sup>5</sup> and which I had indeed need enough of to spirit me for what was before me. Now I wanted nothing but a boat to furnish myself with many things which I foresaw would be very necessary to me.

It was in vain to sit still and wish for what was not to be had, and this extremity roused my application; we had several spare yards, and two or three large spars<sup>6</sup> of wood, and a spare topmast or two in the ship; I resolved to fall to work with these, and I flung as many of them overboard as I could manage for their weight, tying every one with a rope that they might not drive away; when this was done I went down the ship's side, and pulling them to me, I tied four of them fast together at both ends as well as I could in the form of a raft, and laying two or three short pieces of plank upon them crossways, I found I could walk upon it very well, but that it was not able to bear any great weight, the pieces being too light; so I went to work, and with the carpenter's saw I cut a spare topmast into three lengths, and added them to my raft, with a great deal of labor and pains, but hope of furnishing myself with necessities encouraged me to go beyond what I should have been able to have done upon another occasion.

My raft was now strong enough to bear any reasonable weight; my next care was what to load it with, and how to preserve what I laid upon it from the surf of the sea; but I was not long considering this. I first laid all the plank or boards upon it that I could get, and having considered well what I most wanted, I first got three of the seamen's chests, which I had broken open and emptied, and lowered them down upon my raft; the first of these I filled with provision—viz. bread, rice, three Dutch cheeses, five pieces of dried goat's flesh which we lived much upon, and a little remainder of European corn,<sup>7</sup> which had been laid by for some fowls which we brought to sea with us, but the fowls were killed. There had been some barley and wheat together, but to my great disappointment, I found afterwards that the rats had eaten or spoiled it all. As for liquors, I found several cases of bottles belonging to our skipper, in which were some cordial waters, and in all about five or six gallons of rack.<sup>8</sup> These I stowed by themselves, there being no need to put hem into the chest, nor no room for them. While I was doing this, I found the tide began to flow, though very calm; and I had the mortification to see my coat, shirt, and waistcoat, which I had left on shore, upon the sand swim away. As for my breeches, which were only linen and open-kneed, I swam on board in them and my stockings. However this put me upon rummaging for clothes, of which I found enough, but took no more than I wanted for present use, for I had others things which my eye was more upon, as first tools to work with on shore, and it was after long searching that I found out the carpenter's chest, which was indeed a very useful prize to me, and much more valuable than a ship-loading of gold would have been at that time; I got it down to my raft, even whole as it was, without losing time to look into it, for I knew in general what it contained.

My next care was for some ammunition and arms; there were two very good fowling-pieces<sup>9</sup> in the great cabin, and two pistols. These I secured first, with some powder-horns, and a small bag of shot, and two old rusty swords. I knew there were three barrels of powder in the ship, but knew not where our gunner had stowed them; but with much search I found them, two of them dry and good, the third had taken water; those two I got to my raft with the arms, and now I thought myself pretty well freighted, and began to think how I should get to shore with them, having neither sail, oar, or rudder, and the least capful of wind would have upset all my navigation.

I had three encouragements, 1. A smooth, calm sea, 2. The tide rising and setting in to the shore, 3. What little wind there was blew me towards the land. And thus, having found two or three broken oars belonging to the boat and besides the tools which were in the chest, I found two saws, an axe, and a hammer; and with this cargo I put to sea. For a mile or thereabouts my raft went very well, only that I found it drive a little distant from the place where I had landed before; by which I perceived that there was some indraft of the water, and consequently I hoped to find some creek or river there, which I might make use of as a port to get to land with my cargo.

As I imagined, so it was, there appeared before me a little opening of the land, and I found a strong current of the tide set into it; so I guided my raft as well as I could to keep in the middle of the stream. But here I had like to have suffered a second shipwreck, which, if I had, I think verily would have broken my heart, for knowing nothing of the coast, my raft run aground at one end of it upon a shoal, and not being aground at the other end, it wanted but<sup>1</sup> a little that all my cargo had slipped off towards the end that was afloat, and so fallen into the water. I did my utmost by setting my back against the chests, to keep them in their places, but could not thrust off the raft with all my strength, neither durst I stir from the posture I was in, but holding up the chests with all my might, stood in that manner near half an hour, in which time the rising of the water brought me a little more upon a level, and a little after, the water still rising, my raft floated again, and I thrust her off with the oar I had, into the channel, and then driving up higher, I at length found myself in the mouth of a little river, with land on both sides, and a strong current of tide running up. I looked on both sides for a proper place to get to shore, for I was not willing to be driven too high up the river, hoping in time to see some ship at sea, and therefore resolved to place myself as near the coast as I could.

At length I spied a little cove on the right shore of the creek, to which with great pain and difficulty I guided my raft, and at last got so near as that, reaching ground with my oar, I could thrust her directly in. But here I had like to have dipped all my cargo in the sea again; for that shore lying pretty steep, that is to say sloping, there was no place to land, but where one end of my float, if it run on shore, would lie so high, and the other sink lower as before, that it would endanger my cargo again. All that I could do was to wait till the tide was at the highest, keeping the raft with my oar like an anchor to hold the side of it fast to the shore, near a flat piece of ground, which I expected the water would flow over; and so it did. As soon as I found water enough, for my raft drew about a foot water,<sup>2</sup> I thrust her on upon that flat piece of ground, and there fastened or moored her by sticking my two broken oars into the ground, one on one side near the one end, and one on the other side near the other end; and thus I lay till the water ebbed away, and left my raft and all my cargo safe on shore.

My next work was to view the country, and seek a proper place for my habitation, and where to stow my goods to secure them from whatever might happen; where I was I yet knew not, whether on the continent or on an island, whether inhabited or not inhabited, whether in danger of wild beasts or not. There was a hill not above a mile from me, which rose up very steep and high, and which seemed to overtop some other hills which lay as in a ridge from it northward. I took out one of the fowling pieces, and one of the pistols, and a horn of powder; and thus armed I travelled for discovery up to the top of that hill, where after I had with great labor and difficulty got to the top, I saw my fate to my great affliction, (viz.) that I was in an island environed every way with the sea, no land to be seen, except some rocks which lay a great way off; and two small islands less than this, which lay about three leagues<sup>3</sup> to the west.

I found also that the island I was in was barren, and, as I saw good reason to believe, uninhabited, except by wild beasts, of whom however I saw none, yet I saw abundance of fowls, but knew not their kinds, neither when I killed them could I tell what was fit for food, and what not; at my coming back, I shot at a great bird which I saw sitting upon a tree on the side of a great wood. I believe it was the first gun that had been fired there since the creation of the world; I had no sooner fired, but from all parts of the wood there arose an innumerable number of fowls of many sorts, making a confused screaming, and crying every one according to his usual note, but not one of them of any kind that I knew. As for the creature I killed, I took it to be a kind of a hawk, its color and beak resembling it, but had no talons or claws more than common; its flesh was carrion, and fit for nothing.

Contented with this discovery, I came back to my raft, and fell to work to bring my cargo on shore, which took me up the rest of that day, and what to do with myself at night I knew not, nor indeed where to rest; for I was afraid to lie down on the ground, not knowing but some wild beast might devour me, though, as I afterwards found, there was really no need for those fears.

However, as well as I could, I barricaded myself round with the chests and boards that I had brought on shore, and made a kind of hut for that night's lodging; as for food, I yet saw not which way to supply myself, except that I had seen two or three creatures like hares run out of the wood where I shot the fowl.

I now began to consider, that I might yet get a great many things out of the ship, which would be useful to me, and particularly some of the rigging, and sails, and such other things as might come to land; and I resolved to make another voyage on board the vessel, if possible; and as I knew that the first storm that blew must necessarily break her all in pieces, I resolved to set all other things apart,<sup>4</sup> till I got everything out of the ship that I could get; then I called a council, that is to say, in my thoughts, whether I should take back the raft; but this appeared impracticable: so I resolved to go as before, when the tide was down; and I did so, only that I stripped before I went from my hut, having nothing on but a checkered shirt, a pair of linen drawers, and a pair of pumps<sup>5</sup> on my feet.

I got on board the ship, as before, and prepared a second raft; and having had experience of the first, I neither made this so unwieldy, nor loaded it so hard, but yet I brought away several things very useful to me; as first, in the carpenter's stores I found two or three bags full of nails and spikes, a great screw-jack, a dozen or two of hatchets, and above all, that most useful thing called a grindstone.<sup>6</sup> All these I secured together with several things belonging to the gunner, particularly two or three iron crows,<sup>7</sup> and two barrels of musket bullets, seven muskets, another fowling-piece, with some small quantity of powder more; a large bagful of small shot, and a great roll of sheet-lead. But this last was so heavy I could not hoise it up to get it over the ship's side.

Besides these things, I took all the men's clothes that I could find, and a spare fore-topsail, a hammock and some bedding; and with this I loaded my second raft, and brought them all safe on shore to my very great comfort.

I was under some apprehensions during my absence from the land, that at least my provisions might be devoured on shore: but when I came back, I found no sign of any visitor, only there sat a creature like a wild cat upon one of the chests, which when I came towards it, ran away a little distance, and then stood still; she sat very composed, and unconcerned, and looked full in my face, as if she had a mind to be acquainted with me. I presented<sup>8</sup> my gun at her, but as she did not understand it, she was perfectly unconcerned at it, nor did she offer to stir away; upon which I tossed her a bit of biscuit, though by the way I was not very free of it, for my store was not great: however, I spared her a bit, I say, and she went to it, smelled of it, and ate it, and looked (as pleased) for more, but I thanked her, and could spare no more; so she marched off.

Having got my second cargo on shore, though I was fain to open the barrels of powder, and bring them by parcels, for they were too heavy, being large casks, I went to work to make me a little tent with the sail and some poles which I cut for that purpose, and into this tent I brought everything that I knew would spoil, either with rain or sun, and I piled all the empty chests and casks up in a circle round the tent, to fortify it from any sudden attempt, either from man or beast.

When I had done this I blocked up the door of the tent with some boards within, and an empty chest set up on end without, and spreading one of the beds upon the ground, laying my two pistols just at my head, and my gun at length by me, I went to bed for the first time, and slept very quietly all night, for I was very weary and heavy, for the night before I had slept little, and had labored very hard all day, as well to fetch all those things from the ship, as to get them on shore.

I had the biggest magazine<sup>9</sup> of all kinds now that ever were laid up, I believe, for one man: but I was not satisfied still; for while the ship sat upright in that posture, I thought I ought to get everything out of her that I could; so every day at low water I went on board, and brought away something or other; but particularly the third time I went, I brought away as much of the rigging as I could, as also all the small ropes and rope-twine I could get, with a piece of spare canvas, which was to mend the sails upon occasion,<sup>1</sup> and the barrel of wet gunpowder. In a word, I brought away all the sails first and last, only that I was fain to cut them in pieces, and bring as much at a time as I could, for they were no more useful to be sails, but as mere canvas only.

But that which comforted me more still was that last of all, after I had made five or six such voyages as these, and thought I had nothing more to expect from the ship that was worth my meddling with, I say, after all this, I found a great hogshead of bread, three large runlets<sup>2</sup> of rum or spirits, a box of sugar, and a barrel of fine flour; this was surprising to me, because I had given over expecting any more provisions, except what was spoiled by the water. I soon emptied the hogshead of that bread, and wrapped it up parcel by parcel in pieces of the sails, which I cut out; and, in a word, I got all this safe on shore also.

The next day I made another voyage; and now having plundered the ship of what was portable and fit to hand out, I began with the cables; and cutting the great cable into pieces, such as I could move,

I got two cables and a hawser on shore, with all the ironwork I could get; and having cut down the spritsail-yard, and the mizzen-yard,<sup>3</sup> and everything I could to make a large raft, I loaded it with all those heavy goods, and came away; but my good luck began now to leave me; for this raft was so unwieldy, and so overladen, that after I was entered the little cove, where I had landed the rest of my goods, not being able to guide it so handily as I did the other, it overset, and threw me and all my cargo into the water; as for myself, it was no great harm, for I was near the shore; but as to my cargo, it was a great part of it lost, especially the iron, which I expected would have been of great use to me; however, when the tide was out, I got most of the pieces of the cable ashore, and some of the iron, though with infinite labor; for I was fain to dip<sup>4</sup> for it into the water, a work which fatigued me very much. After this, I went every day on board, and brought away what I could get.

I had been now thirteen days on shore, and had been eleven times on board the ship; in which time I had brought away all that one pair of hands could well be supposed capable to bring, though I believe verily, had the calm weather held, I should have brought away the whole ship piece by piece. But preparing the twelfth time to go on board, I found the wind begin to rise: however, at low water I went on board, and though I thought I had rummaged the cabin so effectually as that nothing more could be found, yet I discovered a locker with drawers in it, in one of which I found two or three razors, and one pair of large scissors, with some ten or a dozen of good knives and forks: in another I found about thirty-six pounds value in money, some European coin, some Brazil, some pieces of eight, some gold, some silver.

I smiled to myself at the sight of this money. "O drug!" said I aloud, "what art thou good for? Thou art not worth to me, no not the taking off of the ground, one of those knives is worth all this heap, I have no manner of use for thee, e'en remain where thou art, and go to the bottom as a creature whose life is not worth saving." However upon second thoughts, I took it away; and wrapping all this in a piece of canvas, I began to think of making another raft, but while I was preparing this, I found the sky overcast, and the wind began to rise, and in a quarter of an hour it blew a fresh gale from the shore; it presently occurred to me that it was in vain to pretend<sup>5</sup> to make a raft with the wind off shore, and that it was my business to be gone before the tide of flood began, otherwise I might not be able to reach the shore at all. Accordingly I let myself down into the water, and swam across the channel, which lay between the ship and the sands, and even that with difficulty enough, partly with the weight of the things I had about me, and partly the roughness of the water, for the wind rose very hastily, and before it was quite high water, it blew a storm.

But I was gotten home to my little tent, where I lay with all my wealth about me very secure. It blew very hard all that night, and in the morning when I looked out, behold no more ship was to be seen; I was a little surprised, but recovered myself with the satisfactory reflection, viz. that I had lost no time, nor abated no diligence to get everything out of her that could be useful to me, and that indeed there was little left in her that I was able to bring away if I had had more time.

I now gave over any more thoughts of the ship, or of anything out of her, except what might drive on shore from her wreck, as indeed divers pieces of her afterwards did; but those things were of small use to me.

The Preface

The success the former part of this work has met with in the world has yet been no other than is acknowledged to be due to the surprising variety of the subject, and to the agreeable manner of the performance.

All the endeavors of envious people to reproach it with being a romance,<sup>1</sup> to search it for errors in geography, inconsistency in the relation, and contradictions in the fact, have proved abortive, and as impotent as malicious.

The just application of every incident, the religious and useful inferences drawn from every part, are so many testimonies to the good design of making it public, and must legitimate all the part that may be called invention, or parable in the story.

The second part, if the editor's opinion may pass, is (contrary to the usage of <sup>2</sup> second parts) every way as entertaining as the first, contains as strange and surprising incidents, and as great a variety of them; nor is the application less serious, or suitable; and doubtless will, to the sober, as well as ingenious reader, be every way as profitable and diverting: and this makes the abridging this work as scandalous as it is knavish and ridiculous,<sup>3</sup> seeing, while to shorten the book, that they may seem to reduce the value, they strip it of all those reflections, as well religious as moral, which are not only the greatest beauties of the work, but are calculated for the infinite advantage of the reader.

By this they leave the work naked of its brightest ornaments; and if they would at the same time pretend that the author has supplied the story out of his invention, they take from it the improvement, which alone recommends that invention to wise and good men.

The injury these men do to the proprietor of this work is a practice all honest men abhor; and he believes he may challenge them to show the difference between that and robbing on the highway, or breaking open a house.

If they can't show any difference in the crime, they will find it hard to show why there should be any difference in the punishment: And he will answer for it, that nothing shall be wanting on his part, to do them justice.

MARY DAVYS

Mary Davys (1674–1732) was born in Ireland and married a Dublin clergyman, a college friend of Jonathan Swift. Her husband died after just four years of marriage; their first daughter died before, their second just after him. Nearly destitute, she moved to London in 1700, published two works of fiction, then moved to York. Her play The Northern Heiress was staged there in 1715, and in London the next year. It earned money enough for her to open a coffeehouse in Cambridge in 1718, where she lived the rest of her life. Her best fiction, which displays her talent for deft plotting, colorful, concrete dialogue, and humorous situations, appeared in the 1720s. The Reform'd Coquet (1725), a comic novel about a vain young woman who learns to value the right man, sold well enough to inspire the publication of The Works of Mary Davys (also 1725), which contained plays, poems, and fiction. Her final novel, The Accomplish'd Rake (1727), takes a satirical view of the dissolute ways of fashionable London life. The preface to her Works offers an important perspective on both the theory and the practice of novel writing. She defines novels as “probable feigned stories,” noting their decline in sales compared to histories and travels—perhaps thinking, among other works, of the success of Defoe’s Robinson Crusoe (1719), which would not commonly be called a novel until decades later. She also reflects on her tough literary career, as “a woman left to her own endeavors for twenty-seven years together,” battling back against undeserved censures for bawdiness. (Late in her life, in 1731, the Grub-Street Journal published another such attack, and again she replied, “the novels may e’ne fight their own battles . . . they are too unfashionable to have one word of bawdy in them, the readers are the best judges and to them I appeal.”) Though literary historians now recognize how the success of Davys and other women writers of her time shaped the history of the novel, her story reminds us it never came easy.

The Preface

'Tis now for some time that those sort of writings called novels have been a great deal out of use and fashion, and that the ladies (for whose service they were chiefly designed) have been taken up with amusements of more use and improvement: I mean history and travels: with which the relation of probable feigned stories can by no means stand in competition. However, these are not without their advantages, and those considerable too; and it is very likely the chief reason that put them out of vogue was the world's being surfeited with such as were either flat and insipid, or offensive to modesty and good manners; or that they found them only a circle or repetition of the same adventures.

The French, who have dealt most in this kind, have, I think, chiefly contributed to put them out of countenance:<sup>1</sup> who, though upon all occasions, and where they pretend to write true history, give themselves the utmost liberty of feigning, are too tedious and dry in their matter, and so impertinent in their harangues, that the readers can hardly keep themselves awake over them. I have read a French novel of four hundred pages without the least variety of events, or any issue<sup>2</sup> in the conclusion, either to please or amuse the reader, yet all fiction and romance; and the commonest matters of fact, truly told, would have been much more entertaining. Now this is to lose the only advantage of invention, which gives us room to order accidents<sup>3</sup> better than fortune will be at the pains to do; so to work upon the reader's passions, sometimes keep him in suspense between fear and hope, and at last send him satisfied away. This I have endeavored to do in the following sheets.<sup>4</sup> I have in every novel proposed one entire scheme or plot, and the other adventures are only incident or collateral to it; which is the great rule prescribed by the critics, not only in tragedy, and other heroic poems, but in comedy too. The adventures, as far as I could order them, are wonderful<sup>5</sup> and probable; and I have with the utmost justice rewarded virtue, and punished vice. The Lady's Tale was writ in the year 1700, and was the effect of my first flight to the muses, it was sent about the world as naked as it came into it, having not so much as one page of preface to keep it in countenance.<sup>6</sup> What success it met with, I never knew; for as some unnatural parents sell their offspring to beggars, in order to see them no more, I took three guineas for the brat of my brain, and then went a hundred and fifty miles northward,<sup>7</sup> to which place it was not very likely its fame should follow. But meeting with it some time ago, I found it in a sad ragged condition, and had so much pity for it, as to take it home, and get it into better clothes, that when it made a second sally,<sup>8</sup> it might with more assurance appear before its betters.

My whole design both in that and The Cousins<sup>9</sup> is to endeavor to restore the purity and empire of love, and correct the vile abuses of it; which, could I do, it would be an important service to the public: for since passions will ever have a place in the actions of men, and love a principal one, what cannot be removed or subdued ought at least to be regulated; and if the reformation would once begin from our sex, the men would follow it in spite of their hearts; for it is we have given up our empire, betrayed by rebels among ourselves.

The two plays I leave to fight their own battles; and I shall say no more than that I never was so vain as to think they deserved a place in the first rank, or so humble as to resign them to the last.

I have been so anxious for the credit of my Modern Poet<sup>1</sup> that I showed it to several of my friends, and earnestly begged their impartial opinion of it. Every one separately told me his objection, but not two among them agreed in any one particular; so that I found, to remove all the faults, would be to leave nothing behind, and I could not help thinking my case parallel with the man in the fable, whose two wives disliking, one his gray hairs, and the other his black, picked both out, till they left him nothing but a bald pate.

Perhaps it may be objected against me, by some more ready to give reproach than relief, that as I am the relict of a clergyman, and in years,<sup>2</sup> I ought not to publish plays, &c. But I beg of such to suspend their uncharitable opinions, till they have read what I have writ, and if they find anything there offensive either to God or Man, anything either to shock their morals or their modesty, 'tis then time enough to blame. And let them farther consider, that a woman left to her own endeavors for twenty-seven years together, may well be allowed to catch at any opportunity for that bread, which they that condemn her would very probably deny to give her.

ELIZA HAYWOOD

The immensely prolific Eliza Haywood (1693?–1756; see p. 649) wrote all sorts of prose: from racy romance and “oriental” tales to her later, more moralizing didactic fictions. The Fortunate Foundlings appeared in 1744, with a subtitle that associated it with the genre of secret history: Being the Genuine History of Colonel M—rs, and his Sister, Madam Du P—y, the Issue of the Hon. Ch—es M—rs, Son of the late Duke of R—l—d. Containing many wonderful accidents that befell them in their travels, and interspersed with the characters and adventures of several persons of condition, in the most polite courts in Europe. In the period, the thriving genre of secret history could contain true facts, thinly veiled political allegories, or fictions with no real-world referents. These texts promised glimpses of how powerful people really lived and of what Haywood elsewhere describes as “the secret springs which gave rise to the actions” that happened in the world—though part of the pleasure could also be in how unbelievable it all was. Poised at this blurry intersection between truth and fiction, secret histories could engage in scandalous gossip and political satire, while also offering thrilling invented adventures.

Haywood’s preface purports to be from “EDITORS” who have merely compiled true accounts, and it promises that the text both provides “amusement” and “encourage[s] virtue.”

Preface

The many fictions which have been lately imposed upon the world, under the specious titles of secret histories, memoirs, etc., etc., have given but too much room to question the veracity of every thing that has the least tendency that way: we therefore think it highly necessary to assure the reader, that he will find nothing in the following sheets, but what has been collected from original letters, private memorandums, and the accounts we have been favored with from the mouths of persons too deeply concerned in many of the chief transactions not to be perfectly acquainted with the truth, and of too much honor and integrity to put any false colors upon it.

The adventures are not so long passed as to be wholly forgotten by many living witnesses, nor yet so recent as to give any reason to suspect us of flattery in the relation given of them, the motive of their publication being only to encourage virtue in both sexes, by showing the amiableness<sup>1</sup> of it in real characters. And if it be true (as certainly it is) that example has far more efficacy than precept, we may be bold to say that there are few fairer, or more worthy imitation.—The sons and daughters of the greatest families may give additional luster to their nobility, by forming themselves on the model here presented to them; and those of lower extraction,<sup>2</sup> attain qualities to atone for what they want in birth:—so that we flatter ourselves this undertaking will not fail of receiving the approbation of all who wish well to a reformation of manners, and more especially those who have youth under their care.—As for such who may take it up merely as an amusement, it is possible they will find something, which, by interesting their affections, may make them better without designing to be so.—Either way will full recompense the pains taken in the compiling by

HENRY FIELDING

Writing novels was a second literary career for Henry Fielding (1707–1754), who first became famous as the preeminent comic playwright of his time. The need to make money motivated both. He was from a family with high social connections, a relation of earls and second cousin to Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, and he received a classical education at England's most elite school, Eton, forming friendships with the nation's future leaders. But his prodigal father, an army colonel who would rise to the rank of general, squandered the fortune that Henry needed to live the life of a gentleman he thought he deserved. Early on, Fielding determined on a career as a writer to maintain this life, seeing his first comedy staged in London when he was twenty. After some time studying literature at the University of Leiden in Holland, he returned to England and wrote for the theater, specializing in farces, ballad operas, and political satires. These last were so successful that the ministry of Robert Walpole passed the Stage Licensing Act of 1737, which subjected all new plays to government censorship and closed the Haymarket Theatre, where Fielding's plays were produced, effectively ending his theatrical career. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in 1740.

That year also he aimed his talent for parody at the greatest sensation in fiction of the day, Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded (1740) by Samuel Richardson. Fielding's Shamela makes fun of that novel's epistolary style and of its heroine's way of using her chastity to her advantage. He extends the joke in his next fictional work, Joseph Andrews (1742), which follows Pamela's brother, a footman employed by a lady who attempts to seduce him. But Fielding now aspired to be much more than a parodist of Richardson, acknowledging Cervantes' great Don Quixote (1605, 1616) as a model even as he remarks in the preface on his own originality. Seven years later, he asserted this claim yet more strongly in his masterpiece Tom Jones (1749), in which he declares himself

“founder of a new province of writing.” He concluded his novelistic career with Amelia (1751), which disappointed some readers as it indulged sentiments reminiscent of Richardson’s own idiom. (One wit in response advertised a nonexistent novel called Shamelia.)

Despite his initial contempt, Fielding had sent Richardson a letter warm with praise for Clarissa: “beyond any thing I have ever read,” he said of one affecting part. Though gratified, Richardson remained hostile and would never miss a chance to deplore the bad morals of Tom Jones. From their rivalry, a multilayered contrast arose in commentary on novelistic fiction that strongly influenced later understandings of the form’s possibilities. Richardson’s excellences—his moral, psychological, and emotional intensity, his preference for feminine protagonists and intimate domestic settings, his orchestration of narrative through the first-person voices of correspondents—seemed incompatible with Fielding’s strengths: a comic vigor and well-populated plots that open out into the countryside and twist through chaotic scenes at public inns, overseen in the third person by an ironic, sociable author-narrator who smiles at the lapses of basically good-hearted heroes.

The preface to Joseph Andrews asserts not only the novelty of Fielding’s fictional enterprise but also its potential as high literary art. Fielding notices its deep connection to ancient and exalted literary forms, comedy and epic. His techniques also compare, he says, with those of his friend, “the comic history painter” William Hogarth, whose art represents the ridiculous in human nature without falling into unrealistic exaggeration and caricature. The theory of the ridiculous in the preface considers not only the undistorted representation of fictional characters but also realities of human motivation and morality. Fielding’s intent here to tell the reader what to think about his work will enter the body of this and his other novels, as his narrator points out details of the plot, moralizes on his characters’ behavior, and theorizes on the nature of fiction. In Joseph Andrews, he will depict the vicissitudes that finally bring the hero Joseph, virtuous but warmly in love with a young woman of his own social station, Fanny Goodwill, to a happy end. The resolution of the plot, which includes Joseph's discovery of his true identity, employs some conventions of romance; and the preface applies that term to Joseph Andrews without embarrassment, though it contrasts this novel with the vast French prose romances of the seventeenth century. Fielding seems most taken with his creation of Parson Abraham Adams, who accompanies Joseph and Fanny on their adventures and sponsors their match—a character the likes of whom, Fielding says, is “not to be found in any book now extant.” Readers have concurred with this sense of Adams's uniqueness, a result of his pleasing (if at times maddening and puzzling) power to elicit both ridicule and affection. The success of Adams as a literary creation points to a feature typical of novels in the future: their construction of what the twentieth-century novelist E. M. Forster would call “round” characters. Instead of presenting simplifications of human beings, novels introduce characters that seem to breathe, feel, and think. Fielding's power to raise affection for such characters while also comprehensively surveying an entire social world lies at the heart of his achievement.

From *Preface

As it is possible the mere English reader may have a different idea of romance with the author of these little volumes,<sup>2</sup> and may consequently expect a kind of entertainment not to be found, nor which was even intended, in the following pages, it may not be improper to premise a few words concerning this kind of writing, which I do not remember to have seen hitherto attempted in our language.

The epic as well as the drama is divided into tragedy and comedy. Homer, who was the father of this species of poetry, gave us a pattern of both these, though that of the latter kind is entirely lost; which Aristotle tells us bore the same relation to comedy which his Iliad bears to tragedy.<sup>3</sup> And perhaps, that we have no more instances of it among the writers of antiquity, is owing to the loss of this great pattern, which, had it survived, would have found its imitators equally with the other poems of this great original.

And farther, as this poetry may be tragic or comic, I will not scruple to say it may be likewise either in verse or prose: for though it wants one particular, which the critic<sup>4</sup> enumerates in the constituent parts of an epic poem, namely meter; yet, when any kind of writing contains all its other parts, such as fable, action, characters, sentiments, and diction,<sup>5</sup> and is deficient in meter only; it seems, I think, reasonable to refer it to the epic; at least, as no critic hath thought proper to range it under any other head, or to assign it a particular name to itself.

Thus the Telemachus of the archbishop of Cambray appears to me of the epic kind, as well as<sup>6</sup> the Odyssey of Homer; indeed, it is much fairer and more reasonable to give it a name common with that species from which it differs only in a single instance, than to confound it with those which it resembles in no other. Such are those voluminous works, commonly called romances, namely, Clelia, Cleopatra, Astraea, Cassandra, the Grand Cyrus,<sup>7</sup> and innumerable others, which contain, as I apprehend, very little instruction or entertainment.

Now a comic romance is a comic epic-poem in prose; differing from comedy, as the serious epic from tragedy: its action being more extended and comprehensive; containing a much larger circle of incidents, and introducing a greater variety of characters. It differs from the serious romance in its fable and action, in this: that as in the one these are grave and solemn, so in the other they are light and ridiculous: it differs in its characters by introducing persons of inferior rank, and consequently of inferior manners, whereas the grave romance sets the highest before us: lastly in its sentiments and diction; by preserving the ludicrous instead of the sublime.<sup>8</sup> In the diction, I think, burlesque<sup>9</sup> itself may be sometimes admitted; of which many instances will occur in this work, as in the description of the battles, and some other places, not necessary to be pointed out to the classical reader, for whose entertainment those parodies or burlesque imitations are chiefly calculated.

But though we have sometimes admitted this in our diction, we have carefully excluded it from our sentiments and characters; for there it is never properly introduced, unless in writings of the burlesque kind, which this is not intended to be. Indeed, no two species of writing can differ more widely than the comic and the burlesque; for as the latter is ever the exhibition of what is monstrous and unnatural, and where our delight, if we examine it, arises from the surprising absurdity, as in appropriating the manners of the highest to the lowest, or è converso,<sup>1</sup> so in the former we should ever confine ourselves strictly to nature, from the just imitation of which will flow all the pleasure we can this way convey to a sensible reader. And perhaps there is one reason why a comic writer should of all others be the least excused for deviating from nature, since it may not be always so easy for a serious poet to meet with the great and the admirable; but life everywhere furnishes an accurate observer with the ridiculous.

I have hinted this little concerning burlesque; because I have often heard that name given to performances which have been truly of the comic kind, from the author's having sometimes admitted it in his diction only; which, as it is the dress of poetry, doth like the dress of men establish characters (the one of the whole poem, and the other of the whole man) in vulgar opinion, beyond any of their greater excellencies. But surely a certain drollery in style, where the characters and sentiments are perfectly natural, no more constitutes the burlesque, than an empty pomp and dignity of words, where everything else is mean and low, can entitle any performance to the appellation of the true sublime.

SAMUEL RICHARDSON

The novels of Samuel Richardson (1689–1761) emerged not from a genteel literary world of elite education and social privilege but from a London culture of printing presses, paper, type, and ink.

Richardson came to his position as one of the two most celebrated masters of eighteenth-century fiction with (in his words) “only common school-learning,” without Latin or Greek, starting in the book trades as a printer’s apprentice in London. He held that position for seven years, then worked for his former master as a compositor and corrector, and finally in 1722 gained the livery of the Stationer’s Company, the guild of London printers, that licensed him to set up his own printing business, at the age of thirty-three.

Through the 1720s and 1730s this business thrived, as he printed documents for the government, periodicals, and many kinds of books and also did work as an editor, a bookseller, and occasionally an author.

In 1739 he was composing a book of sample letters to serve as models for correspondence when one pair of them, an exchange about a master’s violent sexual harassment of a servant girl, sparked an idea. In two months, he wrote his first novel, Pamela, or Virtue Rewarded (1740)—published, like all the miscellaneous work he had previously written, anonymously (though his authorship soon became known). In a 1741 letter, he would describe it as representing a “new species of writing” that did not traffic in “the improbable and marvelous, with which novels general abound.”

Pamela elaborated on the situation in the letter manual and was itself an epistolary novel, composed entirely in letters, mostly written by the servant, Pamela Andrews, to her parents. She is “rewarded” near the end with a proposal of marriage from her finally reformed master Mr. B, which she accepts. The novel was a vast success, running to five editions in a year, inspiring rapturous praise and censures of its erotic content and disruption of social hierarchy, as well as continuations by other writers, theatrical adaptations, prints and other visual representations, and parodies, notably Henry Fielding's Shamela (1740) and Eliza Haywood's Anti-Pamela (1741). Richardson himself wrote a sequel in 1741, but his greatest achievement as a novelist would appear in 1747 and 1748, in seven volumes: Clarissa, or the History of a Young Lady, also composed of letters, nearly a million words long, follows the trials of Clarissa Harlowe, young, pious, rich, and beautiful, whose family cruelly forces her toward a financially advantageous marriage to an odious man. Clarissa is deceived into accepting the aid of a handsome libertine of high station, Lovelace, her great antagonist, bent on possessing and destroying her. Richardson's final novel, The History of Sir Charles Grandison (1753–54) portrays a truly good man, as an antidote to the specious appeal of men such as his own villain Lovelace and Fielding's comical hero Tom Jones, whom he thought far from harmless. Also notably prolix (seven volumes long) and also an epistolary novel, Grandison has not lived in readers' imaginations quite as Pamela and Clarissa have done, though its portrayal of intimate rhythms of domestic life captivated later masters of fiction such as Jane Austen.

Richardson did not invent epistolary fiction—Aphra Behn's Love-Letters between a Nobleman and His Sister (three volumes, 1684–87) is a substantial earlier example—but his works did more for the prestige of the form in European literature than those of any other author. A skeptical reader such as Henry Fielding can find aspects of the epistolary form that strain credulity. How do the authors of so very many letters find time to live the lives they so copiously write about? Where are these letters, who has them, and how did this “editor” get them from correspondents who are estranged or widely distant from each other, or dead? Yet the documentary illusion of the form, its consisting of “real” physical objects—actual letters—that may not only be read but also hidden, stolen, passed secretly from hand to hand, helps overcome its artificiality, both for eighteenth-century readers used to sharing their own (often voluminous) correspondence, and readers now.

In Richardson's preface to Clarissa, posing as the editor who has overseen the letters' transformation from handwriting to print, he describes the technique's power, its way of depicting characters' emotions at the very moment they write, in the midst of the plot, not knowing the outcome. This close scrutiny of the motions of consciousness would be seen as a hallmark of the novel form in general. But epistolary fiction, Richardson knew, had its dangers. Giving ample space to self-justifying, plausible villains such as Lovelace, without authorial correction, could trap readers in the wrong sympathies. Before the final volumes of Clarissa had appeared, Richardson's devotees urged him to reform Lovelace for a happy ending; he felt they missed the point. The preface printed here, from the third, 1751 edition, testifies to his anxiety about controlling readers' wayward reactions. As editor, he "restores" (in fact invents) more epistolary material to this third edition, making the novel yet longer, much of which serves to discredit Lovelace further. The preface also addresses mundane problems that Richardson the printer knew mattered: the size of the type, the "spoilers" in the previous edition's outline. The epistolary form that Richardson mastered did not immediately take off; it came into greatest vogue in the 1770s (when Frances Burney's Evelina appeared) and 1780s, when the French author Pierre Choderlos de Laclos published his epistolary classic Les Liaisons dangereuses (1782). Though only occasionally revived in later fiction, the epistolary method allowed Richardson to create an intimacy between characters and the reader that remains at the heart of the novel's power.

From Preface

The following history is given in a series of letters written principally in a double yet separate correspondence;

Between two young ladies of virtue and honor, bearing an inviolable friendship for each other, and writing not merely for amusement, but upon the most interesting<sup>2</sup> subjects; in which every private family, more or less, may find itself concerned; and,

Between two gentlemen<sup>3</sup> of free lives; one of them glorying in his talents for stratagem and invention, and communicating to the other, in confidence, all the secret purposes of an intriguing head and resolute heart.

But here it will be proper to observe, for the sake of such as may apprehend hurt to the morals of youth, from the more freely written letters, that the gentlemen, though professed libertines as to the female sex, and making it one of their wicked maxims, to keep no faith with any of the individuals of it, who are thrown into their power, are not, however, either infidels or scoffers;<sup>4</sup> nor yet such as think themselves freed from the observance of those other moral duties which bind man to man.

On the contrary, it will be found, in the progress of the work, that they very often make such reflections upon each other, and each upon himself and his own actions, as reasonable beings must make, who disbelieve not a future state of rewards and punishments,<sup>5</sup> and who one day propose to reform—One of them actually reforming,<sup>6</sup> and by that means giving an opportunity to censure the freedoms which fall from the gayer pen and lighter heart of the other.

And yet that other, although in unbosoming himself to a select friend, he discovers<sup>7</sup> wickedness enough to entitle him to general detestation, preserves a decency, as well in his images as in his language, which is not always to be found in the works of some of the most celebrated modern writers, whose subjects and characters have less warranted the liberties they have taken.

In the letters of the two young ladies, it is presumed will be found not only the highest exercise of a reasonable and practicable friendship, between minds endowed with the noblest principles of virtue and religion, but occasionally interspersed, such delicacy of sentiments, particularly with regard to the other sex; such instances of impartiality, each freely, as a fundamental principle of their friendship, blaming, praising, and setting right the other, as are strongly to be recommended to the observation of the younger part (more especially) of the female readers.

The principal of these two young ladies is proposed as an exemplar to her sex. Nor is it any objection to her being so, that she is not in all respects a perfect character. It was not only natural, but it was necessary, that she should have some faults, were it only to show the reader how laudably she could mistrust and blame herself, and carry to her own heart, divested of self-partiality, the censure which arose from her own convictions, and that even to the acquittal of those, because revered characters,<sup>8</sup> whom no one else would acquit, and to whose much greater faults her errors were owing, and not to a weak or reproachable heart. As far as it is consistent with human frailty, and as far as she could be perfect, considering the people she had to deal with, and those with whom she was inseparably connected, she is perfect. To have been impeccable must have left nothing for the divine grace and a purified state to do, and carried our idea of her from woman to angel. As such is she often esteemed by the man<sup>9</sup> whose heart was so corrupt that he could hardly believe human nature capable of the purity, which, on every trial or temptation, shone out in hers.

Besides the four principal persons, several others are introduced, whose letters are characteristic:<sup>1</sup> and it is presumed that there will be found in some of them, but more especially in those of the chief character among the men, and the second character among the women,<sup>2</sup> such strokes of gayety, fancy, and humor, as will entertain and divert; and at the same time both warn and instruct.

All the letters are written while the hearts of the writers must be supposed to be wholly engaged in their subjects (the events at the time generally dubious<sup>3</sup>): so that they abound not only with critical situations, but with what may be called instantaneous descriptions and reflections (proper to be brought home to the breast of the youthful reader); as also with affecting conversations; many of them written in the dialogue or dramatic way.

"Much more lively and affecting," says one of the principal characters (Vol. VII, p. 73),<sup>4</sup> "must be the style of those who write in the height of a present distress; the mind tortured by the pangs of uncertainty (the events then hidden in the womb of fate;) than the dry, narrative, unanimated style of a person relating difficulties and dangers surmounted, can be; the relater perfectly at ease; and if himself unmoved by his own story, not likely greatly to affect the reader."

What will be found to be more particularly aimed at in the following work is—To warn the inconsiderate and thoughtless of the one sex, against the base arts and designs of specious contrivers of the other—To caution parents against the undue exercise of their natural authority over their children in the great article of marriage—To warn children against preferring a man of pleasure to a man of probity, upon that dangerous but too commonly received notion, that a reformed rake makes the best husband—But above all, to investigate the highest and most important doctrines not only of morality, but of Christianity, by showing them thrown into action in the conduct of the worthy characters; while the unworthy, who set those doctrines at defiance, are condignly, and, as may be said, consequentially punished.

From what has been said, considerate readers will not enter upon the perusal of the piece before them as if it were designed only to divert and amuse. It will probably be thought tedious to all such as dip into it, expecting a light novel, or transitory romance; and look upon story in it (interesting as that is generally allowed to be) as its sole end, rather than as a vehicle to the instruction.

SAMUEL JOHNSON

In Rambler 4, as Samuel Johnson (1709–1784; see p. 788) assesses the innovations in fiction in his own age, he voices some of his fundamental critical principles. He is enthusiastic about the popular appeal of the modern novel, and its duty to be true to the experiences of readers, even though its incidents are invented. Such fictional truth, he believes, is always gratifying. And he insists that novels ought to adhere to a moral purpose, especially given their popularity among the young. He recognized, however, that the writerly attempt to be true to life is often at odds with the aim to be moral, hence the problem of characters who exhibit a mixture of “good and bad qualities.” In his vigorous approval of the aims and effects of the fictions of the eighteenth century, Johnson helped to canonize not just particular novels but the novel form itself.

[ON FICTION]

Saturday, March 31, 1750

Simul et jucunda et idonea dicere vitae.

—HORACE, Art of Poetry, 334

And join both profit and delight in one.

—CREECH

The works of fiction with which the present generation seems more particularly delighted are such as exhibit life in its true state, diversified only by accidents that daily happen in the world, and influenced by passions and qualities which are really to be found in conversing with mankind.

This kind of writing may be termed, not improperly, the comedy of romance, and is to be conducted nearly by the rules of comic poetry. Its province is to bring about natural events by easy means, and to keep up curiosity without the help of wonder: it is therefore precluded from the machines<sup>1</sup> and expedients of the heroic romance, and can neither employ giants to snatch away a lady from the nuptial rites, nor knights to bring her back from captivity; it can neither bewilder its personages in deserts, nor lodge them in imaginary castles.

I remember a remark made by Scaliger upon Pontanus,<sup>2</sup> that all his writings are filled with the same images; and that if you take from him his lilies and his roses, his satyrs and his dryads, he will have nothing left that can be called poetry. In like manner, almost all the fictions of the last age will vanish if you deprive them of a hermit and a wood, a battle and a shipwreck.

Why this wild strain of imagination found reception so long in polite and learned ages, it is not easy to conceive; but we cannot wonder that while readers could be procured, the authors were willing to continue it; for when a man had by practice gained some fluency of language, he had no further care than to retire to his closet, let loose his invention, and heat his mind with incredibilities; a book was thus produced without fear of criticism, without the toil of study, without knowledge of nature, or acquaintance with life.

The task of our present writers is very different; it requires, together with that learning which is to be gained from books, that experience which can never be attained by solitary diligence, but must arise from general converse and accurate observation of the living world. Their performances have, as Horace expresses it, plus oneris quanto veniae minus,<sup>3</sup> little indulgence, and therefore more difficulty. They are engaged in portraits of which everyone knows the original, and can detect any deviation from exactness of resemblance. Other writings are safe, except from the malice of learning, but these are in danger from every common reader; as the slipper ill executed was censured by a shoemaker who happened to stop in his way at the Venus of Apelles.<sup>4</sup>

But the fear of not being approved as just copiers of human manners is not the most important concern that an author of this sort ought to have before him. These books are written chiefly to the young, the ignorant, and the idle, to whom they serve as lectures of conduct, and introductions into life. They are the entertainment of minds unfurnished with ideas, and therefore easily susceptible of impressions; not fixed by principles, and therefore easily following the current of fancy; not informed by experience, and consequently open to every false suggestion and partial account.

That the highest degree of reverence should be paid to youth, and that nothing indecent should be suffered to approach their eyes or ears, are precepts extorted by sense and virtue from an ancient writer by no means eminent for chastity of thought.<sup>5</sup> The same kind, though not the same degree, of caution, is required in everything which is laid before them, to secure them from unjust prejudices, perverse opinions, and incongruous combinations of images.

In the romances formerly written, every transaction and sentiment was so remote from all that passes among men that the reader was in very little danger of making any applications to himself; the virtues and crimes were equally beyond his sphere of activity; and he amused himself with heroes and with traitors, deliverers and persecutors, as with beings of another species, whose actions were regulated upon motives of their own, and who had neither faults nor excellencies in common with himself.

But when an adventurer is leveled with the rest of the world, and acts in such scenes of the universal drama as may be the lot of any other man, young spectators fix their eyes upon him with closer attention, and hope, by observing his behavior and success, to regulate their own practices when they shall be engaged in the like part.

For this reason these familiar histories may perhaps be made of greater use than the solemnities of professed morality, and convey the knowledge of vice and virtue with more efficacy than axioms and definitions. But if the power of example is so great as to take possession of the memory by a kind of violence, and produce effects almost without the intervention of the will, care ought to be taken that when the choice is unrestrained, the best examples only should be exhibited; and that which is likely to operate so strongly should not be mischievous or uncertain in its effects.

The chief advantage which these fictions have over real life is that their authors are at liberty, though not to invent, yet to select objects, and to cull from the mass of mankind those individuals upon which the attention ought most to be employed; as a diamond, though it cannot be made, may be polished by art, and placed in such situation as to display that luster which before was buried among common stones.

It is justly considered as the greatest excellency of art to imitate nature; but it is necessary to distinguish those parts of nature which are most proper for imitation: greater care is still required in representing life, which is so often discolored by passion or deformed by wickedness. If the world be promiscuously<sup>6</sup> described, I cannot see of what use it can be to read the account; or why it may not be as safe to turn the eye immediately upon mankind as upon a mirror which shows all that presents itself without discrimination.

It is therefore not a sufficient vindication of a character that it is drawn as it appears, for many characters ought never to be drawn; nor of a narrative that the train of events is agreeable to observation and experience, for that observation which is called knowledge of the world will be found much more frequently to make men cunning than good. The purpose of these writings is surely not only to show mankind, but to provide that they may be seen hereafter with less hazard; to teach the means of avoiding the snares which are laid by Treachery for Innocence, without infusing any wish for that superiority with which the betrayer flatters his vanity; to give the power of counteracting fraud without the temptation to practice it; to initiate youth by mock encounters in the art of necessary defense, and to increase prudence without impairing virtue.

Many writers, for the sake of following nature, so mingle good and bad qualities in their principal personages that they are both equally conspicuous; and as we accompany them through their adventures with delight, and are led by degrees to interest ourselves in their favor, we lose the abhorrence of their faults because they do not hinder our pleasure, or perhaps regard them with some kindness for being united with so much merit.<sup>7</sup>

There have been men indeed splendidly wicked, whose endowments threw a brightness on their crimes, and whom scarce any villainy made perfectly detestable because they never could be wholly divested of their excellencies; but such have been in all ages the great corrupters of the world, and their resemblance ought no more to be preserved than the art of murdering without pain.

Some have advanced, without due attention to the consequences of this notion, that certain virtues have their correspondent faults, and therefore that to exhibit either apart is to deviate from probability. Thus men are observed by Swift to be "grateful in the same degree as they are resentful." This principle, with others of the same kind, supposes man to act from a brute impulse, and pursue a certain degree of inclination without any choice of the object; for, otherwise, though it should be allowed that gratitude and resentment arise from the same constitution of the passions, it follows not that they will be equally indulged when reason is consulted; yet, unless that consequence be admitted, this sagacious maxim becomes an empty sound, without any relation to practice or to life.

Nor is it evident that even the first motions to these effects are always in the same proportion. For pride, which produces quickness of resentment, will obstruct gratitude by unwillingness to admit that inferiority which obligation implies; and it is very unlikely that he who cannot think he receives a favor will acknowledge or repay it.

It is of the utmost importance to mankind that positions of this tendency should be laid open and confuted; for while men consider good and evil as springing from the same root, they will spare the one for the sake of the other, and in judging, if not of others at least of themselves, will be apt to estimate their virtues by their vices. To this fatal error all those will contribute who confound the colors of right and wrong, and, instead of helping to settle their boundaries, mix them with so much art that no common mind is able to disunite them.

In narratives where historical veracity has no place, I cannot discover why there should not be exhibited the most perfect idea of virtue; of virtue not angelical, nor above probability (for what we cannot credit, we shall never imitate), but the highest and purest that humanity can reach, which, exercised in such trials as the various revolutions of things shall bring upon it, may, by conquering some calamities and enduring others, teach us what we may hope, and what we can perform. Vice (for vice is necessary to be shown) should always disgust; nor should the graces of gaiety, nor the dignity of courage, be so united with it as to reconcile it to the mind. Wherever it appears, it should raise hatred by the malignity of its practices, and contempt by the meanness of its stratagems: for while it is supported by either parts<sup>8</sup> or spirit, it will be seldom heartily abhorred. The Roman tyrant was content to be hated if he was but feared;<sup>9</sup> and there are thousands of the readers of romances willing to be thought wicked if they may be allowed to be wits. It is therefore to be steadily inculcated that virtue is the highest proof of understanding, and the only solid basis of greatness; and that vice is the natural consequence of narrow thoughts; that it begins in mistake, and ends in ignominy.

CHARLOTTE LENNOX

Charlotte Lennox (1730?–1804), née Charlotte Ramsay, was born in Gibraltar (a British territory on the Iberian peninsula) and spent some of her early life in New York, where her father's military career had taken the family. She arrived in England at fifteen, turned author, and married Scotsman Alexander Lennox. Eventually she began to move in a circle of powerful literary friends and became a celebrated writer of poems, plays, periodical essays, translations, literary criticism, and novels.

Her most famous work, The Female Quixote; or the Adventures of Arabella (1752), is a novel about reading novels. Like the famous hero of Miguel de Cervantes' Spanish classic Don Quixote (1605, 1615), Lennox's Arabella bases her understanding of the world on the unrealistic fictions she voraciously reads. Arabella particularly loves old seventeenth-century French romances, with their improbable, sensational plots and highly wrought depictions of love and adventure. Over and over again—as in the selection here—Arabella's romance reading leads her to misunderstand the things actually happening around her in modern-day England. At the novel's conclusion, a clergyman helps Arabella realize her mistake: he explains that romance novels are "senseless fictions." They "vitate" (or spoil) "the mind, and pervert the understanding." The lesson here echoes much period discourse about the dangers of novel reading, but of course there is an important difference, as the sentiment occurs in a novel—a novel that ends rather like a romance, with Arabella's happy marriage. The clergyman himself allows, "Truth is not always injured by fiction." He recommends that Arabella read, instead, Samuel Richardson's more probable and more moralistic fiction. Though Arabella eventually gives up romance reading, Lennox herself kept on writing her own kind of novels, social comedies with young women as protagonists: Henrietta (1758), Sophia (1762), and Euphemia (1790).

From The Female Quixote

From Chapter 1. Contains a turn at court, neither new nor surprising. Some useless additions to a fine lady's education. The bad effects of a whimsical study, which some will say is borrowed from Cervantes.

The Marquis of —, for a long series of years, was the first and most distinguished favorite at court: he held the most honorable employments under the crown, disposed of all places of profit as he pleased, presided at the council, and in a manner governed the whole kingdom.

This extensive authority could not fail of making him many enemies: he fell at last a sacrifice to the plots they were continually forming against him; and was not only removed from all his employments, but banished the court forever.

The pain his undeserved disgrace gave him, he was enabled to conceal by the natural haughtiness of his temper; and, behaving rather like a man who had resigned, than been dismissed from his posts, he imagined he triumphed sufficiently over the malice of his enemies, while he seemed to be wholly insensible of the effects it produced. His secret discontent, however, was so much augmented by the opportunity he now had of observing the baseness and ingratitude of mankind, which in some degree he experienced every day, that he resolved to quit all society whatever, and devote the rest of his life to solitude and privacy. For the place of his retreat he pitched upon a castle he had in a very remote province of the kingdom, in the neighborhood of a small village, and several miles distant from any town. The vast extent of ground which surrounded this noble building, he had caused to be laid out in a manner peculiar to his taste: the most laborious endeavors of art had been used to make it appear like the beautiful product of wild, uncultivated nature. But if this epitome of Arcadia<sup>1</sup> could boast of only artless and simple beauties, the inside of the castle was adorned with a magnificence suitable to the dignity and immense riches of the owner.

While things were preparing at the castle for his reception, the Marquis, though now advanced in years, cast his eyes on a young lady, greatly inferior to himself in quality,<sup>2</sup> but whose beauty and good sense promised him an agreeable companion. After a very short courtship, he married her, and in a few weeks carried his new bride into the country, from whence he absolutely resolved never to return.

The Marquis, following the plan of life he had laid down, divided his time between the company of his lady, his library, which was large and well furnished, and his gardens. Sometimes he took the diversion of hunting, but never admitted any company whatever; and his pride and extreme reserve rendered him so wholly inaccessible to the country gentry about him, that none ever presumed to solicit his acquaintance.

In the second year of his retirement, the Marchioness brought him a daughter, and died in three days after her delivery. The Marquis, who had tenderly loved her, was extremely afflicted at her death; but time having produced its usual effects, his great fondness for the little Arabella entirely engrossed his attention, and made up all the happiness of his life. At four years of age he took her from under the direction of the nurses and women appointed to attend her, and permitted her to receive no part of her education from another, which he was capable of giving her himself. He taught her to read and write in a very few months; and, as she grew older, finding in her an uncommon quickness of apprehension, and an understanding capable of great improvements, he resolved to cultivate so promising a genius<sup>3</sup> with the utmost care; and, as he frequently, in the rapture of paternal fondness, expressed himself, render her mind as beautiful as her person<sup>4</sup> was lovely.

Nature had indeed given her a most charming face, a shape easy and delicate, a sweet and insinuating<sup>5</sup> voice, and an air so full of dignity and grace, as drew the admiration of all that saw her. These native charms were improved with all the heightenings of art; her dress was perfectly magnificent; the best masters of music and dancing were sent for from London to attend her. She soon became a perfect mistress of the French and Italian languages, under the care of her father; and it is not to be doubted, but she would have made a great proficiency in all useful knowledge, had not her whole time been taken up by another study.

From her earliest youth she had discovered a fondness for reading, which extremely delighted the Marquis; he permitted her therefore the use of his library, in which, unfortunately for her, were great store of romances, and, what was still more unfortunate, not in the original French, but very bad translations.

The deceased Marchioness had purchased these books to soften a solitude which she found very disagreeable; and, after her death, the Marquis removed them from her closet<sup>6</sup> into his library, where Arabella found them.

The surprising adventures with which they were filled, proved a most pleasing entertainment to a young lady, who was wholly secluded from the world; who had no other diversion, but ranging like a nymph<sup>7</sup> through gardens, or, to say better, the woods and lawns in which she was enclosed; and who had no other conversation but that of a grave and melancholy father, or her own attendants.

Her ideas, from the manner of her life, and the objects around her, had taken a romantic<sup>8</sup> turn; and, supposing romances were real pictures of life, from them she drew all her notions and expectations. By them she was taught to believe that love was the ruling principle of the world; that every other passion was subordinate to this; and that it caused all the happiness and miseries of life. Her glass,<sup>9</sup> which she often consulted, always showed her a form so extremely lovely, that, not finding herself engaged in such adventures as were common to the heroines in the romances she read, she often complained of the insensibility of mankind, upon whom her charms seemed to have so little influence.

The perfect retirement she lived in afforded indeed no opportunities of making the conquests she desired; but she could not comprehend, how any solitude could be obscure enough to conceal a beauty like hers from notice; and thought the reputation of her charms sufficient to bring a crowd of adorers to demand her of her father. Her mind being wholly filled with the most extravagant expectations, she was alarmed by every trifling incident; and kept in a continual anxiety by a vicissitude of hopes, fears, wishes, and disappointments.

From Chapter 7. *In which some contradictions are very happily reconciled.

The Marquis's head gardener had received a young fellow into his master's service, who had lived in several families of distinction. He had a good face; was tolerably genteel; and having an understanding something above his condition, joined to a great deal of second-hand politeness, which he had contracted while he lived at London,<sup>1</sup> he appeared a very extraordinary person among the rustics who were his fellow servants.

Arabella, when she walked in the garden, had frequent opportunities of seeing this young man, whom she observed with a very particular attention. His person and air had something, she thought, very distinguishing. When she condescended to speak to him about any business he was employed in, she took notice, that his answers were framed in a language vastly superior to his condition; and the respect he paid her had quite another air from that of the awkward civility of the other servants.

Having discerned so many marks of a birth far from being mean,<sup>2</sup> she easily passed from an opinion that he was a gentleman to a belief that he was something more; and every new sight of him adding strength to her suspicions, she remained, in a little time, perfectly convinced that he was some person of quality, who, disguised in the habit of a gardener, had introduced himself into her father's service, in order to have an opportunity of declaring a passion to her, which must certainly be very great, since it had forced him to assume an appearance so unworthy of his noble extraction.<sup>3</sup>

Wholly possessed with this thought, she set herself to observe him more narrowly; and soon found out, that he went very awkwardly about his work; that he sought opportunities of being alone; that he threw himself in her way as often as he could, and gazed on her very attentively: she sometimes fancied she saw him endeavor to smother a sigh when he answered her any question about his work; once saw him leaning against a tree with his hands crossed upon his breast; and, having lost a string of small pearls, which she remembered he had seen her threading as she sat in one of the arbors, was persuaded he had taken it up, and kept it for the object of his secret adoration.

She often wondered, indeed, that she did not find her name carved on the trees, with some mysterious expressions of love; that he was never discovered lying along the side of one of the little rivulets, increasing the stream with his tears; nor, for three months that he had lived there, had ever been sick of a fever caused by his grief, and the constraint he put upon himself in not declaring his passion: but she considered again, that his fear of being discovered kept him from amusing himself with making the trees bear the records of his secret thoughts, or of indulging his melancholy in any manner expressive of the condition of his soul; and, as for his not being sick, his youth and the strength of his constitution might, even for a longer time, bear him up against the assaults of a fever: but he appeared much thinner and paler than he used to be; and she concluded, therefore, that he must in time sink under the violence of his passion, or else be forced to declare it to her; which she considered as a very great misfortune; for, not finding in herself any disposition to approve his love, she must necessarily banish him from her presence, for fear he should have the presumption to hope that time might do any thing in his favor: and it was possible also, that the sentence she would be obliged to pronounce might either cause his death, or force him to commit some extravagant action, which would discover him to her father, who would, perhaps, think her guilty of holding a secret correspondence with him.

These thoughts perplexed her so much, that, hoping to find some relief by unburdening her mind to Lucy,<sup>4</sup> she told her all her uneasiness. Ah! said she to her, looking upon Edward, who had just passed them, how unfortunate do I think myself in being the cause of that passion which makes this illustrious unknown wear away his days in so shameful an obscurity! Yes, Lucy, pursued she, that Edward, whom you regard as one of my father's menial servants, is a person of sublime quality, who submits to this disguise only to have an opportunity of seeing me every day. But why do you seem so surprised? Is it possible that you have not suspected him to be what he is? Has he never unwittingly made any discovery of himself? Have you not surprised him in discourse with his faithful squire, who, certainly, lurks hereabouts to receive his commands, and is haply<sup>5</sup> the confidant of his passion? Has he never entertained you with any conversation about me? Or have you never seen any valuable jewels in his possession by which you suspected him to be not what he appears?

Truly, madam, replied Lucy, I never took him for anybody else but a simple gardener; but now you open my eyes, methinks I can find I have been strangely mistaken; for he does not look like a man of low degree; and he talks quite in another manner from our servants. I never heard him indeed speak of your ladyship, but once; and that was, when he first saw you walking in the garden, he asked our John, if you was not the Marquis's daughter. And he said, you was as beautiful as an angel. As for fine jewels, I never saw any; and I believe he has none; but he has a watch, and that looks as if he was something, madam: nor do I remember to have seen him talk with any stranger that looked like a squire.

Lucy, having thus, with her usual punctuality, answered every question her lady put to her, proceeded to ask her, what she should say, if he should beg her to give her a letter, as the other gentleman had done.

You must by no means take it, replied Arabella: my compassion had before like to have been fatal to me.<sup>6</sup> If he discovers his quality to me, I shall know in what manner to treat him.

They were in this part of their discourse, when a noise they heard at some distance made Arabella bend her steps to the place from whence it proceeded; and, to her infinite amazement, saw the head gardener, with a stick he had in his hand, give several blows to the concealed hero, who suffered the indignity with admirable patience.

Shocked at seeing a person of quality treated so unworthily, she called out to the gardener to hold his hand, who immediately obeyed; and Edward, seeing the young lady advance, sneaked off, with an air very different from an Oroondates.<sup>7</sup>

For what crime, pray, said Arabella, with a stern aspect, did you treat the person I saw with you so cruelly? He whom you take such unbecoming liberties with, may possibly—But again I ask you, what has he done? You should make some allowance for his want of skill in the abject employment he is in at present.

It is not for his want of skill, madam, said the gardener, that I corrected him; he knows his business very well, if he would mind it; but, madam, I have discovered him—

Discovered him, do you say? interrupted Arabella: and has the knowledge of his condition not been able to prevent such usage? Or rather, has it been the occasion of his receiving it?

His conditions are very bad, madam, returned the gardener; and I am afraid are such as will one day prove the ruin of body and soul too. I have for some time suspected he had bad designs in his head; and just now watched him to the fish-pond, and prevented him from —

O dear! interrupted Lucy, looking pitifully on her lady, whose fair bosom heaved with compassion, I warrant he was going to make away with himself.<sup>8</sup>

No, resumed the gardener, smiling at the mistake, he was only going to make away with<sup>9</sup> some of the carp, which the rogue had caught, and intended, I suppose, to sell; but I threw them into the water again; and if your ladyship had not forbid me, I would have drubbed him soundly for his pains.

Fye! fye! interrupted Arabella, out of breath with shame and vexation: tell me no more of these idle tales.

Then, hastily walking on to hide the blushes which this strange accusation of her illustrious lover had raised in her face, she continued for some time in the greatest perplexity imaginable.

Lucy, who followed her, and could not possibly reconcile what her lady had been telling her concerning Edward, with the circumstance of his stealing the carp, ardently wished to hear her opinion of this matter; but, seeing her deeply engaged with her own thoughts, she would not venture to disturb her.

Arabella indeed had been in such a terrible consternation, that it was some time before she even reconciled appearances to herself; but, as she had a most happy faculty in accommodating every incident to her own wishes and conceptions, she examined this matter so many different ways, drew so many conclusions, and fancied so many mysteries in the most indifferent actions of the supposed noble unknown, that she remained, at last, more than ever confirmed in the opinion, that he was some great personage, whom her beauty had forced to assume an appearance unworthy of himself: when Lucy, no longer able to keep silence, drew off her attention from those pleasing images, by speaking of the carp-stealing affair again.

Arabella, whose confusion returned at that disagreeable sound, charged her, in an angry tone, never to mention so injurious a suspicion any more: For, in fine, said she to her, do you imagine a person of his rank could be guilty of stealing carp? Alas! pursued she, sighing, he had, indeed, some fatal design; and, doubtless, would have executed it, had not this fellow so luckily prevented him.

But Mr. Woodbind, madam, said Lucy, saw the carp in his hand: I wonder what he was going to do with them.

Still, resumed Arabella, extremely chagrined, still will you wound my ears with that horrid sound? I tell you, obstinate and foolish wench, that this unhappy man went thither to die; and if he really caught the fish, it was to conceal his design from Woodbind: his great mind could not suggest to him, that it was possible he might be suspected of a baseness like that this ignorant fellow accused him of; therefore he took no care about it, being wholly possessed by his despairing thoughts.

However, madam, said Lucy, your ladyship may prevent his going to the fish-pond again, by laying your commands upon him to live.

I shall do all that I ought, answered Arabella; but my care for the safety of other persons must not make me forget what I owe to my own.

* * *<sup>1</sup> [She] was at a great loss in what manner to comfort her despairing lover, without raising expectations she had no inclination to confirm: but she was delivered from her perplexity by the news of his having left the Marquis's service; which she attributed to some new design he had formed to obtain her; and Lucy, who always thought as her lady did, was of the same opinion; though it was talked among the servants, that Edward feared a discovery of more tricks, and resolved not to stay till he was disgracefully dismissed.

JAMES FORDYCE

James Fordyce (1720–1796) was a Scottish clergyman who found success preaching in fashionable London. His best-known work was the moralizing Sermons to Young Women (1766). In this excerpt from that text, he urgently “caution[s]” young women “against that fatal poison to virtue, which is conveyed by profligate and by improper books”—novels above all. His condemnation of novels was heated but not unusual. Many eighteenth-century writers worried about the dangerous moral and social implications of such fiction, especially when read by supposedly more impressionable women and children.

Fordyce had a misogynistic, patronizing view of women: no “charm of understanding, or of person,” he counsels, can “compensate the want of soft compliance and meek submission in a woman.” Years later, in 1792, feminist writer Mary Wollstonecraft would roundly condemn these views: in a delicious parallel to Fordyce’s caution about novels, she insisted that his sermons (with their dangerous privileging of women’s meekness) were not safe for young women to read.

From Sermon IV: On Female Virtue

When entertainment is made the vehicle of instruction, nothing surely can be more harmless, agreeable, or useful. To prohibit young minds the perusal of any writings, where wisdom addresses the affections in the language of the imagination, may be sometimes well meant, but must be always injudicious.<sup>1</sup> Some such writings undoubtedly there are; the offspring of real genius enlightened by knowledge of the world, and prompted, it is to be hoped, by zeal for the improvement of youth.

Happy indeed beyond the vulgar storytelling tribe and highly to be praised is he, who, to fine sensibilities and a lively fancy superadding clear and comprehensive views of men and manners, writes to the heart with simplicity and chasteness, through a series of adventures well conducted, and relating chiefly to scenes in ordinary life; where the solid joys of virtue, and her sacred sorrows, are strongly contrasted with the hollowness and the horrors of vice; where, by little unexpected yet natural incidents of the tender and domestic kind, so peculiarly<sup>2</sup> fitted to touch the soul, the most important lessons are impressed, and the most generous sentiments awakened; where, to say no more, distress occasioned often by indiscretions, consistent with many degrees of worth, yet clouding it for the time, is worked up into a storm, such as to call forth the principles of fortitude and wisdom, confirming and brightening them by that exertion; till at length the bursting tempest is totally, or in a great measure dispelled, so that the hitherto suspended and agitated reader is either relieved entirely, and delighted even to transport, or has left upon his mind at the conclusion a mixture of virtuous sadness, which serves to fasten the moral deeper, and to produce an unusual sobriety in all his passions.

Amongst the few works of this kind which I have seen, I cannot but look on those of Mr. Richardson<sup>3</sup> as well entitled to the first rank; an author, of whom an indisputable judge has with equal truth and energy pronounced, "that he taught the passions to move at the command of reason":<sup>4</sup> I will venture to add, an author, to whom your sex are under singular obligations for his uncommon attention to their best interests; but particularly for presenting, in a character sustained throughout with inexpressible pathos and delicacy, the most exalted standard of female excellence that was ever held up to their imitation. I would be understood to except that part of Clarissa's conduct, which the author meant to exhibit as exceptionable.<sup>5</sup> Setting this aside, we find in her character a beauty, a sweetness, an artlessness—what shall I say more?—a sanctity of sentiment and manner, which, I own for my part, I have never seen equaled in any book of that sort; yet such, at the same time, as appears no way impracticable for any woman who is ambitious of excelling.

Besides the beautiful productions of that incomparable pen, there seem to me to be very few, in the style of novel, that you can read with safety, and yet fewer that you can read with advantage.—What shall we say of certain books, which we are assured (for we have not read them) are in their nature so shameful, in their tendency so pestiferous,<sup>6</sup> and which contain such rank treason against the royalty of virtue, such horrible violation of all decorum, that she who can bear to peruse them must in her soul be a prostitute, let her reputation in life be what it will. But can it be true—say, ye chaste stars, that with innumerable eyes inspect the midnight behavior of mortals—can it be true, that any young woman, pretending to decency, should endure for a moment to look on this infernal brood of futility and lewdness?

Nor do we condemn those writings only, that, with an effrontery which defies the laws of God and men, carry on their very forehead the mark of the beast.<sup>7</sup> We consider the general run of novels as utterly unfit for you. Instruction they convey none. They paint scenes of pleasure and passion altogether improper for you to behold, even with the mind's eye. Their descriptions are often loose and luscious in a high degree; their representations of love between the sexes are almost universally overstrained. All is dotage,<sup>8</sup> or despair; or else ranting swelled into burlesque. In short, the majority of their lovers are either mere lunatics, or mock-heroes. A sweet sensibility, a charming tenderness, a delightful anguish, exalted generosity, heroic worth, and refinement of thought; how seldom are these best ingredients of virtuous love mixed with any judgment or care in the composition of their principal characters!* * *<sup>9</sup>

To come back to the species of writing which so many young women are apt to dote upon, the offspring of our present novelists, I mean the greater part; with whom we may join the common herd of playwrights. Beside the remarks already made on the former, is it not manifest with respect to both, that such books lead to a false taste of life and happiness; that they represent vices as frailties, and frailties as virtues; that they engender notions of love unspeakably perverting and inflammatory; that they overlook in a great measure the finest part of the passion, which one would suspect the authors had never experienced; that they turn it most commonly into an affair of wicked or of frivolous gallantry; that on many occasions they take off from the worst crimes committed in the prosecution of it, the horror which ought ever to follow them; on some occasions actually reward those very crimes, and almost on all leave the female reader with this persuasion at best, that it is their business to get husbands at any rate, and by whatever means? Add to the account, that repentance for the foulest injuries which can be done the sex is generally represented as the pang, or rather the start, of a moment; and holy wedlock converted into a sponge, to wipe out at a single stroke every stain of guilt and dishonor, which it was possible for the hero of the piece to contract.—Is this a kind of reading calculated to improve the principles, or preserve the sobriety, of female minds?<sup>1</sup> How much are those young women to be pitied, that have no wise parents or faithful tutors to direct them in relation to the books which are, or which are not, fit for them to read! How much are those parents and tutors to be commended, who with particular solicitude watch over them in so important a concern!

I conclude with saying, that the subject of this discourse has unavoidably suggested some ideas, which, had we not undertaken to address young ladies at large, we should have certainly suppressed for the sake of more modest natures, whom we would not unwillingly pain, no not for a moment. But such we hope will be candid enough to excuse us, if, by throwing out to others what to them would have been unnecessary, we may be happily instrumental in rescuing were it but one of their sex from the slavery of vice, or defending a single innocent from its snares.

CLARA REEVE

Like many successful women writers of the eighteenth century, Clara Reeve (1729–1807) wrote out of financial necessity, but unlike most, she did not move in metropolitan circles. Reeve's most discussed works now, the Gothic novel The Old English Baron (1777, 1778) and her literary history The Progress of Romance (1785), were first printed in the town of Colchester, near her home in Ipswich. The printing of books, pamphlets, and catalogs had increasingly spread to urban centers outside London as the century wore on, though the capital remained the undisputed center of the literary world. Never marrying, Reeve managed her literary career herself, corresponding with the booksellers in London to see nearly all of her works into print there, including novels, poems, and a treatise on women's education. Her provincial origins and life did not prevent Reeve from becoming famous. For over a century, The Old English Baron was read as a classic English novel, often printed together with her inspiration for it, Horace Walpole's Gothic novel The Castle of Otranto (1764)—though Reeve aims, as she says in her preface to her work, to surpass Walpole by avoiding supernatural extravagances.

Unlike The Old English Baron, Reeve's The Progress of Romance did not initially attract much attention and remained mostly unnoticed even by scholars until recently. It presents a learned history of prose fictional narrative, from ancient Greek romances (which she calls "the parents of the rest") to the novels of the eighteenth century. Reeve asserts the comprehensiveness and rigor of her scholarship: "while many eminent writers," she says in the preface, have "skimmed over the surface of this subject, it seemed to me that none of them had sounded the depths of it." Written as a dialogue between two women and a man—a form intended to enliven what otherwise might be a dry discourse—The Progress says romances are "neither so contemptible, nor so dangerous a kind of reading” as is commonly supposed, compares them favorably to epic poems, and recognizes their antiquity, giving examples from not only Greek but also Arabic and even Egyptian literature. (She appends an Egyptian tale, “The History of Charoba, Queen of Egypt,” to the second volume of The Progress.) While firmly distinguishing romances from the modern novel in the first excerpt reprinted here, she does so not to denigrate the former, as in many other efforts to define the novel in the period, but to identify two species of the same genus. She also offers suggestive remarks on the novel’s special power over the minds of readers.

In Reeve’s account, the lineaments of later critical histories of the novel already appear. She describes the tradition of women writers starting with Aphra Behn as crucial to the modern novel’s early development. Within this account, she offers what would become a common narrative: early women novelists such as Behn and Delarivier Manley were scandalous and sexually improper, she says, but by the mid-eighteenth century a more morally edifying kind of women’s fiction began to hold sway—a transition exemplified in the career of Eliza Haywood, who redeemed herself in her final works. (Recently scholars have told a more complex story, noting that women novelists from the beginning presented the public with works at diverse points on the scale of sexual morality.) Reeve also provides illuminating terms in which to distinguish “the two most eminent writers of our country,” Richardson and Fielding—a contrast inescapable in taxonomies of English novels in the coming centuries. The final selection in this cluster recognizes not only the dangers of indiscriminate reading in the collections of circulating libraries but also how impracticable any attempt to ban fiction would be, given the prevalence of fictional stories throughout the best literature, ancient and modern. Reeve supports the reading of novels as long as it is subject to parental and other culturally authoritative monitors, and to a well-developed moral monitor within.

[NOVEL AND ROMANCE]

Euphrasia. * * * The word novel in all languages signifies something new. It was first used to distinguish these works from romance, though they have lately been confounded together and are frequently mistaken for each other.

Sophronia. But how will you draw the line of distinction, so as to separate them effectually, and prevent future mistakes?

Euphrasia. I will attempt this distinction, and I presume if it is properly done it will be followed—if not, you are but where you were before. The romance is an heroic fable, which treats of fabulous persons and things.—The novel is a picture of real life and manners, and of the times in which it is written. The romance in lofty and elevated language describes what never happened nor is likely to happen.—The novel gives a familiar relation of such things as pass every day before our eyes, such as may happen to our friend, or to ourselves; and the perfection of it is to represent every scene in so easy and natural a manner, and to make them appear so probable, as to deceive us into a persuasion (at least while we are reading) that all is real, until we are affected by the joys or distresses of the persons in the story, as if they were our own.

Hortensius. You have well distinguished, and it is necessary to make this distinction.—I clearly perceive the difference between the romance and novel, and am surprised they should be confounded together.

Euphrasia. I have sometimes thought it has been done insidiously, by those who endeavor to render all writings of both kinds contemptible.

Sophronia. I have generally observed that men of learning have spoken of them with the greatest disdain, especially collegians.<sup>3</sup>

Euphrasia. Take care what you say my friend, they are a set of men who are not to be offended with impunity. Yet they deal in romances, though of a different kind.—Some have taken up an opinion<sup>4</sup> upon trust in others whose judgment they prefer to their own.—Others having seen a few of the worst or dullest among them,<sup>5</sup> have judged of all the rest by them;—just as some men affect to despise our sex, because they have only conversed with the worst part of it.

Hortensius. Your sex knows how to retort upon ours, and to punish us for our offenses against you.—Proceed however.<sup>6</sup>

[WOMEN NOVELISTS]

Euphrasia. *** Let us next consider some of the early novels of our own country.

We had early translations of the best novels of all other countries, but for a long time produced very few of our own. One of the earliest I know of is the Cyprian Academy, by Robert Baron<sup>7</sup> in the reign of Charles the First.—Among our early novel-writers we must reckon Mrs. Behn.<sup>8</sup>—There are strong marks of genius in all this lady's works, but unhappily, there are some parts of them very improper to be read by or recommended to virtuous minds, and especially to youth.—She wrote in an age, and to a court of licentious manners,<sup>9</sup> and perhaps we ought to ascribe to these causes the loose turn of her stories.—Let us do justice to her merits, and cast the veil of compassion over her faults.—She died in the year 1689, and lies buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.<sup>1</sup>—The inscription will show how high she stood in estimation at that time.

Hortensius. Are you not partial to the sex of this genius?—when you excuse in her, what you would not to a man?

Euphrasia. Perhaps I may, and you must excuse me if I am so, especially as this lady had many fine and amiable qualities, besides her genius for writing.

Sophronia. Pray let her rest in peace—you were speaking of the inscription on her monument, I do not remember it.

Euphrasia. It is as follows:

Mrs. Aphra Behn, 1689.

Here lies a proof that wit can never be Defense enough against mortality.

Let me add that Mrs. Behn will not be forgotten, so long as the tragedy of Oroonoko is acted; it was from her story of that illustrious African, that Mr. Southerne<sup>2</sup> wrote that play, and the most affecting parts of it are taken almost literally from her.

Hortensius. Peace be to her manes!<sup>3</sup> I shall not disturb her, or her works.

Euphrasia. I shall not recommend them to your perusal, Hortensius.

The next female writer of this class is Mrs. Manley,<sup>4</sup> whose works are still more exceptionable than Mrs. Behn's, and as much inferior to them in point of merit.—She hoarded up all the public and private scandal within her reach, and poured it forth, in a work too well known in the last age, though almost forgotten in the present; a work that partakes of the style of the romance, and the novel. I forbear the name, and further observations on it, as Mrs. Manley's works are sinking gradually into oblivion. I am sorry to say they were once in fashion, which obliges me to mention them, otherwise I had rather be spared the pain of disgracing an author of my own sex.

Sophronia. It must be confessed that these books of the last age were of worse tendency than any of those of the present.

Euphrasia. My dear friend, there were bad books at all times, for those who sought them.—Let us pass them over in silence.

Hortensius. No not yet.—Let me help your memory to one more lady-author of the same class.—Mrs. Haywood.<sup>5</sup> She has the same claim upon you as those you have last mentioned.

Euphrasia. I had intended to have mentioned Mrs. Haywood though in a different way, but I find you will not suffer any part of her character to escape you.

Hortensius. Why should she be spared any more than the others?

Euphrasia. Because she repented of her faults, and employed the latter part of her life in expiating the offences of the former.<sup>6</sup>—There is reason to believe that the examples of the two ladies we have spoken of seduced Mrs. Haywood into the same track; she certainly wrote some amorous novels in her youth, and also two books of the same kind as Mrs. Manley's capital work,<sup>7</sup> all of which I hope are forgotten.

Hortensius. I fear they will not be so fortunate, they will be known to posterity by the infamous immortality conferred upon them by Pope in his Dunciad.<sup>8</sup>

Euphrasia. Mr. Pope was severe in his castigations, but let us be just to merit of every kind. Mrs. Haywood had the singular good fortune to recover a lost reputation, and the yet greater honor to atone for her errors.—She devoted the remainder of her life and labors to the service of virtue. Mrs. Haywood was one of the most voluminous female writers that ever England produced, none of her latter works are destitute of merit, though they do not rise to the highest pitch of excellence.—Betsy Thoughtless is reckoned her best novel; but those works by which she is most likely to be known to posterity are the Female Spectator and the Invisible Spy.<sup>9</sup> This lady died so lately as the year 1758.<sup>1</sup>

Sophronia. I have heard it often said that Mr. Pope was too severe in his treatment of this lady; it was supposed that she had given him some private offense, which he resented publicly as was too much his way.

Hortensius. That is very likely, for he was not of a forgiving disposition.—If I have been too severe also, you ladies must forgive me in behalf of your sex.

Euphrasia. Truth is sometimes severe.—Mrs. Haywood's wit and ingenuity were never denied. I would be the last to vindicate her faults, but the first to celebrate her return to virtue, and her atonement for them.

Sophronia. May her first writings be forgotten, and the last survive to do her honor!

[RICHARDSON AND FIELDING]

Hortensius. You have not yet made mention of the most eminent writers of our country, Richardson and Fielding.

Euphrasia. I hope you did not think it possible for me to forget them. Mr. Richardson published his works at a considerable distance of time from each other. Pamela<sup>2</sup> was the first; it met with a very warm reception, as it well deserved to do.—I remember my mother and aunts being shut up in the parlor reading Pamela, and I took it very hard that I was excluded.—I have since seen it put into the hands of children, so much are their understandings riper than mine, or so much are our methods of education improved since that time.

Sophronia. It is a general<sup>3</sup> mistake in regard to the youth of our time, they are put too forward in all respects. Let us return to Pamela, I can remember the time when this book was the fashion, the person that had not read Pamela was disqualified for conversation, of which it was the principal subject for a long time.—You will give us your opinion of this, and the other words of Mr. Richardson?

Euphrasia. To praise the works of Mr. Richardson is to hold a candle to the sun, their merits are well understood in other countries besides our own; they have been translated into French, Italian, and German, and they are read in English frequently, by the people of the first rank in all the politest countries in Europe.

A lady of quality in France sent an epigram to one of Mr. Richardson's family soon after his death, which I will give you here.

* * * <sup>4</sup>

Richardson is now no more!
Then may the human heart deplore<sup>5</sup>
Its most profound investigator,
Its patron, friend, and regulator,

And its most perfect legislator.

Hortensius. Very close indeed to the original.

Sophronia. But your remarks on Richardson's works?

Euphrasia. I will hazard a few remarks on them, which perhaps I may be allowed, because no person whatever has read them over with more pleasure and delight than myself.

It seems that Pamela is the chef d'oeuvre<sup>6</sup> of Mr. Richardson.—The originality, the beautiful simplicity of the manners and language of the charming maid, are interesting past expression; and find a short way to the heart, which it engages by its best and noblest feelings.—There needs no other proof of a bad and corrupted heart, than its being insensible to the distresses, and incapable<sup>7</sup> to the rewards of virtue.—I should want no other criterion of a good or a bad heart, than the manner in which a young person was affected by reading Pamela.

Hortensius. Your plaudit is a warm one.—But Richardson is a writer all your own; your sex are more obliged to him and Addison,<sup>8</sup> than to all other men-authors.

Euphrasia. I deny that.—We have many other redoubtable champions as I shall bring proof enough,—and no man is degraded by defending us, for the female cause is the cause of virtue.

Hortensius. I mean not to degrade your champions or their cause.—But let us hear your critique on Mr. Richardson's other works?

Euphrasia. It was yourself who digressed from the subject. I have but little more to say of them; that all are of capital merit is indisputable; but it seems to me that Pamela has the most originality.—Grandison the greatest regularity and equality.—Clarissa the highest graces, and most defects.<sup>9</sup>

Mr. Richardson was besides the first who wrote novels in the epistolary style, and he was truly an original writer.

* * *

Euphrasia. The next author upon the list, and whom Hortensius feared I should forget, is Henry Fielding, Esq., whose works are universally known and admired.—As I consider wit only as a secondary merit, I must beg leave to observe that his writings are as much inferior to Richardson's in morals and exemplary characters, as they are superior in wit and learning.—Young men of warm passions and not strict principles are always desirous to shelter themselves under the sanction of mixed characters, wherein virtue is allowed to be predominant.—In this light the character of Tom Jones is capable of doing much mischief; and for this reason a translation of this book was prohibited in France.<sup>1</sup>—On the contrary no harm can possibly arise from the imitation of a perfect character, though the attempt should fail of the original.

Sophronia. This is an indisputable truth—there are many objectionable scenes in Fielding's works, which I think Hortensius will not defend.

Hortensius. My objections were in character, and yours are so likewise; as you have defended Richardson, so I will defend Fielding. I allow there is some foundation for your remarks, nevertheless in all Fielding's works, virtue has always the superiority she ought to have, and challenges the honors that are justly due to her, the general tenor of them is in her favor, and it were happy for us, if our language had no greater cause of complaint in her behalf.

Euphrasia. There we will agree with you.—Have you any further observations to make upon Fielding's writings?

Hortensius. Since you refer this part of your task to me, I will offer a few more remarks.—Fielding's Amelia<sup>2</sup> is in much lower estimation than his Joseph Andrews, or Tom Jones; which have both received the stamp of public applause. He likewise wrote several dramatic pieces of various merits,<sup>3</sup> but these and his other works have no place in our present retrospect.—Lest you should think me too partial to the merits of this writer, I will give you the sentence of an historian upon him. "The genius of Cervantes" (says Dr. Smollett) "was transfused into the novels of Fielding, who painted the characters, and ridiculed the follies of life, with equal strength, humor, and propriety.”<sup>4</sup>

Euphrasia. We are willing to join with you in paying the tribute due to Fielding’s genius, humor, and knowledge of mankind, but he certainly painted human nature as it is, rather than as it ought to be.

[CIRCULATING LIBRARIES]

Euphrasia. A circulating library<sup>5</sup> is indeed a great evil—young people are allowed to subscribe to them, and to read indiscriminately all they contain; and thus both food and poison are conveyed to the young mind together.

Hortensius. I should suppose that if books of the worst kind were excluded, still there would be enough to lay a foundation of idleness and folly.—A person used to this kind of reading will be disgusted with everything serious or solid, as a weakened and depraved stomach rejects plain and wholesome food.

Sophronia. There is truth and justice in your observation—but how to prevent it?

Hortensius. There are yet more and greater evils behind. The seeds of vice and folly are sown in the heart—the passions are awakened—false expectations are raised.—A young woman is taught to expect adventures and intrigues—she expects to be addressed in the style of these books, with the language of flattery and adulation.—If a plain man addresses her in rational terms and pays her the greatest of compliments—that of desiring to spend his life with her—that is not sufficient, her vanity is disappointed, she expects to meet a hero in romance.

Euphrasia. No, Hortensius—not a hero in romance, but a fine gentleman in a novel—you will not make the distinction.

Hortensius. I ask your pardon, I agreed to the distinction and therefore ought to observe it.

Euphrasia. I would not have interrupted you on this punctilio;<sup>6</sup> but let us walk into the house, and pursue the subject in the library.

Hortensius. Now<sup>7</sup> you are armed with your extracts, you think yourself invulnerable.

Euphrasia. I will not attempt to contradict you, unless I have good reason for it.—I beg you to proceed with your remarks.

Hortensius. From this kind of reading, young people fancy themselves capable of judging of men and manners, and that they are knowing, while involved<sup>8</sup> in the profoundest ignorance. They believe themselves wiser than their parents and guardians, whom they treat with contempt and ridicule.—Thus armed with ignorance, conceit, and folly, they plunge into the world and its dissipations, and who can wonder if they become its victims? For such as the foundation is, such will be the superstructure.

Euphrasia. All this is undoubtedly true, but at the same time would you exclude all works of fiction from the young reader?—In this case you would deprive him of the pleasure and improvement he might receive from works of genius, taste, and morality.

Hortensius. Yes, I would serve them as the priest did Don Quixote's library, burn the good ones for being found in bad company.<sup>9</sup>

Euphrasia. That is being very severe, especially if you consider how far your execution would extend.—If you would prohibit reading all works of fiction, what will become of your favorites the great ancients, as well as the most ingenious and enlightened modern writers?

Sophronia. Surely this is carrying the prohibition too far, and though it may sound well in theory, it would be utterly impracticable.

Hortensius. I do not deny that.—There are many things to be wished, that are not to be hoped. I see no way to cure this vice of the times, but by extirpating the cause of it.

Euphrasia. Pray Hortensius, is all this severity in behalf of our sex or your own?

Hortensius. Of both.—Yet yours are most concerned in my remonstrance for they read more of these books than ours, and consequently are most hurt by them.

Euphrasia. You will then become a knight errant, to combat with the windmills, which your imagination represents as giants;<sup>1</sup> while in the mean time you leave a side unguarded.

Hortensius. And you have found it out.—Pray tell me without metaphors your meaning in plain English?

Euphrasia. It seems to me that you are unreasonably severe upon these books, which you suppose to be appropriated to our sex (which however is not the case)—not considering how many books of worse tendency are put into the hands of the youth of your own, without scruple.

Hortensius. Indeed! how will you bring proofs of that assertion?

Euphrasia. I will not go far for them. I will fetch them from the school books, that generally make a part of the education of young men.—They are taught the history—the mythology—the morals—of the great ancients, whom you and all learned men revere.—But with these, they learn also—their idolatry—their follies—their vices—and everything that is shocking to virtuous manners. Lucretius teaches them that fear first made gods<sup>2</sup>—that men grew out of the earth like trees, and that the indulgence of the passions and appetites is the truest wisdom. Juvenal and Persius<sup>3</sup> describe such scenes as I may venture to affirm that romance and novel writers of any credit would blush at—and Virgil, the modest and delicate Virgil, informs them of many things, they had better be ignorant of.—As a woman I cannot give this argument its full weight—but a hint is sufficient—and I presume you will not deny the truth of my assertion.

Hortensius. I am astonished—admonished—and convinced!—I cannot deny the truth of what you have advanced, I confess that a reformation is indeed wanting in the mode of education of the youth of our sex.

Sophronia. Of both sexes you may say.—We will not condemn yours and justify our own.—You are convinced, and Euphrasia will use her victory generously I am certain.

Euphrasia. You judge rightly.—I do not presume to condemn indiscriminately the books used in the education of youth; but surely they might be better selected, and some omitted, without any disadvantage.—I fear there is little prospect of such a general reformation as Hortensius generously wishes for. If any method can be found to alleviate these evils, it must be lenient—gradual—and practicable.—Let us then try to find out some expedient, with respect to those kind of books, which are our proper subject.

As this kind of reading is so common, and so much in everybody's power, it is the more incumbent on parents and guardians to give young people a good taste for reading, and above all to lay the foundation of good principles from their very infancy; to make them read what is really good, and by forming their taste teach to despise paltry books of every kind. When they come to maturity of reason, they will scorn to run over<sup>4</sup> a circulating library, but will naturally aspire to read the best books of all kinds.

WILLIAM HOGARTH

1697–1764

William Hogarth was a Londoner born and bred; the life of the city, both high and low, fills his work. His early life was hard. When his father, a writer and teacher, failed in business, the family was confined to the area of the Fleet, the debtor's prison. Hogarth never forgot "the cruel treatment" of his father by booksellers, and he resolved to make his living without relying on dealers; he would always be aggressively independent. Apprenticed as an engraver, he trained himself to sketch scenes quickly or catch them in memory. He also learned to paint, studying with the serjeant painter to the king, Sir James Thornhill, whose daughter he married (late in life Hogarth himself would become serjeant painter). Gradually he won a reputation for portraits and conversation pieces—group portraits in which members of a family or assembly interact in a social situation. But his popular fame was forged by sets of pictures that told a story: A Harlot's Progress (1731–32), A Rake's Progress (1734–35), and Marriage A-la-Mode (1743–45). First Hogarth painted these Modern Moral Subjects (as he called them), then prints were made and sold in large editions. He also found new ways to market and protect his work; a copyright bill to ban cheap imitations of prints was known as "Hogarth's Act." Despite this success, however, his ambition to redefine British standards of art led to frustration. The high regard and high prices for continental old masters were too well entrenched to be undermined. Hogarth did not get prestigious commissions, and his Analysis of Beauty (1753), an effort to fix “the fluctuating ideas of taste” by appealing to practical observations, not academic rules, was poorly received. Political and aesthetic controversies embittered his final years.

Writers have always loved Hogarth’s satiric art, and many have claimed him as one of their own. Swift, Fielding, and Sterne associated their work with his; Horace Walpole considered him more “a writer of comedy with a pencil” than a painter; Charles Lamb compared him to Shakespeare; and William Hazlitt included him among the great English comic writers. This emphasis may slight Hogarth’s importance in the history of art. His attempts to found a British school that looked at life and nature directly, not through a haze of ideas or reverence for the past, and to give pleasure to common people, not only to critics and connoisseurs, opened the eyes of many artists to come. But Hogarth is also a great storyteller, someone to read. Like novels and plays, his pictures have plots and morals; they ask us not only to look but also to think. Yet looking and thinking are always intertwined. The mind delights in riddles, according to Hogarth; and as he revised his work he stuffed in more and more clues, like a mystery writer. A feast of interpretation draws the reader in. So many expressive details crowd the pictures, so many keys to character and meaning, that viewers often become obsessed with figuring them out. Even inanimate objects can speak; playwrights rely on words, as Walpole pointed out, but “it was reserved to Hogarth to write a scene of furniture.”

The furniture is particularly eloquent in Marriage A-la-Mode; note, for example, the fallen chairs in Plates 2 and 6. Hogarth took special pains with this series. The audience at which he aimed, as well as the subject matter, belonged to high society; and the art too is highly refined. A sinuous line weaves through each picture, leading the reader on, and each piece of bric-a-brac carries a message of lavish excess. Yet the story itself is brutally straightforward. A disastrous forced marriage stands at the center: a rich but miserly merchant buys the worthless son of an aristocrat for his restless daughter, and with nothing in common the couple destroy one another. The crisis of values that Hogarth depicts was bringing about radical changes in English life. In the tension between a fading aristocracy, both morally and financially bankrupt, and an upwardly mobile middle class, greedy for power but culturally insecure, the marriage reflects a society that has lost all sense of right and wrong. The artist plays no favorites. The aristocratic Squanderfields are not only vain, effete, and dissipated but also lacking in taste; the wan mythological paintings on their walls are just the sort of pretentious, overpriced art that Hogarth hates. But the vulgar Dutch art on the merchant's walls (in Plate 6) seems even worse, and his daughter falls for every extravagant, spurious fashion (in Plate 4). Nor do the parasites who live off these easy marks offer any hope. Lawyer and doctor, bawd and servant pave the road to ruin. Hogarth's satire warns against the spreading corruption of modern times, when self-interest eats into marriage and old values die. Look hard, he tells the public. These objects make up the world we live in. We might become these people.

Many commentaries have been written on Hogarth's pictures. The notes printed here were supplied by the editors of this volume.

Marriage A-la-Mode

Plate 1. The Marriage Contract. Lord Squanderfield points to the family tree, going back to William the Conqueror, that his son will bring to the marriage. Coronets are blazed all over the room, from the top of the canopy at the upper left to the lower right on the prostrate dog's side, incised just behind the shoulder. The earl, though hobbled by gout, is proud. But he has run out of money: construction has stopped on the Palladian mansion seen through the window. Sitting across from him, a squinting merchant grasps the marriage settlement. Some of the coins and banknotes he has placed on the table have been taken up by a scrawny usurer, who hands the earl a mortgage in return. At the right the betrothed sit back to back, uncaring as the dogs chained to each other below. The vacuous viscount pinches snuff and gazes at himself in a mirror, which ominously reflects the image of lawyer Silvertongue, who sharpens his pen as he bends unctuously over the bride-to-be. Pouting, she twirls her wedding ring in a handkerchief. Disasters from mythology cover the walls. A bombastic portrait of the earl as Jupiter, astride a cannon, dominates the room; and in a candle sconce on the right Medusa glowers over the scene.

Plate 2. After the Marriage. By now the couple are used to ignoring each other. The morning after a spree, the rumped, exhausted viscount slouches in a chair. His broken sword has dropped on the carpet, and a lapdog sniffs at a woman's cap in his pocket—souvenirs of the night. Lolling and stretching in an unladylike pose, his wife too is half asleep. She has spent the night home but not alone. Hoyle on Whist lies before her, cards are scattered on the floor, and the overturned chair, book of music, and violin cases suggest that some player may have departed in haste. A steward carries away a sheaf of bills—only one paid—and the household ledger; a Methodist (Regeneration is in his pocket), he petitions heaven to look down on these heathens. Oriental idols decorate the mantel over the fireplace, surmounted by a broken-nosed Roman bust that frowns like the steward and a painting of Cupid playing the bagpipes. On the left, amid the shrubbery of a rococo clock, a cat leers over fish and a Buddha smiles. In the next room, a dozing servant fails to notice that a candle has set fire to a chair. Next to a row of saints, a curtain does not quite cover a bawdy painting from which a naked foot peeps.

Plate 3. The Scene with the Quack. The husband has come to this chamber of medical horrors in search of a cure. The pillbox he holds toward the quack has not done its job, and he raises his cane as if with a playful threat. Evidently the little girl who stands between his legs is infected. She dabs a sore on her lip, and her ageless face may hint that she is not as young and pure as she looks. Her cap resembles the cap in Plate 2; she is the husband's mistress. Perhaps the beauty spot on his neck also covers a sore. The bowlegged Monsieur de la Pillule comfortably wipes his glasses; he has seen all this before. Between the two men an angry woman, fortified by a massive hoop skirt, opens a knife. She may be the wife of the quack, defending her man, or else a bawd who resents the charge that her girls are damaged goods. Medical oddities and monstrosities clutter the room, along with portents of death. The viscount's cane points to a cabinet where a wigged head looks at a skeleton that seems to be groping a cadaver; the tripod above evokes a gallows tree. At the far left, in front of a laboratory door, are two of the doctor's inventions: machines for setting bones and uncorking bottles. Their similarity to instruments of torture hints at how useful the doctor's assistance will be.

Plate 4. The Countess's Levee. In her bedchamber at rising (levée; French), the countess receives some guests and puts on a show. Her husband is now earl (note the coronets), and they have a child (note the rattle on her chair). While a hairdresser curls her locks, she hangs on the words of Silvertongue, who makes himself at home (note his portrait on the upper right wall). Tonight they will be going to a masquerade ball, like the one on the screen he gestures toward; his left hand holds the tickets. At the far right a puffy, bedizened castrato sings, accompanied by a flute. His audience includes a self-absorbed dandy in curl-papers; a man who appreciatively smirks and opens his hand, from which a fan dangles; a snoring husband, holding his riding-crop like a baton; and his enraptured wife, who leans forward as if about to swoon. Unobserved by the others, a Black servant, bearing a cup of chocolate, smiles in amazement at these precious airs. At the lower left another black servant, a boy in a turban, grins at gewgaws purchased at an auction. His finger points both to Actaeon's horns, the sign of a cuckold, and to the couple as they arrange their tryst. Wall paintings illustrate unnatural sex: Lot's seduction by his daughters, Jupiter embracing Io, and the rape of Ganymede.

Plate 5. The Death of the Earl. The melodramatic tableau at the center, as the earl totters toward death and the countess kneels to beg forgiveness, imitates paintings of Christ descending from the cross while Mary Magdalen mourns. But the surroundings are sordid. At a house of ill repute, the Turk's Head Bagnio, the countess and Silvertongue have been surprised in bed. The earl has broken in (key and socket on the floor) and drawn his sword, and the lawyer has run him through. As the horrified owner and constable enter, under a watchman's lantern, the killer, still in his nightshirt, flees through a window. A fire, outside the picture on the lower right, casts lurid light on the victim; the shadow of the tongs encircles the murder weapon. Costumed as a nun and friar, the lovers have come from a masquerade, and their discarded masks and clothes show they were in haste. Pills (presumably mercury, prescribed for venereal disease) have spilled from an overturned table on the right, beside an advertisement for the bagnio, a corset, and a bundle of firewood. The portrait of a streetwalker, a squirrel perched on her hand, leers over the countess; on the wall behind the earl an uplifted blade is about to sever a child, in the Judgment of Solomon. At the top left St. Luke, the patron of artists, inscribes these transgressions.

Plate 6. The Death of the Countess. "Counsellor Silvertongues Last Dying Speech," a paper on the floor announces, and a bottle of laudanum has dropped beside it. News of her lover's execution has driven the countess to poison herself. Slumped in a chair, she is already dead; on the far right a doctor steals away. Her father calmly slides the ring from her finger. This is his house; a window with cobwebs and broken panes opens on London Bridge, in the heart of the City. No luxury here. The furnishings are sparse, the floor is bare, and the dining table holds only one egg and a few leftovers, including a pathetic boar's head from which a starving hound is tearing scraps. The art is equally cheap: a pissing boy, a jumbled still life, a pipe set alight by the glowing nose of a drunk. At the center, beneath a coatrack, a stout apothecary (stomach pump and julep in his pocket) points toward the empty bottle in reproof and pokes the servant who brought it—an idiot wearing a coat many sizes too large, the merchant's hand-me-down. The service staff is completed by a withered old woman who holds out the countess's little child for one last hug and kiss. But the mark on the child's cheek and the brace on its leg imply that disease has passed to the next generation. This noble family will have no heir.

JAMES THOMSON

1700–1748

James Thomson, the most popular nature poet of the eighteenth century, did not see London until he was twenty-five years old. He grew up in the picturesque border country of Roxboroughshire in Scotland and, after studying divinity in Edinburgh, went to London in 1725, bringing with him, in addition to a memory well stored with images of the external world, the earliest version of his descriptive poem "Winter" in 405 lines of blank verse. Published in 1726, it soon became popular. Thomson went on to publish "Summer" (1727), "Spring" (1728), and "Autumn" in the first collected edition of The Seasons (1730), to which he added the "Hymn to the Seasons." During the next sixteen years, through constant revisions and additions, the poem grew in length to 5,541 lines. The Seasons continued to be popular well into the Romantic period; between 1730 and 1800 it was printed fifty times. Thomson's last poem, The Castle of Indolence (1748), is a witty imitation of Spenser; it moves from a playful portrait of the idleness of the poet and his friends to a celebration of industry and progress.

The Seasons set the fashion for the poetry of natural description. Generations of readers learned to look at the external world through Thomson's eyes and with the emotions that he had taught them to feel. The eye dominates the literature of external nature during the eighteenth century as the imagination was to do in the poetry of William Wordsworth. And Thomson amazed his readers by his capacity to see: the general effects of light and cloud and foliage or the particular image of a leaf tossed in the gale or the slender feet of a robin or the delicate film of ice at the edge of a brook. He tries to view each season from every perspective, as it might be perceived by a bird in the sky or by the tiniest insect, by God or a painter or Milton or Sir Isaac Newton (whom Thomson commemorated in a popular ode). As the poem grew, it became an omnium gatherum of contemporary ideas and interests: natural history; ideas about the nature of man and society, primitive and civilized; the conception of created nature as a source of religious experience, as an object of religious veneration, and as a continuing revelation of a Creator whose presence fills the world.

From *Autumn

[EVENING AND NIGHT]<sup>1</sup>

The western sun withdraws the shortened day;
And humid evening, gliding o'er the sky,
In her chill progress, to the ground condensed
The vapors throws. Where creeping waters ooze, 1085 Where marshes stagnate, and where rivers wind,
Cluster the rolling fogs, and swim along
The dusky-mantled lawn. Meanwhile the moon,
Full-orbed and breaking through the scattered clouds,
Shows her broad visage in the crimsoned east.
1090 Turned to the sun direct, her spotted disk
(Where mountains rise, umbrageous dales descend,<sup>2</sup>
And caverns deep, as optic tube<sup>o</sup> describes)
A smaller earth, gives all his blaze again,
Void of its flame, and sheds a softer day.
1095 Now through the passing cloud she seems to stoop,
Now up the pure cerulean rides sublime.
Wide the pale deluge<sup>o</sup> floats, and streaming mild
O'er the skied<sup>3</sup> mountain to the shadowy vale,
While rocks and floods reflect the quivering gleam,
1100 The whole air whitens with a boundless tide
Of silver radiance trembling round the world.
But when, half blotted from the sky, her light
Fainting, permits the starry fires to burn
With keener luster through the depth of heaven;
1105 Or quite extinct her deadened orb appears,

And scarce appears, of sickly beamless white;
 Oft in this season, silent from the north
 A blaze of meteors<sup>4</sup> shoots—ensweeping first
 The lower skies, they all at once converge
 1110 High to the crown<sup>5</sup> of heaven, and, all at once
 Relapsing quick, as quickly reascend,
 And mix and thwart,<sup>o</sup> extinguish and renew,
 All ether coursing<sup>6</sup> in a maze of light.
 From look to look, contagious through the crowd,
 1115 The panic runs, and into wondrous shapes
 The appearance throws—armies in meet<sup>o</sup> array,
 Thronged with aerial spears and steeds of fire;
 Till, the long lines of full-extended war
 In bleeding fight commixed, the sanguine flood 1120 Rolls a broad slaughter o’er the plains of heaven.
 As thus they scan the visionary scene,
 On all sides swells the superstitious din,
 Incontinent; and busy frenzy talks
 Of blood and battle; cities overturned, 1125 And late at night in swallowing earthquake sunk,
 Or hideous wrapped in fierce ascending flame;
 Of sallow famine, inundation, storm;
 Of pestilence, and every great distress;
 Empires subversed,<sup>o</sup> when ruling fate has struck 1130 The unalterable hour; even nature’s self
 Is deemed to totter on the brink of time.
 Not so the man of philosophic eye
 And inspect sage:<sup>o</sup> the waving brightness he Curious surveys, inquisitive to know
 1135 The causes and materials, yet unfixed,<sup>7</sup>
 Of this appearance beautiful and new.
 Now black and deep the night begins to fall,
 A shade immense! Sunk in the quenching gloom,
 Magnificent and vast, are heaven and earth.
 1140 Order confounded lies, all beauty void,

Distinction lost, and gay variety
 One universal blot—such the fair power
 Of light to kindle and create the whole.
 Drear is the state of the benighted wretch
 1145 Who then bewildered wanders through the dark Full of pale fancies and chimeras<sup>o</sup> huge;
 Nor visited by one directive ray
 From cottage streaming or from airy hall.
 Perhaps, impatient as he stumbles on,
 1150 Struck from the root of slimy rushes, blue
 The wildfire<sup>8</sup> scatters round, or, gathered, trails
 A length of flame deceitful o'er the moss;
 Whither decoyed by the fantastic blaze,
 Now lost and now renewed, he sinks absorbed,
 1155 Rider and horse, amid the miry gulf—
 While still, from day to day, his pining wife
 And plaintive children his return await,
 In wild conjecture lost. At other times,
 Sent by the better genius of the night,
 1160 Innoxious,<sup>o</sup> gleaming on the horse's mane,
 The meteor<sup>9</sup> sits, and shows the narrow path
 That winding leads through pits of death, or else
 Instructs him how to take the dangerous ford.
 The lengthened night elapsed, the morning
 1165 shines
 Serene, in all her dewy beauty bright,
 Unfolding fair the last autumnal day.
 And now the mounting sun dispels the fog;
 The rigid hoarfrost melts before his beam;
 And, hung on every spray, on every blade
 1170 Of grass, the myriad dewdrops twinkle round.

- Note 1: This passage, like many in The Seasons, went through extensive revisions. The opening lines on the harvest moon shining through fog (1082–1102) originally belonged to “Winter”; the descriptions of the aurora borealis (1108–37) and wildfire (1150–64) first appeared in “Summer.” Scientific and visionary, divine and human perspectives are contrasted and join together in an intricate harmony.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Observation of the moon had revealed shadows (“umbrageous dales”), hence an irregular surface.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: That is, seeming to touch the sky.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Not meteors as we think of them, but the aurora borealis, or northern lights (multicolored, streaming pulses of light in the upper atmosphere). The aurora had often been associated with cosmic battles, in both literature and popular superstition.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: The corona or central ring of the aurora.Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Running through all the upper sky.Return to reference 6

STEPHEN DUCK

1705–1756

Decades before Thomas Gray's famous speculation appeared in "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" (see p. 899) that "some mute inglorious Milton" (line 59) may be hidden among the nation's working people, a writer of natural, untutored literary talent made his voice heard in Britain's literary landscape. Stephen Duck, the most celebrated laboring-class poet of the century, attended a charity school until the age of fourteen, and as he worked as an agricultural laborer by day, by night he read Milton, Dryden, the Spectator, Matthew Prior, and other literature. By 1729 he had begun writing the poems that would make him first a Wiltshire celebrity, then a national one. A pirated edition of three of his poems appeared in 1730 and went through ten editions in that year alone. The volume, which included "The Thresher's Labor," advertised Duck's wages for that job on the title page ("four shillings and six pence per week") and gained him the nickname the "Thresher Poet." That year, he came to the attention of Queen Caroline, who gave him an annuity and a house, and eventually various official posts; after Caroline's death he studied successfully to become a clergyman. But his transformed life did not bring him satisfaction, and he killed himself by drowning in a river behind a tavern.

It is from the 1730 edition that our text is taken. Duck was unhappy with the pirated texts and put out an authorized Poems on Several Occasion in 1736, but the language of the earlier version is fresher and more direct, though it still exhibits his high literary ambitions. He alludes to classical mythology and motifs and (skeptically) to pastoral conventions, and carefully structures "The Thresher's Labor" to follow the seasons of the year, as experienced by farm workers. (Duck consistently uses the pronoun we to position himself as part of a laboring collective, switching to I only when making literary comparisons.) The work is primarily threshing—using a flail inside the barns to separate grain from its stalks—but includes winnowing (separating grain from chaff by dropping it and letting air blow the chaff away, also done indoors), haymaking, and reaping (cutting the crop in the fields at harvest). Duck provides an artful, vivid record of what such a life is like, physically and psychologically. While there are moments of enjoyment, including appreciation of natural beauty, interludes of celebration and rest, and the rhythmic, somatic pleasures of hard work, Duck's poem mostly represents a life of "endless toils," disappointments, noise, sweat, and exhaustion: any instance of relief from these seems little more than a deception. An unnamed "master," a farmer threatened himself by a landlord demanding rent, exerts consistent pressure, declaring his demands and satisfactions with an eye fixed on productivity. The labor exploited to maintain and increase it, Duck wanly concludes, will never end.

Duck was the most prominent and among the first of many laboring-class poets in the eighteenth century who gave the reading public poetically memorable accounts of their lives and work, including Mary Collier (see p. 736), who directly responded to his disparaging comments in "The Thresher's Labor" about "prattling females." Other notable poets who describe women's work first hand include Mary Leapor (see p. 769), and Ann Yearsley, the "Milkmaid Poet" (see p. 1038). Sponsored and condescended to by wealthy patrons, often seen as mere curiosities or tools of the elite in the period's literary culture, these authors speak in vigorous, singular voices heard for the first time in literature, of experiences shared by multitudes of working people, and inaugurate a tradition of laboring-class writing that would transform the literary, social, and political consciousness of the nation.

The Thresher's Labor

The grateful tribute of these rural lays,
Which to her patron's hand<sup>1</sup> the muse conveys, Deign to accept: 'tis just she tribute bring
To him whose bounty gives her life to sing:
To him whose generous favors tune her voice;
5 And bid her 'midst her poverty, rejoice.
Inspired by these, she dares herself prepare,
To sing the toils of each revolving year:
Those endless toils which always grow anew,
And the poor thresher's destined to pursue:
10 Ev'n these with pleasure can the muse rehearse,
When you, and gratitude, command the verse.
Soon as the harvest hath laid bare the plains,
And barns well filled reward the farmer's pains;
What corn<sup>o</sup> each sheaf will yield, intent to hear,
15 And guess from thence the profits of the year;
Or else impending ruin to prevent,
By paying, timely, threatening landlord's rent,
He calls his threshers forth: around we stand,
With deep attention waiting his command.
20 To each our tasks he readily divides,
And pointing, to our different stations guides.
As he directs, to different barns we go;
Here two for wheat, and there for barley two.
But first, to show what he expects to find,
25 These words, or words like these, disclose his mind:
"So dry the corn was carried from the field,
So easily will thresh, so well 'twill yield.
Sure large day's work I well may hope for now;
Come, strip, and try, let's see what you can do."
30 Divested of our clothes, with flail in hand,

At a just distance, front to front<sup>o</sup> we stand;
And first the threshall's<sup>o</sup> gently swung, to prove Whether with just exactness it will move:
That once secure,<sup>o</sup> more quick we whirl them round, 35 From the strong planks our crab-tree staves rebound,
And echoing barns return the rattling sound.
Now in the air our knotty weapons fly;
And now with equal force descend from high:
Down one, one up, so well they keep the time,
40 The Cyclops' hammers could not truer chime;
Nor with more heavy strokes could Aetna groan,
When Vulcan forged the arms for Thetis' son.<sup>2</sup>
In briny streams our sweat descends apace,
Drops from our locks, or trickles down our face.
45 No intermission in our works we know;
The noisy threshall must for ever go.
Their master absent, others safely play;
The sleeping threshall doth itself betray.
Nor yet the tedious labor to beguile,
50 And make the passing minutes sweetly smile.
Can we, like shepherds, tell a merry tale;<sup>3</sup>
The voice is lost, drowned by the noisy flail.
But we may think—Alas! what pleasing thing
Here to the mind can the dull fancy bring?
55 The eye beholds no pleasant object here;
No cheerful sound diverts the listening ear.
The shepherd well may tune his voice to sing,
Inspired by all the beauties of the spring.
No fountains murmur here, no lambkins play,
60 No linnets warble, and no fields look gay.
'Tis all a dull and melancholy scene,
Fit only to provoke the muses' spleen.<sup>o</sup>
When sooty peas we thresh,<sup>4</sup> you scarce can know
Our native color, as from work we go;
65

The sweat, the dust, and suffocating smoke,
Make us so much like Ethiopians look:
We scare our wives, when evening brings us home;
And frightened infants think the bugbear<sup>5</sup> come.
Week after week we this dull task pursue,
70 Unless when winnowing days produce a new;
A new indeed, but frequently a worse,
The threshall yields but to the master's curse:
He counts the bushels, counts how much a day,
Then swears we've idled half our time away.
75 "Why look ye, rogues! D'ye think that this will do?
Your neighbors thresh as much again<sup>o</sup> as you."
Now in our hands we wish our noisy tools,
To drown the hated names of rogues and fools;
But wanting<sup>o</sup> those, we just like schoolboys look,
80 When th'angry master views the blotted book:
They cry their ink was faulty, and their pen;
We, the corn threshes bad, 'twas cut too green.
But now the winter hides his hoary head,
And nature's face is with new beauty spread;
85 The spring appears, and kind refreshing showers
New clothe the field with grass, and deck with flowers.
Next her, the ripening summer presses on,
And Sol<sup>o</sup> begins his longest stage to run:
Before the door our welcome master stands,
90 And tells us the ripe grass requires our hands.<sup>6</sup>
The long much-wished intelligence<sup>o</sup> imparts
Life to our looks, and spirits to our hearts:
We wish the happy season may be fair,
And, joyful, long to breathe in opener air.
95 This change of labor seems to give much ease;<sup>7</sup>
With thoughts of happiness our joy's complete,
There's always bitter mingled with the sweet.
When morn does through the eastern windows peep,

100 Straight from our beds we start, and shake off sleep;
This new employ with eager haste to prove,<sup>o</sup>
This new employ becomes so much our love:
Alas! that human joys should change so soon,
Even this may bear another face at noon!
The birds salute<sup>o</sup> us as to work we go,
105 And a new life seems in our breasts to glow.
Across one's shoulder hangs a scythe well steeled,
The weapon destined to unclothe the field:
T'other supports the whetstone, scrip,<sup>o</sup> and beer;
This for our scythes, and these ourselves to cheer.
110 And now the field designed our strength to try,
Appears, and meets at last our longing eye;
The grass and ground each cheerfully surveys,
Willing to see which way th'advantage lays.
As the best man, each claims the foremost place,
115 And our first work seems but a sportive race:
With rapid force our well-whet blades we drive,
Strain every nerve, and blow for blow we give:
Though but this eminence<sup>o</sup> the foremost gains,
Only t'excel the rest in toil and pains.
120 But when the scorching sun is mounted high,
And no kind barns with friendly shades are nigh,
Our weary scythes entangle in the grass,
And streams of sweat run trickling down apace;
Our sportive labor we too late lament,
125 And wish that strength again, we vainly spent:
Thus in the morn a courser<sup>o</sup> have I seen
With headlong fury scour<sup>o</sup> the level green,
Or mount the hills, if hills are in his way,
As if no labor could his fire<sup>o</sup> allay,
130 Till the meridian<sup>o</sup> sun with sultry heat,
And piercing beams hath bathed his sides in sweat;
The lengthened chase scarce able to sustain,
He measures back the hills and dales with pain.
With heat and labor tired, our scythes we quit,

135 Search out a shady tree, and down we sit;
From scrip and bottle hope new strength to gain;
But scrip and bottle too are tried in vain.
Down our parched throats we scarce the bread can get;
And, quite o'erspent with toil, but faintly eat;
140 Nor can the bottle only answer all,
Alas! the bottle and the beer's too small.<sup>8</sup>
Our time slides on, we move from off the grass;
And each again betakes him to his place.
Not eager now, as late, our strength to prove,
145 But all contented regular to move:
Often we whet, as often view the sun,
To see how near his tedious race is run;
At length he veils his radiant face from sight,
And bids the weary traveler goodnight:
150 Homewards we move, but so much spent with toil,
We walk but slow, and rest at every stile.<sup>9</sup>
Our good expecting wives, who think we stay,<sup>o</sup>
Got to the door, soon eye us in the way;
Then from the pot the dumpling's catch'd in haste,
155 And homely by its side the bacon's placed.
Supper and sleep by morn new strength supply,
And out we set again our works to try:
But not so early quite, nor quite so fast,
As to our cost<sup>o</sup> we did the morning past.
160 Soon as the rising sun has drank the dew,
Another scene is opened to our view;
Our master comes, and at his heels a throng
Of prattling females, armed with rake and prong:<sup>o</sup>
Prepared, whilst he is here, to make his hay;
165 Or, if he turns his back, prepared to play.
But here, or gone, sure of this comfort still,
Here's company, so they may chat their fill:
And were their hands as active as their tongues,

170 How nimbly then would move their rakes and prongs?
The grass again is spread upon the ground,
Till not a vacant place is to be found;
And while the piercing sunbeams on it shine,
The haymakers have time allowed to dine:
175 That soon dispatched, they still sit on the ground,
And the brisk chat renewed, afresh goes round:
All talk at once, but seeming all to fear,
That all they speak so well, the rest won't hear;
By quick degrees so high their notes they strain,
That standers-by can naught distinguish plain:
180 So loud their speech, and so confused their noise,
Scarce puzzled Echo<sup>1</sup> can return a voice;
Yet, spite of this, they bravely all go on,
Each scorns to be, or seem to be, outdone:
Till (unobserved before) a lowering sky,
185 Fraught with black clouds, proclaims a shower nigh;
The tattling crowd can scarce their garments gain,
Before descends the thick impetuous rain:
Their noisy prattle all at once is done,
And to the hedge they all for shelter run.

190 Thus have I seen on a bright summer's day,
On some green brake<sup>o</sup> a flock of sparrows play;
From twig to twig, from bush to bush they fly;
And with continued chirping fill the sky;
But on a sudden, if a storm appears,
195 Their chirping noise no longer dings your ears;
They fly for shelter to the thickest bush,
There silent sit, and all at once is hush.
But better fate succeeds this rainy day,
And little labor serves to make the hay;
200 Fast as 'tis cut, so kindly shines the sun,
Turned once or twice, the pleasing work is done:
Next day the cocks<sup>o</sup> appear in equal rows,

Which the glad master in safe ricks<sup>o</sup> bestows.

205 But now the field we must no longer range,
And yet, hard fate! still work for work we change.
Back to the barns again in haste we're sent,
Where lately so much time we pensive spent:
Not pensive now; we bless the friendly shade;
And to avoid the parching sun are glad.
210 But few days here we're destined to remain,
Before our master calls us forth again:
"For harvest now," says he, "yourselves prepare,
The ripened harvest now demands your care.
Early next morn I shall disturb your rest.
215 Get all things ready, and be quickly drest."
Strict to his word, scarce the next dawn appears,
Before his hasty summons fills our ears.
Obedient to his call, straight up we get,
And finding soon our company complete;
220 With him, our guide, we to the wheat field go;
He, to appoint, and we, the work to do.
Ye reapers, cast your eyes around the field,
And view the scene its different beauties yield:
Then look again with a more tender eye,
225 To think how soon it must in ruin lie.
For once set in, where-e'er our blows we deal,
There's no resisting of the well-whet steel:
But here or there, where-e'er our course we bend,
Sure desolation does our steps attend.
230 Thus, when Arabia's sons, in hopes of prey,
To some more fertile country take their way;
How beauteous all things in the morn appear,
There villages, and pleasing cots<sup>o</sup> are here;
So many pleasing objects meet the sight,
235 The ravished eye could willing gaze till night:
But long ere then, where-e'er their troops have past,
These pleasing prospects lie a gloomy waste.

The morning past, we sweat beneath the sun,
And but uneasily our work goes on.
240 Before us we perplexing<sup>o</sup> thistles find,
And corn blown adverse with the ruffling wind;
Behind our backs the female gleaners<sup>2</sup> wait,
Who sometimes stoop, and sometimes hold a chat.
Each morn we early rise, go late to bed,
245 And laboring hard, a painful life we lead:
For toils, scarce ever ceasing, press us now;
Rest never does, but on the Sabbath, show,
And barely that, our master will allow.
Nor, when asleep, are we secure from pain,
250 We then perform our labors o'er again:
Our mimic fancy always restless seems;
And what we act awake, she acts in dreams.
Hard fate! Our labors ev'n in sleep don't cease, Scarce Hercules e'er felt such toils as these.<sup>3</sup>
255 At length in rows stands up the well-dried corn,
A grateful scene, and ready for the barn.
Our well-pleased master views the sight with joy,
And we for carrying all our force employ.
Confusion soon o'er all the field appears,
260 And stunning clamors fill the workmen's ears;
The bells, and clashing whips, alternate sound,
And rattling wagons thunder o'er the ground.
The wheat got in, the peas, and other grain,
Share the same fate, and soon leave bare the plain:
265 In noisy triumph the last load moves on,
And loud huzzahs proclaim the harvest done.
Our master joyful at the welcome sight,
Invites us all to feast with him at night.
A table plentifully spread we find,
270 And jugs of humming<sup>o</sup> beer to cheer the mind;
Which he, too generous, pushes on so fast,
We think no toils to come, nor mind the past.

But the next morning soon reveals the cheat,
When the same toils we must again repeat:
275 To the same barns again must back return,
To labor there for room for next year's corn.

Thus, as the year's revolving course goes round,
No respite from our labor can be found:
280 Like Sisyphus,<sup>4</sup> our work is never done,
Continually rolls back the restless stone.
Now growing labors still succeed the past,
And growing always new, must always last.

MARY COLLIER

ca. 1699–1762

Mary Collier, born to a poor family near the town of Midhurst in southern England, never went to school, but her parents taught her to read. Upon the death of her long-infirm father, she moved about ten miles away, “to Petersfield, where my chief employment was washing, brewing, and such labor, still devoting what leisure time I had to books,” as she reports in an autobiographical notice, published near the end of her life—virtually the sole source of information about her. A copy of Stephen Duck’s celebrated poem “The Thresher’s Labor” reached her in the early 1730s: it impressed and inspired but also provoked her, resulting in her composition of “The Woman’s Labor,” which rebuts Duck’s charge that women laborers do less work than men. Her poetry “became a town talk” among families in Petersfield, who encouraged her to publish it in 1739, though at her own expense; she hoped its novelty as the work of a woman poet of the laboring classes might make her some money. It did not, and she never gained a national reputation at all comparable to Duck’s. But in the last year of her life, she published another volume of poems, which included “The Woman’s Labor” and her brief autobiography, with a subscribers’ list of over 150 names.

Some of the excitement of “The Woman’s Labor” comes from its directness, its vivid description of all the different jobs rural working women do. Unlike Duck, who structures his poem around work demanded of agricultural laborers at different seasons of the year,

Collier depicts the workday, seemingly never-ending for rural women, whose fieldwork, childcare, domestic labor, and service to rich families blend together into a single stream. Also notable is Collier's close engagement with Duck and the details of his poem. The degrees of irony with which she addresses him and notes his spectacular success at the beginning and throughout are hard to measure. She questions his lines that directly insult women but also mockingly quotes those in which he complains about the supposedly supreme miseries of men laborers' working lives. And she speaks not just for herself but for an entire class of people, for all of "poor woman-kind," primarily using the pronoun we, like Duck. Her account of childcare in the fields, and care in the home for children and men, for instance, portrays a plight borne by women collectively, though what is known of her indicates that she never married or had children. (In her autobiography, she refers to herself as "an old maid.") The shared struggles of working women's lives, both inside and outside the formal economy of wages, are the real topic of "The Woman's Labor," which Collier surveys with relentless clarity.

The Woman's Labor

To Mr. Stephen Duck

Immortal bard! thou favorite of the nine!<sup>o</sup>
Enriched by peers, advanced by Caroline!<sup>1</sup>
Deign to look down on one that's poor and low,
Remembering you yourself was lately so;
5 Accept these lines: Alas! what can you have
From her, who ever was, and's still a slave?
No learning ever was bestowed on me;
My life was always spent in drudgery:
And not alone; alas! with grief I find,
10 It is the portion<sup>o</sup> of poor woman-kind.
Oft have I thought as on my bed I lay,
Eased from the tiresome labors of the day,
Our first extraction from a mass refined,<sup>2</sup>
Could never be for slavery designed;
15 Till time and custom by degrees destroyed
That happy state<sup>o</sup> our sex at first enjoyed.
When men had used their utmost care and toil,
Their recompense was but a female smile;
When they by arts or arms were rendered great,
20 They laid their trophies at a woman's feet;
They, in those days, unto our sex did bring
Their hearts, their all, a free-will<sup>o</sup> offering;
And as from us their being they derive,
They back again should all due homage give.

25 Jove once descending from the clouds did drop
In show'rs of gold on lovely Danae's lap;<sup>3</sup>
The sweet-tongued poets, in those generous days,

Unto our shrine still offered up their lays:<sup>o</sup>
But now, alas! that golden age is past,
We are the objects of your scorn at last.
30 And you, great Duck, upon whose happy brow
The muses seem to fix the garland<sup>4</sup> now,
In your late poem boldly did declare
Alcides' labors can't with yours compare;<sup>5</sup>
And of your annual task have much to say,
35 Of threshing, reaping, mowing corn and hay;
Boasting your daily toil, and nightly dream,
But can't conclude your never-dying theme,
And let our hapless sex in silence lie
Forgotten, and in dark oblivion die;
40 But on our abject state you throw your scorn,
And women wrong, your verses to adorn.
You of haymaking speak a word or two,
As if our sex but little work could do:<sup>6</sup>
This makes the honest farmer smiling say,
45 He'll seek for women still to make his hay;
For if his back be turned their work they mind
As well as men, as far as he can find.
For my own part, I many a summer's day
Have spent in throwing, turning, making hay;
50 But ne'er could see, what you have lately found,
Our wages paid for sitting on the ground.<sup>7</sup>
'Tis true, that when our morning's work is done,
And all our grass exposed unto the sun,
While that his scorching beams do on it shine,
55 As well as you we have a time to dine:
I hope, that since we freely toil and sweat
To earn our bread, you'll give us time to eat.
That over, soon we must get up again,
And nimbly turn our hay upon the plain;
60 Nay, rake and row it in, the case is clear;
Or how should Cocks in equal Rows appear?<sup>8</sup>

But if you'd have what you have wrote believed,
I find, that you to hear us talk are grieved:
In this, I hope, you do not speak your mind,
65 For none but Turks, that ever I could find,
Have mutes to serve them,<sup>9</sup> or did e'er deny
Their slaves, at work, to chat it merrily.
Since you have liberty to speak your mind,
And are to talk, as well as we, inclined,
70 Why should you thus repine,<sup>o</sup> because that we,
Like you, enjoy that pleasing liberty?
What! would you lord it quite,<sup>o</sup> and take away
The only privilege our sex enjoy?

75 When evening does approach, we homeward hie,
<sup>o</sup>
And our domestic toils incessant ply:
Against<sup>o</sup> your coming home prepare to get
Our work all done, our house in order set;
Bacon and Dumpling<sup>1</sup> in the pot we boil,
Our beds we make, our swine we feed the while;
80 Then wait at door to see you coming home,
And set the table out against you come:
Early next morning we on you attend,
Our children dress and feed, their clothes we mend;
And in the field our daily task renew,
85 Soon as the rising sun has dried the dew.

When harvest comes, into the field we go,
And help to reap the wheat as well as you;
Or else we go the ears of corn to glean;<sup>o</sup>
No labor scorning, be it e'er so mean;<sup>o</sup>
90 But in the work we freely bear a part,
And what we can, perform with all our heart.
To get a living we so willing are,
Our tender babes into the field we bear,
And wrap them in our clothes to keep them warm,

95 While round about we gather up the corn;
And often unto them our course do bend,
To keep them safe, that nothing them offend:
Our children that are able, bear a share
In gleaning corn, such is our frugal care.
100 When night comes on, unto our home we go,
Our corn we carry, and our infant too;
Weary, alas! but 'tis not worth our while
Once to complain, or rest at ev'ry stile;<sup>2</sup>
We must make haste, for when we home are come,
105 Alas! we find our work but just begun;
So many things for our attendance call,
Had we ten hands, we could employ them all.
Our children put to bed, with greatest care
We all things for your coming home prepare:
110 You sup, and go to bed without delay,
And rest yourselves till the ensuing day;
While we, alas! but little sleep can have,
Because our froward<sup>o</sup> children cry and rave;
Yet, without fail, soon as daylight doth spring,
115 We in the field again our work begin,
And there, with all our strength, our toil renew,
Till Titan's golden rays<sup>3</sup> have dried the dew;
Then home we go unto our children dear,
Dress, feed, and bring them to the field with care.
120 Were this your case, you justly might complain
That day nor night you are secure from pain;
Those mighty troubles which perplex your mind
(Thistles before, and Females come behind)<sup>4</sup>
Would vanish soon, and quickly disappear,
125 Were you, like us, encumbered thus with care.
What you would have of us we do not know:
We oft take up the corn that you do mow;
We cut the peas, and always ready are,
130 In every work to take our proper share;

And from the time that harvest doth begin,
Until the corn be cut and carried in,
Our toil and labor's daily so extreme,
That we have hardly ever Time to dream.<sup>5</sup>

135       The harvest ended, respite none we find;
The hardest of our toil is still behind:°
Hard labor we most cheerfully pursue,
And out, abroad, a charing° often go:
Of which I now will briefly tell in part,
140       What fully to declare is past my art;
So many hardships daily we go through
I boldly say, the like you never knew.

          When bright Orion glitters in the skies
In winter nights, then early we must rise;
The weather ne'er so° bad, wind, rain, or snow,
145       Our work appointed, we must rise and go;
While you on easy beds may lie and sleep,
Till light does through your chamber windows peep.
When to the house we come where we should go,
How to get in, alas! we do not know:
150       The maid quite tired with work the day before,
O'ercome with sleep; we standing at the door
Oppressed with cold, and often call in vain,
Ere to our work we can admittance gain:
But when from wind and weather we get in,
155       Briskly with courage we our work begin;
Heaps of fine linen we before us view,
Whereon to lay our strength and patience too;
Cambrics and muslins<sup>6</sup> which our ladies wear,
Laces and edgings, costly, fine, and rare,
160       Which must be washed with utmost skill and care;
With Holland<sup>7</sup> shirts, ruffles and fringes too,
Fashions which our forefathers never knew.
For several hours here we work and slave,

165 Before we can one glimpse of daylight have;
We labor hard before the morning's past,
Because we fear the time runs on too fast.

At length bright Sol<sup>o</sup> illuminates the skies,
And summons drowsy mortals to arise;
Then comes our mistress to us without fail,
170 And in her hand, perhaps, a mug of ale
To cheer our hearts, and also to inform Herself what work is done that very morn;
Lays her command upon us, that we mind
Her linen well, nor leave the dirt behind:
175 Nor this alone, but also to take care,
We don't her cambrics nor her ruffles tear;
And these most strictly does of us require,
To save her soap, and sparing be of fire;
Tells us her charge<sup>o</sup> is great, nay furthermore,
180 Her clothes are fewer than the time before.
Now we drive on, resolved our strength to try,
And what we can, we do most willingly;
Until with heat and work, 'tis often known,
Not only sweat, but blood runs trickling down
185 Our wrists and fingers; still our work demands
The constant action of our laboring hands.

Now night comes on, from whence you have relief,
But that, alas! does but increase our grief;
With heavy hearts we often view the sun,
190 Fearing he'll set before our work is done;
For either in the morning, or at night,
We piece<sup>o</sup> the summer's day with candlelight.
Though we all day with care our work attend,
Such is our fate, we know not when 'twill end:
195 When evening's come, you homeward take your way,
We, till our work is done, are forced to stay;

And after all our toil and labor past,
Six-pence or Eight-pence pays us off at last;
For all our pains, no prospect can we see 200 Attend us, but old age and poverty.

The washing is not all we have to do:
We oft change work for work as well as you,
Our mistress of her pewter doth complain,
And 'tis our part to make it clean again.
205 This work, though very hard and tiresome too,
Is not the worst we hapless females do:
When night comes on, and we quite weary are,
We scarce can count what falls unto our share;
Pots, kettles, saucepans, skillets, we may see,
210 Skimmers and ladles, and such trumpery,
Brought in to make complete our slavery.
Though early in the morning 'tis begun,
'Tis often very late before we've done;
Alas! our labors never know an end;
215 On brass and iron we our strength must spend;
Our tender hands and fingers scratch and tear:
All this, and more, with patience we must bear.
Colored with dirt and filth we now appear;
Your threshing sooty peas<sup>8</sup> will not come near.
220 All the perfections woman once could boast,
Are quite obscured and altogether lost.

Once more our mistress sends to let us know
She wants our help, because the beer runs low:
Then in much haste for brewing we prepare,
225 The vessels clean, and scald with greatest care;
Often at midnight, from our bed we rise
At other times, e'en that will not suffice;
Our work at evening oft we do begin,
And ere we've done, the night comes on again.
230 Water we pump, the copper we must fill,

Or tend the fire; for if we e'er standing still,
Like you, when threshing, we a watch must keep,
Our wort<sup>9</sup> boils over, if we dare to sleep.

235 But to rehearse all labor is in vain,
Of which we very justly might complain:
For us, ye see, but little rest is found;
Our toil increases as the year runs round.
While you to Sisyphus yourselves compare,
240 With Danaus' daughters<sup>1</sup> we may claim a share;
For while he labors hard against the hill,
Bottomless tubs of water they must fill.
So the industrious bees do hourly strive,
To bring their loads of honey to the hive;
245 Their sordid<sup>o</sup> owners always reap the gains,
And poorly recompense their toil and pains.

Women, Gender, Power

A new arena of power opened to women in Britain in the Restoration period and eighteenth century. As in earlier eras, careers in the church and the professions were closed to women; their legal rights in marriage were severely restricted; they could not vote in parliamentary elections or obtain a university education at Oxford or Cambridge or any of the Scottish universities. But they could write, and increasingly as the eighteenth century advanced, they published their work. Literacy was spreading ever more widely in Britain to include more and more men and women of every social station: an enlarged, diversifying literary marketplace began to crave the diversity of points of view, styles, innovations in genres, and insights that women authors could help provide. The late seventeenth-century career of Aphra Behn (1640?–1689) has long been seen as a watershed for the professional woman writer. Women who published their work before her were often aristocratic, with a level of education very rare for women outside the uppermost classes. Behn rose from obscurity and found a way to make a living as a playwright, novelist, and poet on her own (see p. 145). The next generation of women with literary careers, including Delarivier Manley (ca. 1670–1724) and Eliza Haywood (1693?–1756; see p. 649), published prose fiction, political scandal, translations, plays, periodical essays, poetry. These women often did piecework in the London milieu of writing for hire called Grub Street: they had to fight to make their way in a publishing industry dominated by men, and the financial returns they gained often amounted to barely enough to get by on. At the same time, women in the period made other models of authorship work for them: Anne Finch, Countess of Winchilsea (1661–1720) composed her influential, celebrated poems on her country estate, at first choosing to circulate them only in manuscript (and later experimenting with the possibilities of print); women poets of the laboring classes such as Mary Collier (see p. 736), Mary Leapor (see below), and Ann Yearsley (see p. 1038) found interested patrons, who were often themselves women of higher social stations, and made some money selling their works by subscription. In the early 1750s, a group of women, some wealthy, some of the middling ranks, convened to form the Bluestocking circle, which emphasized women's intellectual, often scholarly achievement. There is no single profile or template of the woman author in the eighteenth century. Women writers were Tories and Whigs (and eventually, radicals), urban sophisticates and rural laborers, titled ladies and clergymen's daughters, pious and risqué, popular and erudite, producing satirical, devotional, amatory, and emotionally uplifting works—no single genre defined what a woman writer in the period should do.

In all their diversity, however, women authors of the period together offered innovative perspectives on gender and, exploring their own evolving social and cultural positions, helped forge powerful new political ideas. The institution of marriage, as long established in English common law, gave husbands control over the property, the lives, even the identities of their wives. Defining this doctrine, known as coverture, the English jurist William Blackstone (1723–1780) commented, “by marriage, the husband and wife are one person in law, that is, the very being or legal existence of the woman is suspended during the marriage, or at least is incorporated into that of the husband.” Writers such as Mary Astell (see p. 213), Judith Drake (fl. 1696–1723), and Mary, Lady Chudleigh (see below) began to discuss this subordination not merely as a cultural tradition but as a political issue, using the same terms employed by men when they criticized unjust rulers. “If all men are born free, how is it that all women are born slaves?” asked Astell. In recognizing the political dimensions of private, domestic life, these women inaugurated modern feminism.

Gender politics touched women's literary works in less philosophically overt ways as well. For instance, Finch notes in “The Unequal Fetters” (see below) how conventional love lyrics as written by men deliberately fail to notice the jeopardy for women inherent in wooing and marriage; and Mary Wortley Montagu's poetic answer to Jonathan Swift's "The Lady's Dressing Room" is both a personal attack on him and a general satire on male insecurity and impotence—which tend to turn into aggression against women. When Montagu traveled to Turkey and wrote about Turkish social customs, including literature (see p. 640), she was exploring her own talents and intellectual interests; but she was also demonstrating to her correspondents (and later, when her travelog was published, to the world) the brilliance of observation and analysis that women could achieve. Women's poems, essays, and advice literature (such as the selection from Hester Chapone's Letters on the Improvement of the Mind below) treat women's friendship as a crucial part of their intimate, daily experience; but they also document and help create solidarity among women, in a social world often indifferent or hostile to their needs, safety, and aspirations.

In the period, expanded understandings of women's cultural and social roles could also open up broader questions about the codes designed to fix sexuality and gender along heteronormative and cisgender lines. Aphra Behn's poem "To the Fair Clarinda" (see p. 151), written in a Restoration subculture that linked expansive sexual experience to sophistication and status, uses her desire for a person (at first) identified as a woman to question the nature of the gender binary; and the anonymous lyric "Cloe to Artimesa" (see below) rejects heterosexuality and celebrates sexual relationships between women in vigorous terms. But such unrestrictive views of sex and gender were far from normalized in eighteenth-century British culture. At midcentury, the case of Charles Hamilton illustrates the dangers faced by people whose gender identities did not conform to conventional demands. Hamilton was a transgender man (though that terminology did not exist at the time) who married several women. In The Female Husband (see below), the novelist Henry Fielding presents a semifictional account of Hamilton's story (changing his first name to George), endorsing the violence to which the legal system and society at large subjects him. But Fielding also challenges the norm, after a fashion, merely by showing the public that real people with complex, gender-nonconforming identities exist; and he almost cannot help rooting for his protagonist. The culture's complex attitudes toward the gender binary are also illustrated by the popular success at midcentury of Hannah Snell, whose autobiography (written with her collaborator, Robert Walker; see below) describes her passing as a male marine to serve in Britain's imperial wars in India (and her delight in revealing herself to her comrades as a woman when her service ended). Snell could cross gender lines as a British military hero and be applauded, though the codes surrounding sexuality and gender subtly dictated how her story had to be told for the public to accept it.

Gender and sexuality were pressing, personal topics, explored in writing by men and women alike. But just like their male counterparts, women authors of the long eighteenth century wrote about far more than gender and sexuality. They translated and interpreted ancient philosophers like Epictetus and analyzed new developments in natural science; they warmly professed their Christian faith and engaged in bitter party politics. And many women authors, such as Hannah More (see p. 976), came to assert their allegiance to what they conceived as traditional gender roles, anticipating ideologies of feminine domesticity that would emerge in the nineteenth century. But the unignorable fact of women's authorship itself transformed and enhanced the authority of women in British culture. Though often dismissed and marginalized by men throughout the period, women, in their individuality and range of diverse interests, were now heard.

ANNE FINCH, COUNTESS OF WINCHILSEA

Anne Finch, Countess of Winchilsea (see p. 199), could be a clear-eyed critic of the difficult predicament of married women, in poems like “The Unequal Fetters.” But also, as is evident in poems like “A Letter to Dafnis,” she thrived in her own marriage, and her husband eagerly supported her writing. The texts of the two following poems are based on the 1903 edition by Myra Reynolds of poems included in Finch’s carefully produced, handwritten folio of poetry, which has been dated to around 1702. This folio contains poems that later appeared in her 1713 printed collection Miscellany Poems, On Several Occasions, but also ones—like these—that she only circulated in manuscript form.

The Unequal Fetters

5      Could we stop the time that's flying
         Or recall it when 'tis past,
         Put far off the day of dying
         Or make youth forever last,
         To love would then be worth our cost.<sup>1</sup>

10      But since we must lose those graces
         Which at first your hearts have won,
         And you seek for in new faces
         When our spring of life is done,
         It would but urge our ruin on.

15      Free as nature's first intention
         Was to make us, I'll be found,
         Nor by subtle man's invention
         Yield to be in fetters bound
         By one that walks a freer round.

20      Marriage does but slightly tie men
         Whilst close<sup>o</sup> prisoners we remain:
         They the larger slaves of Hymen<sup>2</sup>
         Still are begging love again
         At the full length of all their chain.

A Letter to Dafnis April 2d 1685<sup>1</sup>

This to the crown and blessing of my life,
The much loved husband of a happy wife.
To him, whose constant passion found the art<sup>o</sup>
To win a stubborn and ungrateful heart,
And to the world by tenderest proof discovers<sup>o</sup>
5 They err, who say that husbands can't be lovers.
With such return of passion as is due,
Daphnis I love, Daphnis my thoughts pursue,
Daphnis, my hopes, my joys, are bounded all in you:
Even I, for Daphnis' and my promise's sake,
10 What I in women censure, undertake.
But this from love, not vanity, proceeds;
You know who writes, and I who 'tis that reads.
Judge not my passion by my want<sup>o</sup> of skill:
Many love well, though they express it ill;
15 And I your censure could with pleasure bear,
Would you but soon return, and speak it here.

MARY, LADY CHUDLEIGH

With one of the most vigorous voices among women poets of the Restoration and early eighteenth century, Mary, Lady Chudleigh (1656–1710) published books of poems and essays, including the long poem in dialogue The Ladies Defence (1701), which attacked the view that women owe their husbands total submission. She wrote on many topics, especially the friendships she formed with other women writers, including Mary Astell (1666–1731), Elizabeth Thomas (1675–1731), Lady Mary Wortley Montagu (1689–1762), and Judith Drake (ca. 1670–1723). Though she did not write in detail about her own experience in her marriage to Sir George Chudleigh (d. 1718), which began in 1674 and produced six children, her work argues consistently for the reform of marriage as an institution and the extension of women's rights.

To the Ladies

Wife and servant are the same,
But only differ in the name:
For when that fatal knot is tied,
Which nothing, nothing can divide:
When she the word Obey has said,
5 And man by law supreme has made,
Then all that's kind is laid aside,
And nothing left but state<sup>o</sup> and pride:
Fierce as an Eastern prince<sup>1</sup> he grows,
And all his innate rigor shows:
10 Then but to look, to laugh, or speak,
Will the nuptial contract break.
Like mutes, she signs alone must make,
And never any freedom take:
But still be governed by a nod,
15 And fear her husband as her God:
Him still must serve, him still obey,
And nothing act, and nothing say,
But what her haughty lord thinks fit,
Who with the power, has all the wit.<sup>o</sup>
20 Then shun, oh! shun that wretched state,
And all the fawning flatterers hate:
Value your selves, and men despise,
You must be proud, if you'll be wise.

ANONYMOUS

This anonymous poem rejects heterosexual love and celebrates love between women. Scholars have been fascinated by its forthright stance, though the extreme nature of its rejection of heterosexuality has led some to view its original purpose as ironic and satirical. It is not easy to determine how a diversity of eighteenth-century readers might have responded to its clear, confident declaration. The poem appeared in print once in the eighteenth century, in A New Miscellany of Original Poems, Translations, and Imitations, by the Most Eminent Hands (1720), assembled by Anthony Hammond.

Cloe to Artimesa

While vulgar<sup>o</sup> souls their vulgar love pursue,
And in the common way themselves undo;
Impairing health, and fame, and risking life.
To be a mistress, or what's worse, a wife,
5 We, whom a nicer<sup>o</sup> taste has raised above
The dangerous follies of such slavish love;
Despise the sex,<sup>o</sup> and in ourselves we find,
Pleasures for their gross<sup>o</sup> senses too refined.
Let brutish men, made by our weakness vain,
10 Boast of the easy conquest they obtain.
Let the poor loving wretch do all she can,
And all won't please th'ungrateful tyrant, man;
We scorn the monster and his mistress too,
And show the world what women ought to do.

MARY MASTERS

Mary Masters (ca. 1694–1759) published two volumes, Poems on Several Occasions (1733) and Familiar Letters and Poems on Several Occasions (1755), though according to an autobiographical note in her first book, her family was poor, her education limited, and “her genius to poetry was always brow-beat and discountenanced by her parents.” Few details are known about her career, but her books included lists of subscribers with many names of women and men famous in the literary world of her times. Her work was anthologized in important collections of work by the foremost women poets of the century, Poems by Eminent Ladies (1755) and Poems by the Most Eminent Ladies of Great-Britain and Ireland (1773). She often commented in her poems and published letters on the injustice of the institution of marriage to women, and never herself married. Many of her poems, like the one below, treat her intensely passionate relationships with her female friends.

To the Same, Enquiring Why I Wept<sup>1</sup>

You fix a dagger in my heart,
You wound me in the tenderest part,
And then enquire the reason of my smart.°

5 Alas! You talk of death and woe
That you must quickly undergo;
Yet ask the cause whence all my sorrows flow.

Ah! Do you think my love so small,
That I could part with thee, my all,
Yet not permit one friendly tear to fall?

10 Tell me, my dear Olinda, why
You question my fidelity,
Methinks with thee that I could e'en wish to die.

JONATHAN SWIFT

"The Lady's Dressing Room" is the first in a series of "excremental" poems in which Swift (see p. 362) punctures idealizations of women and their beauty. If one object of satire is the grossness of Celia, "the goddess," the romantic illusions of Strephon, her disabused lover, are far more absurd.

The Lady's Dressing Room

Five hours (and who can do it less in?)
By haughty Celia spent in dressing,
The goddess from her chamber issues,
Arrayed in lace, brocade, and tissues.
5 Strephon, who found the room was void,
And Betty otherwise employed,
Stole in, and took a strict survey
Of all the litter as it lay;
Whereof, to make the matter clear,
An inventory follows here.
10 And first a dirty smock appeared,
Beneath the armpits well besmeared.
Strephon, the rogue, displayed it wide,
And turned it round on every side.
In such a case few words are best,
15 And Strephon bids us guess the rest;
But swears how damnably the men lie,
In calling Celia sweet and cleanly.
Now listen while he next produces
The various combs for various uses,
20 Filled up with dirt so closely fixed,
No brush could force a way betwixt;
A paste of composition rare,
Sweat, dandruff, powder, lead, and hair;
A forehead cloth with oil upon't
25 To smooth the wrinkles on her front;
Here alum flower<sup>o</sup> to stop the steams
Exhaled from sour unsavory streams;
There night-gloves made of Tripsy's hide,
Bequeathed by Tripsy when she died,
30 With puppy water,<sup>1</sup> beauty's help,

Distilled from Tripsy's darling whelp;
Here gallipots<sup>o</sup> and vials placed,
Some filled with washes, some with paste,
Some with pomatum,<sup>o</sup> paints, and slops,
35 And ointments good for scabby chops.
Hard by a filthy basin stands,
Fouled with the scouring of her hands;
The basin takes whatever comes,
The scraping of her teeth and gums,
40 A nasty compound of all hues,
For here she spits, and here she spews.
But oh! it turned poor Strephon's bowels,
When he beheld and smelt the towels,
Begummed, bemattered, and beslimed,
45 With dirt, and sweat, and earwax grimed.
No object Strephon's eye escapes;
Here petticoats in frowzy heaps,
Nor be the handkerchiefs forgot,
All varnished o'er with snuff and snot.
50 The stockings why should I expose,
Stained with the marks of stinking toes,
Or greasy coifs and pinner<sup>o</sup>s reeking,
Which Celia slept at least a week in?
A pair of tweezers next he found
55 To pluck her brows in arches round,
Or hairs that sink the forehead low,
Or on her chin like bristles grow.
The virtues we must not let pass
Of Celia's magnifying glass.
60 When frightened Strephon cast his eye on't,
It showed the visage of a giant—
A glass that can to sight disclose
The smallest worm in Celia's nose,
And faithfully direct her nail
65 To squeeze it out from head to tail;
For catch it nicely by the head,

It must come out alive or dead.

70       Why Strephon will you tell the rest?
And must you needs describe the chest?
That careless wench! no creature warn her
To move it out from yonder corner,
But leave it standing full in sight,
For you to exercise your spite.
75       In vain the workman showed his wit
With rings and hinges counterfeit
To make it seem in this disguise
A cabinet to vulgar eyes;
For Strephon ventured to look in,
Resolved to go through thick and thin;
80       He lifts the lid, there needs no more,
He smelt it all the time before.

      As from within Pandora's box,
When Epimetheus oped the locks,
A sudden universal crew
85       Of human evils upward flew,
He still was comforted to find
That Hope at last remained behind;<sup>2</sup>
So Strephon, lifting up the lid
To view what in the chest was hid,
90       The vapors flew from out the vent,
But Strephon cautious never meant
The bottom of the pan to grope,
And foul his hands in search of Hope.
Oh never may such vile machine
95       Be once in Celia's chamber seen!
Oh may she better learn to keep
"Those secrets of the hoary deep!"<sup>3</sup>

      As mutton cutlets, prime of meat,
Which though with art you salt and beat,
100       As laws of cookery require,
And roast them at the clearest fire,

If from adown the hopeful chops
The fat upon a cinder drops,
To stinking smoke it turns the flame,
105 Poisoning the flesh from whence it came,
And thence exhales a greasy stench,
For which you curse the careless wench;
So things which must not be expressed,
When plumped into the reeking chest,
110 Send up an excremental smell
To taint the parts from which they fell,
The petticoats and gown perfume,
And waft a stink round every room.
Thus finishing his grand survey,
115 The swain disgusted slunk away,
Repeating in his amorous fits,
"Oh! Celia, Celia, Celia shits!"
But Vengeance, goddess never sleeping,
Soon punished Strephon for his peeping.
120 His foul imagination links
Each dame he sees with all her stinks,
And, if unsavory odors fly,
Conceives a lady standing by.
All women his description fits,
125 And both ideas jump like wits,<sup>4</sup>
By vicious fancy coupled fast,
And still appearing in contrast.
I pity wretched Strephon, blind
To all the charms of womankind.
130 Should I the queen of love refuse
Because she rose from stinking ooze?<sup>5</sup>
To him that looks behind the scene,
Statira's but some pocky quean.<sup>6</sup>
When Celia in her glory shows,
135 If Strephon would but stop his nose,
Who now so impiously blasphemes

140

Her ointments, daubs, and paints, and creams,
Her washes, slops, and every clout<sup>o</sup>
With which she makes so foul a rout,
He soon would learn to think like me,
And bless his ravished eyes to see
Such order from confusion sprung,
Such gaudy tulips raised from dung.

LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU

Montagu (see p. 633) did not like Swift. She objected to his politics (he worked for Tories, she was a Whig), his friendship with Pope (with whom she had bitterly quarreled), his vanity (especially about knowing important people), and his defiant indecency (which she considered not only inappropriate for a clergyman but also a sign of low breeding). Her reply to "The Lady's Dressing Room" mimics its style, but substitutes vulgar names for its mock-pastoral ones (Betty instead of Celia) and mingles personal contempt with a diagnosis of Swift's anti-idealism, which stems, she suggests, from his own insecurities. The poem was originally published anonymously in 1734 under the title "The Dean's Provocation for Writing the Lady's Dressing Room"; the version reprinted here is from a fair copy in Montagu's hand.

The Reasons That Induced Dr. Swift to Write a Poem Called The Lady's Dressing Room

The Doctor in a clean starched band,<sup>o</sup>
His golden snuff box in his hand,
With care his diamond ring displays
And artful shows its various rays,
While grave he stalks down —— Street,
5 His dearest Betty —— to meet.
    Long had he waited for this hour,
Nor gained admittance to the bower,
Had joked and punned, and swore and writ,
Tried all his gallantry and wit,
10 Had told her oft what part he bore
In Oxford's<sup>1</sup> schemes in days of yore,
But bawdy, politics, nor satyr<sup>2</sup>
Could move this dull hard-hearted creature.
Jenny her maid could taste a rhyme
15 And grieved to see him lose his time,
Had kindly whispered in his ear,
"For twice two pound you enter here;
My lady vows without that sum
It is in vain you write or come."
20     The destined offering now he brought
And in a paradise of thought
With a low bow approached the dame
Who smiling heard him preach his flame.
His gold she takes (such proofs as these 25 Convince most unbelieving shes)
And in her trunk rose up to lock it (Too wise to trust it in her pocket)

And then, returned with blushing grace,
Expects the Doctor's warm embrace.
30 But now this is the proper place
Where morals stare me in the face
And for the sake of fine expression
I'm forced to make a small digression.
Alas for wretched humankind,
35 With learning mad, with wisdom blind!
The ox thinks he's for saddle fit
(As long ago friend Horace writ)<sup>3</sup>
And men their talents still mistaking,
The stutterer fancies his is speaking.
40 With admiration oft we see
Hard features heightened by toupée,
The beau affects<sup>o</sup> the politician,
Wit is the citizen's<sup>4</sup> ambition,
Poor Pope philosophy displays on 45 With so much rhyme and little reason,
And though he argues ne'er so long
That all is right, his head is wrong.<sup>5</sup>
None strive to know their proper merit
But strain for wisdom, beauty, spirit,
50 And lose the praise that is their due
While they've the impossible in view.
So have I seen the injudicious heir
To add one window the whole house impair.
Instinct the hound does better teach 55 Who never undertook to preach;
The frightened hare from dogs does run
But not attempts to bear a gun.
Here many noble thoughts occur
But I prolixity abhor,
60 And will pursue the instructive tale
To show the wise in some things fail.
The reverend lover with surprise

65      Peeps in her bubbies, and her eyes,      }
          And kisses both, and tries—and tries.      }
          The evening in this hellish play,
          Beside his guineas thrown away,
          Provoked the priest to that degree
          He swore, "The fault is not in me.
 70      Your damned close stool so near my nose,
          Your dirty smock, and stinking toes,
          Would make a Hercules as tame
          As any beau that you can name."
          The nymph grown furious roared, "By God!
 75      The blame lies all in sixty odd,"
          And scornful pointing to the door
          Cried, "Fumbler, see my face no more."
          "With all my heart I'll go away,
          But nothing done, I'll nothing pay.
          Give back the money."—"How," cried she,
 80      "Would you palm such a cheat on me!
          For poor four pound to roar and bellow,
          Why sure you want some new Prunella?"<sup>6</sup>
          "I'll be revenged, you saucy quean"<sup>o</sup>
          (Replies the disappointed Dean),
 85      "I'll so describe your dressing room
          The very Irish shall not come."<sup>z</sup>
          She answered short, "I'm glad you'll write, You'll furnish paper when I shite."

HENRY FIELDING

On October 7, 1746, Charles Hamilton was tried in the court of the Quarter Sessions in the English town of Taunton after his wife, Mary Price, reported that, to her surprise, he was not a man. The court found that Hamilton was female and had put on “man’s apparel”—breeches, a periwig, and ruffles—to deceive Price, and the world. It was not easy for the court to determine the right charge to bring against Hamilton. Sex between women, though considered outrageous, was not expressly illegal (unlike sex between men, which was punishable by execution under Britain’s sodomy laws); and while the prosecution alleged that Hamilton had married a total of fourteen women, he could not be called a polygamist because there was no such thing, in the court’s eyes, as marriage between two people of the same sex. Hamilton was prosecuted under the Vagrancy Act of 1744, which gave courts wide latitude to punish people who it deemed were not who they claimed to be. According to Hamilton’s deposition, he was born a daughter to Mary and William Hamilton in Somerset and named Mary, and lived his early years in Scotland. He began wearing his brother’s clothes and publicly identifying as male at age fourteen, and eventually served as apprentice to two “mountebanks,” unlicensed medical practitioners who traveled the countryside dispensing cures. Practicing as a mountebank himself, he met and married Mary Price in the English city of Wells, and they traveled together for two months before Price discovered what she would later swear in court to be her husband’s “true sex.” The court found, in its words, that “the he or she prisoner at the bar is an uncommon, notorious cheat,” and ordered Hamilton to be imprisoned for six months and severely whipped in four different nearby market towns. After that, there is no further record of him, but the figure of “the female husband” which he introduced to English law and culture was used to categorize numerous nonheteronormative, gender-nonconforming people well into the nineteenth century.

The short pamphlet The Female Husband (1746) was produced by the eminent eighteenth-century novelist Henry Fielding (1707–1754) soon after the case of Hamilton was tried. Fielding never interviewed Charles Hamilton, as he claims to have done on the title page, likely taking most of what truth there is in his story from newspaper accounts. The vast majority of Fielding's narrative is pure fiction, starting with the name "George Hamilton" that he gives to the story's protagonist. But The Female Husband was written to capitalize on a sensational news story, and thus indicates how news media in the eighteenth century, themselves often trafficking in reckless speculation and outright fabrications, provided a profitable model for English fiction. Fielding's text can be classified as a "criminal biography," an example of which he had already published in The Life and Death of Jonathan Wild the Great (1743), a satirical narrative about a notorious London gangster.

The castigation and legally inflicted violence that Charles Hamilton faced in reality, and that George Hamilton undergoes in Fielding's fiction, demonstrate how threatening the eighteenth-century English public could find figures who did not conform to ordinary understandings of gender. Such figures provoked intense cultural anxiety by challenging the idea that gender was biologically determined and clear, and that sexual desire must always follow a path toward the "opposite" gender. Fielding's story begins and ends with heavy moralizing against what he calls the "monstrous" course of life taken by his protagonist. But as the story unfolds, he cannot resist depicting a social world almost entirely suffused with deviations from "the normal," adjacent and connected to the main one. These include the passions unleashed by a new religious movement, Methodism; the irregular practice of medicine by quack doctors; and various sexual curiosities that run from the fantastical naiveté of virgins to the desires of old widows for young, "effeminate" men. Finally the neighbors' cruel enforcement of social and gender norms itself is offered as an example of moral transgression. Fielding comes to treat George Hamilton with wry fondness, calling him “our adventurer” in a way that recalls his attitude toward his other fictional heroes. While the text varies the pronouns it assigns to Hamilton, perhaps to mock his use of male ones, such variations seem inadvertently to confirm the fluidity of gender that Fielding sets out to reject. Published between his two most famous novels—The History of the Adventures of Joseph Andrews (1742) and The History of Tom Jones, a Foundling (1749)—Fielding’s The Female Husband presents its protagonist as a queer reflection of the wandering hero who gives life to his innovations in English fiction.

The Female Husband<sup>1</sup>

That propense<sup>2</sup> inclination which is for very wise purposes implanted in the one sex for the other, is not only necessary for the continuance of the human species; but is, at the same time, when governed and directed by virtue and religion, productive not only of corporeal delight, but of the most rational felicity.

But if once our carnal appetites are let loose, without those prudent and secure guides, there is no excess and disorder which they are not liable to commit, even while they pursue their natural satisfaction; and, which may seem still more strange, there is nothing monstrous and unnatural which they are not capable of inventing, nothing so brutal and shocking which they have not actually committed.

Of these unnatural lusts, all ages and countries have afforded us too many instances; but none I think more surprising than what will be found in the history of Mrs. Mary, otherwise Mr. George Hamilton.

This heroine in iniquity was born in Isle of Man, on the 16th day of August, 1721. Her father was formerly a serjeant of grenadiers in the Foot Guards,<sup>3</sup> who having the good fortune to marry a widow of some estate in that island, purchased his discharge from the army, and retired thither with his wife.

He had not been long arrived there before he died, and left his wife with child of this Mary; but her mother, though she had not two months to reckon, could not stay<sup>4</sup> till she was delivered, before she took a third husband.

As her mother, though she had three husbands, never had any other child, she always expressed an extraordinary affection for this daughter, to whom she gave as good an education as the island afforded; and though she used her with much tenderness, yet was the girl brought up in the strictest principles of virtue and religion; nor did she in her younger years discover<sup>5</sup> the least proneness to any kind of vice, much less give cause of suspicion that she would one day disgrace her sex by the most abominable and unnatural pollutions. And indeed she hath often declared from her conscience, that no irregular passion ever had any place in her mind, till she was first seduced by one Anne Johnson, a neighbor of hers, with whom she had been acquainted from her childhood; but not with such intimacy as afterwards grew between them.

This Anne Johnson going on some business to Bristol, which detained her there near half a year, became acquainted with some of the people called Methodists,<sup>6</sup> and was by them persuaded to embrace their sect.

At her return to the Isle of Man, she soon made an easy convert of Molly Hamilton, the warmth of whose disposition rendered her susceptible enough of enthusiasm,<sup>7</sup> and ready to receive all those impressions which her friend the Methodist endeavored to make on her mind.

These two young women became now inseparable companions, and at length bedfellows: for Molly Hamilton was prevailed on to leave her mother's house, and to reside entirely with Mrs. Johnson,<sup>8</sup> whose fortune was not thought inconsiderable in that cheap country.

Young Mrs. Hamilton began to conceive a very great affection for her friend, which perhaps was not returned with equal faith by the other. However Mrs. Hamilton declares her love, or rather friendship, was totally innocent, till the temptations of Johnson first led her astray. This latter was, it seems, no novice in impurity, which, as she confessed, she had learnt and often practiced at Bristol with her methodistical sisters.

As Molly Hamilton was extremely warm in her inclinations, and as those inclinations were so violently attached to Mrs. Johnson, it would not have been difficult for a less artful<sup>9</sup> woman, in the most private hours, to turn the ardor of enthusiastic devotion into a different kind of flame.

Their conversation, therefore, soon became in the highest manner criminal, and transactions not fit to be mentioned past between them.

They had not long carried on this wicked crime before Mrs. Johnson was again called by her affairs to visit Bristol, and her friend was prevailed on to accompany her thither.

Here when they arrived, they took up their lodgings together, and lived in the same detestable manner as before; till an end was put to their vile amours, by the means of one Rogers, a young fellow, who by his extraordinary devotion (for he was a very zealous Methodist) or by some other charms (for he was very jolly and handsome) gained the heart of Mrs. Johnson, and married her.

This amour, which was not of any long continuance before it was brought to a conclusion, was kept an entire secret from Mrs. Hamilton; but she was no sooner informed of it, than she became almost frantic, she tore her hair, beat her breasts, and behaved in as outrageous a manner as the fondest husband could, who had unexpectedly discovered the infidelity of a beloved wife.

In the midst of these agonies she received a letter from Mrs. Johnson, in the following words, or as near them as she can possibly remember:

“Dear Molly,

I know you will condemn what I have now done; but I condemn myself much more for what I have done formerly: for I take the whole shame and guilt of what hath passed between us on myself. I was indeed the first seducer of your innocence, for which I ask God’s pardon and yours. All the amends I can make you is earnestly to beseech you, in the name of the Lord, to forsake all such evil courses, and to follow my example now, as you before did my temptation, and enter as soon as you can into that holy state into which I was yesterday called. In which, though I am yet but a novice, believe me, there are delights infinitely surpassing the faint endearments we have experienced together. I shall always pray for you, and continue your friend.”

This letter rather increased than abated her rage, and she resolved to go immediately and upbraid her false friend; but while she was taking this resolution, she was informed that Mr. Rogers and his bride were departed from Bristol by a messenger, who brought her a second short note, and a bill for some money from Mrs. Rogers.

As soon as the first violence of her passion subsided, she began to consult what course to take, when the strangest thought imaginable suggested itself to her fancy. This was to dress herself in men's clothes, to embark for Ireland, and commence<sup>1</sup> Methodist teacher.

Nothing remarkable happened to her during the rest of her stay in Bristol, which adverse winds occasioned to be a whole week, after she had provided herself with her dress; but at last having procured a passage, and the wind becoming favorable, she set sail for Dublin.

As she was a very pretty woman, she now appeared a most beautiful youth.<sup>2</sup> A circumstance which had its consequences aboard the ship, and had like to have discovered her, in the very beginning of her adventures.

There happened to be in the same vessel with this adventurer a Methodist, who was bound to the same place, on the same design<sup>3</sup> with herself.

The two being alone in the cabin together, and both at their devotions, the man in the ecstasy of his enthusiasm, thrust one of his hands into the other's bosom. Upon which, in her surprise, she gave so effeminate a squall, that it reached the captain's ears, as he was smoking his pipe upon deck. "Hey day," says he, "what, have we a woman in the ship!" and immediately descended into the cabin, where he found the two Methodists on their knees.

"Pox on't," says the captain, "I thought you had a woman with you here; I could have sworn I had heard one cry out as if she had been ravishing,<sup>4</sup> and yet the devil must have been in you, if you could convey her in here without my knowledge."

"I defy the devil and all his works," answered the he-Methodist. "He has no power but over the wicked; and if he be in the ship, thy oaths<sup>5</sup> must have brought him hither: for I have heard thee pronounce more than twenty since I came on board; and we should have been at the bottom before this, had not my prayers prevented it."

"Don't abuse my vessel," cried the captain, "she is as safe a vessel, and as good a sailer as ever floated, and if you had been afraid of going to the bottom, you might have stayed on shore and been damned."

The Methodist made no answer, but fell a groaning, and that so loud, that the Captain giving him a hearty curse or two, quitted the cabin, and resumed his pipe.

He was no sooner gone, than the Methodist gave farther tokens of brotherly love to his companion, which soon became so importunate and troublesome to her, that after having gently rejected his hands several times, she at last recollected the sex she had assumed, and gave him so violent a blow in the nostrils, that the blood issued from them with great impetuosity.

Whether fighting be opposite to the tenets of his sect (for I have not the honor to be deeply read in their doctrines) or from what other motive it proceeded, I will not determine; but the Methodist made no other return to this rough treatment, than by many groans, and prayed heartily to be delivered soon from the conversation of the wicked; which prayers were at length so successful, that, together with a very brisk gale, they brought the vessel into Dublin harbor.

Here our adventurer took a lodging in a backstreet near St. Stephen's Green,<sup>6</sup> at which place she intended to preach the next day; but had got a cold in the voyage, which occasioned such a hoarseness that made it impossible to put that design in practice.

There lodged in the same house with her, a brisk<sup>7</sup> widow of near 40 years of age, who had buried two husbands, and seemed by her behavior to be far from having determined against a third expedition to the land of matrimony.

To this widow our adventurer began presently to make addresses, and as he at present wanted<sup>8</sup> tongue to express the ardency of his flame, he was obliged to make use of actions of endearment such as squeezing, kissing, toying, &c.

These were received in such a manner by the fair widow, that her lover thought he had sufficient encouragement to proceed to a formal declaration of his passion. And this she chose to do by letter, as her voice still continued too hoarse for uttering the soft accents of love.

A letter therefore was penned accordingly in the usual style, which, to prevent any miscarriages, Mrs. Hamilton thought proper to deliver with her own hands; and immediately retired to give the adored lady an opportunity of digesting the contents alone, little doubting of an answer agreeable to her wishes, or at least such a one as the coyness of the sex generally dictates in the beginning of an amour, and which lovers, by long experience, know pretty well how to interpret.

But what was the gallant's surprise, when in return to an amorous epistle, she read the following sarcasms, which it was impossible for the most sanguine temper to misunderstand, or construe favorably.

"Sir,

I was greatly astonished at what you put into my hands. Indeed I thought, when I took it, it might have been an opera song, and which for certain reasons I should think, when your cold is gone, you might sing as well as Farinelli,<sup>9</sup> from the great resemblance there is between your persons. I know not what you mean by encouragement to your hopes; if I could have conceived my innocent freedoms could have been so misrepresented, I should have been more upon my guard: but you have taught me how to watch my actions for the future, and to preserve myself even from any suspicion of forfeiting the regard I owe to the memory of the best of men, by any future choice. The remembrance of that dear person makes me incapable of proceeding farther.—”

And so firm was this resolution, that she would never afterwards admit of the least familiarity with the despairing Mrs. Hamilton; but perhaps that destiny which is remarked to interpose in all matrimonial things, had taken the widow into her protection: for in a few days afterwards, she was married to one Jack Strong, a cadet in an Irish regiment.

Our adventurer being thus disappointed in her love, and what is worse, her money drawing towards an end, began to have some thoughts of returning home, when fortune seemed inclined to make her amends for the tricks she had hitherto played her, and accordingly now threw another mistress in her way, whose fortune was much superior to the former widow, and who received Mrs. Hamilton’s addresses with all the complaisance she could wish.

This lady, whose name was Rushford, was the widow of a rich cheese-monger, who left her all he had, and only one great grandchild to take care of, whom, at her death, he recommended to be her heir; but wholly at her own power and discretion.

She was now in the sixty-eighth year of her age, and had not, it seems, entirely abandoned all thoughts of the pleasures of this world: for she was no sooner acquainted with Mrs. Hamilton, but, taking her for a beautiful lad of about eighteen, she cast the eyes of affection on her, and having pretty well outlived the bashfulness of her youth, made little scruple of giving hints of her passion of her own accord.

It has been observed that women know more of one another than the wisest men (if ever such have been employed in the study) have with all their art been capable of discovering. It is therefore no wonder that these hints were quickly perceived and understood by the female gallant, who animadverting on the conveniency which the old gentlewoman’s fortune would produce in her present situation, very gladly embraced the opportunity, and advancing with great warmth of love to the attack, in which she was received almost with open arms, by the tottering citadel, which presently offered to throw open the gates, and surrender at discretion.<sup>1</sup>

In her amour with the former widow, Mrs. Hamilton had never any other design than of gaining the lady's affection, and then discovering herself to her, hoping to have had the same success which Mrs. Johnson had found with her: but with this old lady, whose fortune only she was desirous to possess, such views would have afforded very little gratification. After some reflection, therefore, a device entered into her head, as strange and surprising as it was wicked and vile; and this was actually to marry the old woman, and to deceive her, by means which decency forbids me even to mention.

The wedding was accordingly celebrated in the most public manner, and with all kind of gaiety, the old woman greatly triumphing in her shame, and instead of hiding her own head for fear of infamy, was actually proud of the beauty of her new husband, for whose sake she intended to disinherit her poor great-grandson, though she had derived her riches from her husband's family, who had always intended this boy as his heir. Nay, what may seem very remarkable, she insisted on the parson's not omitting the prayer in the matrimonial service for fruitfulness;<sup>2</sup> drest herself as airy as a girl of eighteen, concealed twenty years of her age, and laughed and promoted all the jokes which are usual at weddings; but she was not so well pleased with a repartee of her great-grandson, a pretty and a smart lad, who, when somebody jested on the bridegroom because he had no beard, answered smartly: "There should never be a beard on both sides": for indeed the old lady's chin was pretty well stocked with bristles.

Nor was this bride contented with displaying her shame by a public wedding dinner, she would have the whole ceremony completed, and the stocking was accordingly thrown<sup>3</sup> with the usual sport and merriment.

During the first three days of the marriage, the bride expressed herself so well satisfied with her choice, that being in company with another old lady, she exulted so much in her happiness, that her friend began to envy her, and could not forbear inveighing against effeminacy in men; upon which a discourse arose between the two old ladies, not proper to be repeated, if I knew every particular; but ended at the last, in the unmarried lady's declaring to the bride, that she thought her husband looked more like a woman than a man. To which the other replied in triumph, he was the best man in Ireland.

This and the rest which past was faithfully recounted to Mrs. Hamilton by her wife at their next meeting, and occasioned our young bridegroom to blush, which the old lady perceiving and regarding as an effect of youth, fell upon her in a rage of love like a tigress, and almost murdered her with kisses.

One of our English poets remarks in the case of a more able husband than Mrs. Hamilton was, when his wife grew amorous in an unseasonable time:

The doctor understood the call,
But had not always wherewithal.<sup>4</sup>

So it happened to our poor bridegroom, who having not at that time the wherewithal about her, was obliged to remain merely passive, under all this torrent of kindness of his wife; but this did not discourage her, who was an experienced woman, and thought she had a cure for this coldness in her husband, the efficacy of which she might perhaps have essayed formerly. Saying therefore with a tender smile to her husband, "I believe you are a woman," her hands began to move in such direction, that the discovery would absolutely have been made, had not the arrival of dinner, at that very instant, prevented it.

However, as there is but one way of laying the spirit of curiosity, when once raised in a woman, viz. by satisfying it, so that discovery, though delayed, could not now be long prevented. And accordingly the very next night, the husband and wife had not been long in bed together, before a storm arose, as if drums, guns, wind and thunder were all roaring together. Villain, rogue, whore, beast, cheat all resounded at the same instant, and were followed by curses, imprecations and threats, which soon waked the poor great-grandson in the garret; who immediately ran downstairs into his great-grandmother's room. He found her in the midst of it in her shift, with a handful of shirt in one hand, and a handful of hair in the other, stamping and crying, "I am undone, cheated, abused, ruined, robbed by a vile jade, imposter, whore.—" "What is the matter, dear madam," answered the youth; "O child," replied she, "undone! I am married to one who is no man. My husband? a woman, a woman, a woman." "Ay," said the grandson, "where is she?"—"Run away, gone," said the great-grandmother, and indeed so she was: for no sooner was the fatal discovery made than the poor female bridegroom whipt on her breeches, in the pockets of which she had stowed all the money she could, and slipping on her shoes, with her coat, waistcoat and stockings in her hands, had made the best of her way into the street, leaving almost one half of her shirt behind, which the enraged wife had tore from her back.

As Mrs. Hamilton well knew that an adventure of that kind would soon fill all Dublin, and that it was impossible for her to remain there undiscovered, she hastened away to the Key, where by good fortune, she met with a ship just bound to Dartmouth,<sup>5</sup> on board which she immediately went, and sailed out of the harbor, before her pursuers could find out or overtake her.

She was a full fortnight in her passage, during which time, no adventure occurred worthy remembrance. At length she landed at Dartmouth, where she soon provided herself with linen, and thence went to Totness, where she assumed the title of a doctor of physic,<sup>6</sup> and took lodgings in the house of one Mrs. Baytree.

Here she soon became acquainted with a young girl, the daughter of one Mr. Ivythorn, who had the green sickness; a distemper which the doctor gave out he could cure by an infallible nostrum.<sup>7</sup>

The doctor had not been long entrusted with the care of this young patient before he began to make love to her:<sup>8</sup> for though her complexion was somewhat faded with her distemper, she was otherwise extremely pretty.

This girl became an easy conquest to the doctor, and the day of their marriage was appointed, without the knowledge or even suspicion of her father, or of an old aunt who was very fond of her, and would neither of them have easily given their consent to the match, had the doctor been as good a man as the niece thought him.

At the day appointed, the doctor and his mistress found means to escape very early in the morning from Totness, and went to a town called Ashburton<sup>9</sup> in Devonshire, where they were married by a regular license which the doctor had previously obtained.

Here they stayed two days at a public house, during which time the doctor so well acted his part, that his bride had not the least suspicion of the legality of her marriage, or that she had not got a husband for life. The third day they returned to Totness, where they both threw themselves at Mr. Ivythorn's feet, who was highly rejoiced at finding his daughter restored to him, and that she was not debauched, as he had suspected of her. And being a very worthy good-natured man, and regarding the true interest and happiness of his daughter more than the satisfying his own pride, ambition, or obstinacy, he was prevailed on to forgive her, and to receive her and her husband into his house, as his children, notwithstanding the opposition of the old aunt, who declared she would never forgive the wanton slut, and immediately quitted the house, as soon as the young couple were admitted into it.

The doctor and his wife lived together above a fortnight, without the least doubt conceived by the wife, or by any other person, of the doctor's being what he appeared; till one evening the doctor having drank a little too much punch, slept somewhat longer than usual, and when he waked, he found his wife in tears, who asked her husband, amidst many sobs, how he could be so barbarous to have taken such advantage of her ignorance and innocence, and to ruin her in such a manner? The doctor being surprised and scarce awake, asked her what he had done. "Done," says she, "have you not married me a poor young girl, when you know you have not—you have not—what you ought to have. I always thought indeed your shape was something odd, and have often wondered that you had not the least bit of beard; but I thought you had been a man for all that, or I am sure I would not have been so wicked to marry you for the world." The doctor endeavored to pacify her, by every kind of promise, and telling her she would have all the pleasures of marriage without the inconveniences. "No, no," said she, "you shall not persuade me to that, nor will I be guilty of so much wickedness on any account. I will tell my papa of you as soon as I am up; for you are no husband of mine, nor will I ever have anything more to say to you." Which resolution the doctor finding himself unable to alter, she put on her clothes with all the haste she could, and taking a horse which she had bought a few days before, made the best of her way, through byroads and across the country, into Somersetshire, missing Exeter and every other great town which lay in the road.

And well it was for her, that she used both this haste and precaution: for Mr. Ivythorn having heard his daughter's story, immediately obtained a warrant from a justice of peace, with which he presently dispatched the proper officers; and not only so, but set forward himself to Exeter, in order to try if he could learn any news of his son-in-law, or apprehend her there; till after much search being unable to hear any tidings of her, he was obliged to set down contented with his misfortune, as was his poor daughter to submit to all the ill-natured sneers of her own sex, who were often witty at her expense, and at the expense of their own decency.

The doctor having escaped, arrived safe at Wells<sup>1</sup> in Somersetshire, where thinking herself at a safe distance from her pursuers, she again sat herself down in quest of new adventures.

She had not been long in this city, before she became acquainted with one Mary Price, a girl of about eighteen years of age, and of extraordinary beauty. With this girl, hath this wicked woman since her confinement declared, she was really as much in love as it was possible for a man ever to be with one of her own sex.

The first opportunity our doctor obtained of conversing closely with this new mistress was at a dancing among the inferior sort of people,<sup>2</sup> in contriving which the doctor had herself the principal share. At the meeting the two lovers had an occasion of dancing all night together; and the doctor lost no opportunity of showing his fondness, as well by his tongue as by his hands, whispering many soft things in her ears, and squeezing as many soft things into her hands, which, together with a good number of kisses, &c. so pleased and warmed this poor girl, who never before had felt any of those tender sensations which we call love, that she retired from the dancing in a flutter of spirits, which her youth and ignorance could not well account for; but which did not suffer her to close her eyes, either that morning or the next night.

The day after that the doctor sent her the following letter.

"My Dearest Molly,
Excuse the fondness of that expression; for I assure you, my angel, all I write to you proceeds only from my heart, which you have so entirely conquered, and made your own, that nothing else has any share in it; and, my angel, could you know what I feel when I am writing to you, nay even at every thought of my Molly, I know I should gain your pity if not your love; if I am so happy to have already succeeded in raising the former, do let me have once more an opportunity of seeing you, and that soon, that I might breathe forth my soul at those dear feet, where I would willingly die, if I am not suffered to lie there and live. My sweetest creature, give me leave to subscribe myself

Your fond, doting,
Undone Slave"

This letter added much to the disquietude which before began to torment poor Molly's breast. She read it over twenty times, and, at last, having carefully surveyed every part of the room, that nobody was present, she kissed it eagerly. However, as she was perfectly modest, and afraid of appearing too forward, she resolved not to answer this first letter; and if she met the doctor, to behave with great coldness to him.

Her mother being ill, prevented her going out that day; and the next morning she received a second letter from the doctor, in terms more warm and endearing than before, and which made so absolute a conquest over the unexperienced and tender heart of this poor girl, that she suffered herself to be prevailed on, by the entreaties of her lover, to write an answer, which nevertheless she determined should be so distant and cool, that the woman of the strictest virtue and modesty in England might have no reason to be ashamed of having writ it; of which letter the reader hath here an exact copy:

"Sur,

I Haf recevd boath your too litters, and sur I ham much surprise hat the loafe you priten to haf for so pur a garl as mee. I kan nut beleef you wul disgrace yourself by marring sutch a yf as mee, and Sur I wool nut be thee hore of the gratest man in the kuntry. For thof mi vartu his all I haf, yit hit is a potion I ham rissolv to kare to mi housband, soe noe moor at presant, from your umble savant to cummand."

The doctor received this letter with all the ecstasies any lover could be inspired with, and as Mr. Congreve says in his Old Bachelor, thought there was more eloquence in the false spellings with which it abounded than in all Aristotle.<sup>3</sup> She now resolved to be no longer contented with this distant kind of conversation, but to meet her mistress face to face. Accordingly that very afternoon she went to her mother's house, and enquired for her poor Molly, who no sooner heard her lover's voice than she fell a trembling in the most violent manner. Her sister who opened the door informed the doctor she was at home, and let the imposter in; but Molly being then in dishabille, would not see him till she had put on clean linen, and was arrayed from head to foot in as neat, though not in so fine a manner, as the highest court lady in the kingdom could attire herself in, to receive her embroidered lover.

Very tender and delicate was the interview of this pair, and if any corner of Molly's heart remained untaken, it was now totally subdued. She would willingly have postponed the match somewhat longer, from her strict regard to decency; but the earnestness and ardor of her lover would not suffer her, and she was at last obliged to consent to be married within two days.

Her sister, who was older than herself, and had overheard all that had past, no sooner perceived the doctor gone, than she came to her, and wishing her joy with a sneer, said much good may it do her with such a husband; for that, for her own part, she would almost as willingly be married to one of her own sex, and made some remarks not so proper to be here inserted. This was resented by the other with much warmth. She said she had chosen for herself only, and that if she was pleased, it did not become people to trouble their heads with what was none of their business. She was indeed so extremely enamored, that I question whether she would have exchanged the doctor for the greatest and richest match in the world.

And had not her affections been fixed in this strong manner, it is possible that an accident which happened the very next night might have altered her mind: for being at another dancing with her lover, a quarrel arose between the doctor and a man there present, upon which the mother<sup>4</sup> seizing the former violently by the collar, tore open her waistcoat, and rent her shirt, so that all her breast was discovered, which, though beyond expression beautiful in a woman, were of so different a kind from the bosom of a man, that the married women there set up a great titter; and though it did not bring the doctor's sex into an absolute suspicion, yet caused some whispers, which perhaps might have spoiled the match with a less innocent and less enamored virgin.

It had however no such effect on poor Molly. As her fond heart was free from any deceit, so was it entirely free from suspicion; and accordingly, at the fixed time she met the doctor, and their nuptials were celebrated in the usual form.

The mother was extremely pleased at this preferment<sup>5</sup> (as she thought it) of her daughter. The joy of it did indeed contribute to restore her perfectly to health, and nothing but mirth and happiness appeared in the faces of the whole family.

The new married couple not only continued but greatly increased the fondness which they had conceived for each other, and poor Molly, from some stories she told among her acquaintance, the other young married women of the town, was received as a great fibber, and was at last universally laughed at as such among them all.

Three months past in this manner, when the doctor was sent for to Glastonbury to a patient (for the fame of our adventurer's knowledge in physic began now to spread) when a person of Totness being accidentally present, happened to see and know her, and having heard upon enquiry, that the doctor was married at Wells, as we have above mentioned, related the whole story of Mr. Ivythorn's daughter, and the whole adventure at Totness.

News of this kind seldom wants wings; it reached Wells, and the ears of the doctor's mother<sup>6</sup> before her return from Glastonbury. Upon this the old woman immediately sent for her daughter, and very strictly examined her, telling her the great sin she would be guilty of, if she concealed a fact of this kind, and the great disgrace she would bring on her own family, and even on her whole sex, by living quietly and contentedly with a husband who was in any degree less a man than the rest of his neighbors.

Molly assured her mother of the falsehood of this report; and as it is usual for persons who are too eager in any cause to prove too much, she asserted some things which staggered her mother's belief, and made her cry out, "O child, there is no such thing in human nature."

Such was the progress this story had made in Wells, that before the doctor arrived there, it was in everybody's mouth; and as the doctor rode through the streets, the mob, especially the women, all paid their compliments of congratulation. Some laughed at her, others threw dirt at her, and others used terms of reproach not fit to be commemorated. When she came to her own house, she found her wife in tears, and having asked her the cause, was informed of the dialogue which had past between her and her mother. Upon which the doctor, though he knew not yet by what means the discovery had been made, yet too well knowing the truth, began to think of using the same method, which she had heard before put in practice, of delivering herself from any impertinence; for as to danger, she was not sufficiently versed in the laws to apprehend any.

In the meantime, the mother, at the solicitation of some of her relations, who, notwithstanding the stout denial of the wife, had given credit to the story, had applied herself to a magistrate, before whom the Totness man appeared, and gave evidence as is before mentioned. Upon this a warrant was granted to apprehend the doctor, with which the constable arrived at her house, just as she was meditating her escape.

The husband was no sooner seized, but the wife threw herself into the greatest agonies of rage and grief, vowing that he was injured, and that the information was false and malicious, and that she was resolved to attend her husband wherever they conveyed him.

And now they all proceeded before the justice, where a strict examination being made into the affair, the whole happened to be true, to the great shock and astonishment of everybody; but more especially of the poor wife, who fell into fits, out of which she was with great difficulty recovered.

The whole truth having been disclosed before the justice, and something of too vile, wicked, and scandalous a nature, which was found in the doctor's trunk, having been produced in evidence against her, she was committed to Bridewell, and Mr. Gold,<sup>7</sup> an eminent and learned counsellor at law, who lives in those parts, was consulted with upon the occasion, who gave his advice that she should be prosecuted at the next sessions, on a clause in the vagrant act, for having by false and deceitful practice endeavored to impose on some of his Majesty's subjects.<sup>8</sup>

As the doctor was conveyed to Bridewell, she was attended by many insults from the mob; but what was more unjustifiable was the cruel treatment which the poor innocent wife received from her own sex, upon the extraordinary accounts which she had formerly given of her husband.

Accordingly at the ensuing sessions of the peace for the county of Somerset, the doctor was indicted for the abovementioned diabolical fact,<sup>9</sup> and after a fair trial convicted, to the entire satisfaction of the whole court.

At the trial the said Mary Price, the wife, was produced as a witness, and being asked by the council, whether she had ever any suspicion of the doctor's sex during the whole time of the courtship, she answered positively in the negative. She was then asked how long they had been married, to which she answered three months; and whether they had cohabited the whole time together? to which her reply was in the affirmative. Then the council asked her, whether during the time of this cohabitation, she imagined the doctor had behaved to her as a husband ought to his wife? Her modesty confounded her a little at this question; but at last answered she did imagine so. Lastly, she was asked when it was that she first harbored any suspicion of her being imposed upon? To which she answered, she had not the least suspicion till her husband was carried before a magistrate, and there discovered, as hath been said above.

The prisoner having been convicted of this base and scandalous crime, was by the court sentenced to be publicly and severely whipt four several times, in four market towns within the county of Somerset, to wit, once in each market town, and to be imprisoned, &c.

These whippings she has accordingly undergone, and very severely have they been inflicted, insomuch, that those persons who have more regard to beauty than to justice, could not refrain from exerting some pity toward her, when they saw so lovely a skin scarified with rods, in such a manner that her back was almost flayed; yet so little effect had the smart or shame of this punishment on the person who underwent it, that the very evening she had suffered the first whipping, she offered the jailer money, to procure her a young girl to satisfy her most monstrous and unnatural desires.

But it is to be hoped that this example will be sufficient to deter all others from the commission of any such foul and unnatural crimes: for which, if they escape the shame and ruin which they so well deserve in this world, they will be most certain of meeting with their full punishment in the next: for unnatural affections are equally vicious and equally detestable in both sexes, nay, if modesty be the peculiar characteristic of the fair sex, it is in them most shocking and odious to prostitute and debase it.

In order to caution therefore that lovely sex, which, while they preserve their natural innocence and purity, will still look most lovely in the eyes of men, the above pages have been written, which, that they might be worthy of their perusal, such strict regard hath been had to the utmost decency, that notwithstanding the subject of this narrative be of a nature so difficult to be handled inoffensively, not a single word occurs through the whole which might shock the most delicate ear, or give offense to the purest chastity.

MARY LEAPOR

A gardener's daughter, Mary Leapor (1722–1746) spent her short life in or near the small town of Brackley in Northamptonshire. When she was ten or eleven "she would often be scribbling," and poetry turned into a consuming interest. One of her poems describes her sitting "whole evenings, reading wicked plays" by candlelight; according to another, she lost employment as a cook-maid because she would not stop writing, even in the kitchen. Passed around the neighborhood, her verse impressed Bridget Freemantle, the daughter of a former Oxford don; she became Leapor's best friend and mentor. Together they planned to publish Leapor's work. A play was sent to Colley Cibber, the impresario and poet laureate, but it was returned stained by wine. Leapor's health was rarely good, and she died of measles at age twenty-four; she had never seen any of her poems in print. But Freemantle arranged an edition of Leapor's Poems upon Several Occasions (1748), with six hundred subscribers, and it was warmly received. Samuel Richardson admired the "sweetly easy poems" so much that he published a second volume; later, William Cowper thought they showed "more marks of a true poetical talent than I remember to have observed in the verses of any, whether male or female, so disadvantageously circumstanced." Recently Leapor's work has attracted renewed attention for its wit and skill as well as its sharp observations about the life of a working-class woman.

The preface to Leapor's Poems reports that "the author she most admired was Mr. Pope, whom she chiefly endeavored to imitate." "An Essay on Woman" reflects careful study of Pope's poetry about women and gender, particularly his "Epistle to a Lady." But its view of women's predicaments is very much darker. If women are living contradictions, as Pope had asserted, the reason is that whatever they are and whatever they do can be turned against them. Beauty will be betrayed, wit and learning will be shunned, and the pursuit of wealth will shrink the soul. Leapor's own situation gives her satire bite. As a gardener's daughter, she knows that the flower of womanhood costs money to cultivate and does not last; as someone witty, poor, in ill health, and excluded from Pope's glamorous world, she sees through romantic myths. In "An Epistle to a Lady" (directly echoing Pope's title), she more autobiographically reflects on education, the main avenue of advancement for women proposed by reformers throughout the period (including Astell, Defoe, Addison, and Johnson). Leapor's experience makes her pessimistic: her learning merely allows her to depict her bleak place in the world on an astronomically expanded scale; and homely, tattered images must intrude on her dreams of the wealth and leisure that she knows a genteel education and a poetic vocation require. But despite Leapor's stress on her frustrating social position and on the softness and weakness of women in general, her verse is strong. This poet never stops fighting against the traps in which she is caught.

An Essay on Woman

WOMAN—a pleasing but a short-lived flower,
Too soft for business and too weak for power:
A wife in bondage, or neglected maid;
Despised if ugly; if she's fair—betrayed.
5 'Tis wealth alone inspires every grace,
And calls the raptures to her plenteous<sup>1</sup> face.
What numbers for those charming features pine,
If blooming acres<sup>2</sup> round her temples twine?
Her lip the strawberry, and her eyes more bright
Than sparkling Venus in a frosty night;
10 Pale lilies fade and, when the fair appears,
Snow turns a negro<sup>3</sup> and dissolves in tears,
And where the charmer treads her magic toe,
On English ground Arabian odors grow;
Till mighty Hymen<sup>4</sup> lifts his sceptred rod,
15 And sinks her glories with a fatal nod,
Dissolves her triumphs, sweeps her charms away,
And turns the goddess to her native clay.
But, Artemisia,<sup>5</sup> let your servant sing
What small advantage wealth and beauties bring.
20 Who would be wise, that knew Pamphilia's fate?
Or who be fair, and joined to Sylvia's mate?
Sylvia, whose cheeks are fresh as early day,
As evening mild, and sweet as spicy May;
And yet that face her partial husband tires,
25 And those bright eyes, that all the world admires.
Pamphilia's wit who does not strive to shun,
Like death's infection or a dog-day's sun?
The damsels view her with malignant eyes,
The men are vexed to find a nymph so wise, 30

And wisdom only serves to make her know
The keen sensation of superior woe.
The secret whisper and the listening ear,
The scornful eyebrow and the hated sneer,
The giddy censures of her babbling kind,
35 With thousand ills that grate a gentle mind,
By her are tasted in the first degree,
Though overlooked by Simplicus and me.
Does thirst of gold a virgin's heart inspire,
Instilled by nature or a careful sire?
40 Then let her quit extravagance and play,
The brisk companion and expensive tea,
To feast with Cordia in her filthy sty
On stewed potatoes or on mouldy pie;
Whose eager<sup>o</sup> eyes stare ghastly at the poor,
45 And fright the beggars from the hated door;
In greasy clouts she wraps her smoky chin,
And holds that pride's a never-pardoned sin.
If this be wealth, no matter where it falls;
But save, ye Muses, save your Mira's<sup>6</sup> walls:
50 Still give me pleasing indolence and ease,
A fire to warm me and a friend to please.
Since, whether sunk in avarice or pride,
A wanton virgin or a starving bride,
Or wondering crowds attend her charming tongue,
55 Or deemed an idiot, ever speaks the wrong;
Though nature armed us for the growing ill
With fraudulent cunning and a headstrong will,
Yet, with ten thousand follies to her charge,
Unhappy woman's but a slave at large.

An Epistle to a Lady<sup>1</sup>

In vain, dear Madam, yes, in vain you strive,
Alas! to make your luckless Mira thrive;
For Tycho and Copernicus<sup>2</sup> agree,
No golden planet bent its rays on me.<sup>3</sup>

5 'Tis twenty winters, if it is no more,
To speak the truth it may be twenty four:
As many springs their 'pointed<sup>o</sup> space have run,
Since Mira's eyes first opened on the sun.
'Twas when the flocks on slabby<sup>o</sup> hillocks lie,
10 And the cold fishes rule the watery sky;<sup>4</sup>
But though these eyes the learned page explore,
And turn the ponderous volumes o'er and o'er,
I find no comfort from their systems flow,<sup>5</sup>
But am dejected more as more I know.
15 Hope shines a while, but like a vapor flies
(The fate of all the curious and the wise)
For, ah! cold Saturn<sup>6</sup> triumphed on that day,
And frowning Sol denied his golden ray.

You see I'm learned, and I show't the more,
20 That none may wonder when they find me poor.
Yet Mira dreams, as slumbering poets may,
And rolls in treasures till the breaking day:
While books and pictures in bright order rise,
And painted parlors swim before her eyes;
25 Till the shrill clock impertinently rings,
And the soft visions move their shining wings;
Then Mira wakes—her pictures are no more,
And through her fingers slides the vanished ore.

30 Convinced too soon, her eye unwilling falls
On the blue curtains and the dusty walls;
She wakes, alas! to business and to woes,
To sweep her kitchen, and to mend her clothes.<sup>7</sup>

35 But see pale sickness with her languid eyes,
At whose appearance all delusion flies:
The world recedes, its vanities decline,
Clorinda's features seem as faint as mine;
Gay robes no more the aching sight admires,
Wit grates the ear, and melting music tires;
Its wonted pleasures with each sense decay,
40 Books please no more, and paintings fade away,
The sliding joys in misty vapors end;
Yet let me still, ah! let me grasp a friend;
And when each joy, when each loved object flies,
Be you the last that leaves my closing eyes.

45 But how will this dismantled<sup>o</sup> soul appear,
When stripped of all it lately held so dear,
Forced from its prison of expiring clay,
Afraid and shivering at the doubtful way?

50 Yet did these eyes a dying parent<sup>8</sup> see,
Loosed from all cares except a thought for me,
Without a tear resign her shortening breath,
And dauntless meet the lingering stroke of death.
Then at th'Almighty's sentence shall I mourn:
"Of dust thou art, to dust shalt thou return";<sup>9</sup>
Or shall I wish to stretch the line of fate,
55 That the dull years may bear a longer date,
To share the follies of succeeding times
With more vexations and with deeper crimes?
Ah no—though Heav'n brings near the final day,
For such a life I will not, dare not pray;
60 But let the tear for future mercy flow,

65                      And fall resigned beneath the mighty blow.
                          Nor I alone—for through the spacious ball,<sup>o</sup>
                          With me will numbers of all ages fall:
                          And the same day that Mira yields her breath,
                          Thousands may enter through the gates of death.

HANNAH SNELL AND ROBERT WALKER

Hannah Snell (1723–1792) was not the only person in the eighteenth century celebrated in the British press as a woman who passed as a man to serve in Britain's wars as a soldier, but she became the most famous. Though her father was a hosier, her family in Worcester had a military bent, with several of her brothers becoming, and several of her sisters marrying, soldiers or sailors. Snell herself married a sailor, who then abandoned her. She embarked on her own military career to pursue him, adopting her brother-in-law's name James Gray and serving as a marine, most actively in India, from 1747 to 1750. The year she was discharged, she published The Female Soldier, or the Surprising Life and Adventures of Hannah Snell with the printer Robert Walker. It is clearly Walker's voice that narrates the story, though the text also insists that the account comes straight from Snell who, as it explains, "could read exceeding well" but could not write. The book made her a celebrity, quickly selling out its first printing and leading to a second in 1750, and launched her brief career in Goodman's Fields Theatre, in which she would sing songs and perform military maneuvers in uniform with a corps of fellow "Amazons" who marched onstage. After demand for her performances waned by 1751, she briefly kept a pub in East London called the Female Warrior, then settled into family life, marrying twice and mothering two children. She remained a figure of cultural memory, her story recounted in Bram Stoker's Famous Imposters (1910) and the children's story "Young Amazon Snell" (1913) by Andrew Lang, among other publications through the nineteenth, twentieth, and twenty-first centuries.

Portrait of Hannah Snell, 1750, engraved by John Faber, after a painting by Richard Phelps.

The presentation of Snell's gender identity by Walker and Snell herself is complicated. On one hand, the work's title establishes that identity as female, and her "scene" in the alehouse with her comrades toward the end of the story comes across as a revelation of the truth about herself: "I am as much a woman as my mother ever was, and my real name is Hannah Snell." On the other, the text signals her non-normative gender identity in numerous respects: when she plays soldier as a child, she takes up a masculine role "naturally," as it were, and the narrator flatly declares later that "she had the real soul of a man in her breast"—though some aspects of male behavior, such as sailors' carousing in Lisbon, cause her "the utmost disgust." Finally, her theatrical stint in Goodman's Fields, publicly performing as a woman performing as a man, threw conventional gender categories into a kind of heady (though briefly lucrative) disarray. Her motivations to be a marine seem to exceed her supposedly primary one, to pursue her husband, as her tale develops. In this, her case resembles other publicly recorded accounts of women who dressed as men to follow their husbands or lovers in the military, such as Mrs. Christian Davies, whose widely read Life and Adventures (1740) recounted her bravery serving in King William's and the Duke of Marlborough's wars from 1693 to 1706, and Mary Anne Talbot, who fought in the French Revolutionary Wars. Most striking, perhaps, is how positively the text presents Snell's career and prowess as a marine, and how enthusiastically the public seemed to accept her as a heroine, though details of her story reveal the density and subtlety of the period's codes surrounding gender and sexuality, and which lines could and which could never be crossed.

From The Female Soldier; or, the Surprising Life and Adventures of Hannah Snell<sup>1</sup>

To the Public:

Notwithstanding the surprising adventures of this our British heroine, of whom the following pages fully and impartially treat; yet the oddity of her conduct for preserving her sex from being discovered, by which she preserved her virtue, was such that it demands not only respect, but admiration; and as there is nothing to be found in the following sheets but what is matter of fact, it merits the countenance and approbation of every inhabitant of this great isle, especially the fair sex, for whom this treatise is chiefly intended; and the truth of which being confirmed by our heroine's affidavit, made before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, the said affidavit is hereunto annexed, in order to prevent the public from being imposed upon by fictitious accounts.<sup>2</sup>

[SOLDIERING AS A CHILD; HER MARRIAGE]

There is one thing so very remarkable in the martial disposition of Hannah Snell, even in her juvenile years, the account of which being so facetious,<sup>3</sup> shall recommend it to the perusal of the reader.

Hannah, when she was scarce ten years of age, had the seeds of heroism as it were implanted in her nature, and she used often to declare to her companions, that she would be a soldier if she lived; and as a preceding testimony of this truth, she formed a company of young soldiers among her play-fellows, and of which she was chief commander, at the head of whom she often appeared, and was used to parade the whole city of Worcester. This body of young volunteers were admired all over the town, and they were styled young Amazon<sup>4</sup> Snell's Company: and this martial spirit grew up with her, until it carried her through the many scenes and vicissitudes she encountered for nigh five years, as is fully and impartially related in this treatise of her adventures.

Some time after she came to London,<sup>5</sup> she contracted an acquaintance with one James Summs, a sailor, who was a Dutchman; this acquaintance was gradually improved into a familiarity, and this familiarity soon created a mutual, though not a criminal passion; for in a little time, Summs made his addresses to her as a lover, and gained her consent, and was married to her at the Fleet, on the sixth day of January, 1743–4.<sup>6</sup> But all his promises of friendship proved instances of the highest perfidy, and he turned out the worst and most unnatural of husbands. Since, though she had charms enough to captivate the heart and secure the affection of any reasonable man, yet she was despised and contemned by her husband, who not only kept criminal company with other women of the basest characters, but also made away with her things, in order to support his luxury, and the daily expenses of his whores. During this unlucky period of the husband's debauchery, [t]he poor woman proved with child, and at the same time felt all the shocks of poverty, without exposing her necessities to her nearest friends. But at last, her pregnancy laid the foundation for her passing through all the scenes through which she has wandered; for when she was seven months gone with child, her perfidious husband finding himself deeply involved in debt, made an elopement from<sup>7</sup> her. Notwithstanding these her calamities, she patiently bore herself up under them, and in two months after her husband's departure was delivered of a daughter which lived no more than seven months, and was decently interred at her own expense at St. George's Parish in Middlesex.

From the time of her husband's elopement till the time she put on man's clothes, she continued with her sister, who is married to one James Gray, a house carpenter, in Ship Street, Wapping, and from whence she took her departure unknown to any, and was never heard of until her return; and with whom she now dwells.

As she was now free from all the ties arising from nature and consanguinity; she thought herself privileged to roam in quest of the man, who, without reason, had injured her so much; for there are no bounds to be set either to love, jealousy or hatred in the female mind. That she might execute her designs with the better grace, and the more success, she boldly commenced a man, at least in her dress, and no doubt she had a right to do so, since she had the real soul of a man in her breast. Dismayed at no accidents, and giving a full scope to the genuine bent of her heart, she put on a suit of her brother-in-law, Mr. James Gray's clothes, assumed his name, and set out on the 23d of November, 1745, and travelled to Coventry, with a view of finding her husband, where she enlisted on the 27th of the said month of November, in General Guise's regiment,<sup>8</sup> and in the company belonging to Captain Miller.

[WOUNDED IN INDIA]

James Gray (for that was the name she took upon herself) was one of the party that was ordered under Lieutenant Campbell, of the Independent Companies, to fetch up some stores from the waterside that had been landed out of the fleet;<sup>9</sup> in doing which they had several skirmishes, and one of the common men was shot dead close on her right side; upon which she fired and killed the very man that shot her comrade; and was very near Lieutenant Campbell when he dropped.

She was also in the first party of the English foot that forded the river to get over to Pondicherry, which took her up to her breast, it being so deep; and was likewise very dangerous, as the French kept continually firing on them from a battery of twelve guns.

On the 11th of August she was put on the picquet guard<sup>1</sup> seven nights successively; and was one of a party that lay two days and two nights without any covering in going through the barrier; and as she was likewise put on duty in the trenches some part of the siege, she was obliged to sit or stand all the while near middle deep in water.

At the throwing up of the trenches she worked very hard for about fourteen days, and was paid 5d. English money per day, by one Mr. Melton, who had been at Goodman's Fields Wells<sup>2</sup> to see her since her singing at those wells.

I cannot help here reflecting on the numerous hardships, fatigues, and dangers she had already undergone since her taking upon herself the habit of a man, owing to the cruel usage of a wicked husband, whom vengeance pursued, as the reader will find in its proper places in the following pages;<sup>3</sup> therefore, in order to keep to the story of our heroine, I shall proceed in my history without further digression.

During all this long space of time, our heroine still maintained her wonted intrepidity, and behaved in every respect consistent with the character of a brave British soldier; and notwithstanding she stood so deep in water, she fired no less than thirty-seven rounds of shot; and during the engagement, received six shot in her right leg, and five in her left, and what affected her more than all the rest, one so dangerous in the groin that had she applied for any aid and assistance on that account, she must inevitably have discovered what she was resolutely bent at all adventures, if possible, to conceal.

I know the reader will be desirous to know how the ball was extracted out of her groin, and will imagine that it was next to an impossibility it could be performed without a discovery. Now to rectify the scruples of such, I shall relate this account, as attested by herself, which she said was that after she received the twelve wounds, as before mentioned, she remained all that day, and the following night, in the camp, before she was carried to the hospital, and after she was brought there, and laid in a kit,<sup>4</sup> she continued till next day in the greatest agony and pain, the ball still remaining in the flesh of that wound in her groin, and how to extract it she knew not, for she had not discovered to the surgeons that she had any other wound than those in her legs. This wound being so extreme painful, it almost drove her to the precipice of despair; she often thought of discovering herself, that by that means she might be freed from the unspeakable pain she endured, by having the ball taken out by one of the surgeons; but that resolution was soon banished, and she resolved to run all risks, even at the hazard of her life, rather than her sex should be known. Confirmed in this resolution, she communicated her design to a Black woman, who attended upon her, and could get at the surgeon's medicine, and desired her assistance; and her pain being so very great, that she was unable to endure it much longer, she intended to try an experiment upon herself, which was to endeavor to extract the ball out of that wound; but notwithstanding she discovered her pain and resolution to this Black, yet she did not let her know she was a woman. The Black readily came, and afforded her all the assistance she could, by bringing her lint and salve to dress the wound with, which she had recourse to, it being left in the wards where the patients lay; for which act of friendship she made her a present of a rupee at her departure, which is 3s. 4d.<sup>5</sup> of the currency of that country, but here in England it goes for no more than 2s. 6d. Now the manner in which she extracted the ball was full hardy and desperate: she probed the wound with her finger till she came where the ball lay, and then upon feeling it, thrust in both her finger and thumb, and pulled it out. This was a very rough way of proceeding with one's own flesh; but of two evils, as she thought, this was the least, so rather choosing to have her flesh tore and mangled than her sex discovered. After this operation was performed, she applied some of the healing salves which the Black had brought her, by the help of which she made a perfect cure of that dangerous wound.

The reader will here observe the invincible courage and resolution of this woman who, in the midst of so many inconveniences as she daily encountered, should still be able to guard from a discovery of her sex; but indeed it appears she acted so artfully on every emergency as rendered any attempts of this kind abortive; for notwithstanding the wound she kept from the knowledge of the surgeons, by telling them, when they came to examine her, that all the wounds she had received were in her legs, which they readily believed; and by that means prevented any farther search.

[MANAGING MANHOOD]

Here, however, there was one unavoidable misfortune that she was exposed to, and which she was obliged to struggle with, and bear up with courage, though contrary to her inclinations, and that was the insults of the sailors for want of having a rough beard as they had. And upon which score, when she had her head shaved, they would damn her, in their familiar way, and stigmatize her with the disagreeable title of Miss Molly Gray. As these taunts, however, were not only thrown out in jest, she would return the compliment not only with a smile and an oath,<sup>6</sup> but with a challenge of the best sailor of them all, though not so old as they, to prove herself as good a man as any of them on board, for any wager to be deposited in her master's hands.

Though she seemed not to resent the unlucky nickname they had given her, for very prudential reasons, yet it secretly created her many an uneasy hour: and though by her resolute and manly deportment, she prevented them from carrying the joke too far, yet she could not shake off the odious title till they arrived at Lisbon.

Though she said but little, and that without the least resentment, as before observed, in regard to the nickname she had brought with her to Lisbon, she was determined within herself to shake of that odious appellation in Portugal, if possible, and to behave in such a manner, that the secret she had hitherto kept locked up in her bosom might still remain altogether safe and unsuspected, that she should be happy as to arrive once more in her native country.

Whilst this vessel lay at anchor in the port of Lisbon, the ship's crew would frequently go on shore upon parties of pleasure: and when any such proposal was made by her comrades (for the secret purpose abovementioned) she would be one of the most forward to promote the scheme, and would seem to take a peculiar delight in carousing, or in the commission of any other youthful flights, that they were in reality fond of; though all her compliances were indeed forced, and all she did was the result of necessity, and not choice, yet she played the part of a boon companion so naturally, and so far distant from what bore the least appearance to effeminacy, that she answered the end proposed. The name of Miss Molly was here perfectly buried in oblivion; for as she came into all their wildest measures with the utmost alacrity and readiness, she gave them no grounds to suspect her sex, or give her the least uneasiness on that score.

We shall instance one of the frolics she was there concerned in, only to give the reader an idea of our young adventurer's being a perfect actor. There was one of her intimate acquaintance who was not only a marine as well as herself, but one of her messmates likewise, by name Edward Jefferies, who used frequently to go on shore with her in quest of adventures. Amongst other frolics, these two cronies pursued an amour together, by contracting an acquaintance with two young women of the place, that had no nun's flesh about them.<sup>7</sup> Though neither of them, 'tis true, were to compare with our British beauties, yet the handsomest of the two was not only our heroine's favorite, but was as favorably received as her heart could wish.<sup>8</sup> Jefferies, however, would every now and then throw out an amorous glance at his comrade's mistress, and not being over-fond of his own, told our adventurer that as they were partners in their amours, he thought it was but just and reasonable that he should have a chance at least for a night's lodging with the object of his choice, which he ingeniously acknowledged, he liked much better than his own; and for that purpose he should think he acted fair and above board, would she allow of a toss up to determine the point in debate. Our heroine, in order to comply with her comrade's humor, readily consented to the proposition, notwithstanding she insisted on her absolute right and title, in order to enhance his favor. Accordingly, the moot point was to be determined, by throwing up cross or pile.<sup>9</sup> The lot, in short, luckily fell in favor of Jefferies's side; and though our heroine seemed to part with his mistress with some reluctance, yet to show her friendship and impartiality to her messmate, she delivered up her property in a very formal manner into his arms.

Jefferies highly delighted with his good fortune, and the generosity of his messmate, kept up an intimate correspondence with this Portuguese lady as long as the ship rode at anchor in the port, and retained a greater respect than ordinary for his impartial friend till their happy arrival together at the port of London.

When they set sail for England, the enamored Portugueses would fain have quitted their native place to have had the pleasure of a voyage with their sweethearts; but that indulgence could not be procured, by reason the captain had given express orders that no woman should be admitted on board on any pretense, however plausible however.

But the reader is here to observe, that the reason why this strict order was made was that our female heroine, being in the secret of the intention of the two Portuguese Amazons intending to come on board, had contrived to inform the officers of it; and she declares that her reasons for doing so was, lest by a further intimacy with them, it might be the cause of her sex being discovered.

Our heroine, by thus affecting a gaiety of heart, which was not sincere, and by acting such parts, as in secret gave her the utmost disgust, gave a new turn to her character, and her title to manhood was no more suspected; insomuch that she returned at last to her dear native home, as pure as when she first set out.

[REVEALING WOMANHOOD]

In the midst of all their merriment, and some time before they parted by consent, our heroine being conscious to herself that two suits of clothing were due to her from the regiment,<sup>1</sup> proposed to sell them, fearing still she should lose the same if her sex was discovered; upon which she took 16s. for the two suits of regimental clothing.

The money being now paid, and our heroine having been determined to raise all the ready cash she could before she opened a new scene which she well knew would amuse them; I mean, an open and ingenious discovery of a secret that had been so long kept close, and which she proposed to reveal before they parted; prudently considering that she should never perhaps have so favorable an opportunity again of disclosing her sex to such a number of witnesses at once, who would at any time afterwards be ready to testify the truth of all her merry adventures, as well as the many hardships, fatigues, and imminent dangers she had with so much intrepidity and cheerfulness run through, which, had that important discovery been at that juncture omitted, she wisely reflected that it was very probable that her veracity might be called in question, and that most people might suspect her real adventures, as before particularly related, and look upon the narrative of her life as little better than a romance.<sup>2</sup>

As these motives induced our heroine to make an ingenious discovery of her sex before they parted, as judging it the most seasonable opportunity that could possibly offer itself, she proposed to the company, with her usual freedom and alacrity, to call for the reckoning, and discharge that in the first place, share and share alike, or at least she paid her share; and when that was done, she said, "Now gentlemen, I have one very material secret to disclose to you, and lend me your ears for one minute. 'Tis very probable, gentlemen, that we may not after this merry meeting be so happy as to meet all together at one time and at one place anymore; and 'tis very probable likewise, that not one of you will ever see your friend and fellow soldier Jemmy Gray any more."

This she uttered in a soft melancholy tone; at which they started, and one and all (as Jemmy was always universally beloved) crying out "God forbid!"—With that she burst out laughing, and then added, "Why, gentlemen, Jemmy Gray, you will find, will, before we part, cast his skin like a snake, and become a new creature.—" And then, turning to her bedfellow Mr. Moody, and addressing herself to him more particularly than the rest, said in her jocular way, "Had you have known, Master Moody, who you had between a pair of sheets with you, you would have come to closer quarters.—In a word, gentlemen, I am as much a woman as my mother ever was, and my real name is Hannah Snell."

At this sudden and unexpected declaration the whole company stood astonished, but after they had pretty well recovered themselves from the consternation she had thrown them into, like Thomas of Didymus,<sup>3</sup> they began to grow hard of belief, and insisted that what she had advanced was all a fiction, and nothing but one of Jemmy's merry conceits to amuse them.

Her brother and sister, however, interposed, and assured them that they would attest the truth of this metamorphosis, if the company required it, upon oath.

This serious confirmation being allowed by them all sufficient to convince them of the matter of fact, they one and all expatiated very largely in their way, in her commendation. They all applauded her intrepidity and presence of mind as a soldier, in the most imminent dangers, even when death itself stared her in the face. In the next place, they sounded forth her praise, in regard to her peculiar dexterity and address<sup>4</sup> as a sailor, and one who very deservedly was taken notice of and highly respected on that account by her superior officers: they proceeded, from that part of her character, to be lavish in her praise with respect to her sincerity as a friend, and to her humane and compassionate regard for all fellow-soldiers and sailors in general, when indisposed, or under any other kind of distress, wherein it lay in her power (through the interest she had in some of the superior officers) to procure them such relief as the nature of the case required.

They did not however stop here; they expatiated very largely on the evenness of her natural disposition, on the regularity of her conduct, and her peculiar presence of mind, when under the most imminent dangers.

They frankly acknowledged that they never heard her in the least murmur or complain at the toils and fatigues which she frequently underwent; and that she never appeared discontented (as ever they could perceive) though her situation was ever so bad; or in a word, any ways impatient, even when she labored under such a multiplicity of wounds, and felt the most agonizing pains.

As soon as these extraordinary encomiums<sup>5</sup> were over, the abovenamed Mr. Moody, who had been her bedfellow for two nights (as we have hinted before) and the party to whom our Hannah more particularly applied herself at the time of her discovery, was so pleased with the agreeable manner in which she did it, and the encomiums which her comrades gave her, which he was very sensible were no more than the just results of her extraordinary merits, carried the testimonies of his respects to a much higher pitch than any of his comrades; for he protested solemnly and seriously that he was become all on a sudden so enamored with her, on account of her numerous and praiseworthy qualifications, that if Mrs. Hannah had as favorable opinion of him as he had of her, he was very ready and willing to commit matrimony with her that very hour, as in incontestable demonstration of the sincerity of his love and affection.

Though our Hannah made him all the grateful acknowledgments that could be desired for such an unexpected and open declaration of his esteem; yet she modestly refused the generous offer, upon reflecting under what unhappy circumstances she had been in, and what miseries and misfortunes she had been reduced to through the hard-heartedness and inhumanity of a former husband, and was fully determined, if she knew her own mind, never to submit herself to the marriage-yoke<sup>6</sup> any more.

[A PUBLIC FIGURE]

It is demonstrable that our heroine (ever since the discovery of her sex to the public) has generously disdained to live a life of indolence and ease; but has shown a more than ordinary ambition to render herself conspicuous in the military way; and the amazing success which she met with on her benefit night at the New Wells in Goodman's Fields,<sup>7</sup> through her common dexterity and address in representing the jovial tar,<sup>8</sup> and the well-disciplined marine, is an incontestable demonstration.

What she did that night, and what additional performances she has exhibited since, has induced the manager of the said house to enter into a contract with her to pay her a weekly salary for the season, which is such a stipend, that no one woman in ten thousand, of her low extraction and want of literature,<sup>9</sup> could, by any act of industry (how laborious soever) with any possibility procure.

As we have brought our heroine on the public stage, and as she, by her wonted presence of mind, and unwearied application to that her casual profession for her present maintenance and support, we imagine a particular detail of all her several performances, together with a transcript of the most humorous and entertaining songs, with which she continues to divert the town, and that too with universal applause, will be thought no disagreeable amusement.<sup>1</sup>

But before we enter on that detail, give us leave to make a few cursory reflections on her extraordinary merit, which, in our humble opinion, must needs place her on a level with the most celebrated ancient heroines. She ought not to be entered on the same list with the late famous Pamela,<sup>2</sup> who for some time alarmed the town with her extraordinary virtues: those, we are all sensible, were imaginary only, and the result of an artful bookseller, or author's brains, who entertained the public, to his no small emolument, with a fabulous story of a lady of his own creating, one that never in reality had any existence; whereas the virtue and chastity in particular of our heroine, who is no shadow, but true flesh and blood, have been amply displayed in one of the remotest corners of the world; and doubtless will now be displayed all over Europe with equal luster. With what amazing art did she conceal her sex, and by that means preserve her chastity amongst a whole crowd of military men, at the famous siege of Pondicherry, of which we have given we hope a satisfactory account already? With what intrepidity, with what presence of mind, did she behave when on the stormy ocean in a leaky vessel,<sup>3</sup> just ready to sink into the unfathomable abyss? Who, of all the most skillful sailors, was more active and resolute than she was? What marine, how well soever disciplined, ever exercised his small arms better on the poop and quarterdeck than she did? In a word, who fired his pontoon, who brandished his sword with more bravery, and in the attack of the enemy, who with more undaunted courage exposed himself to greater dangers than she did, or who testified a greater readiness to lay down her life for the service of her country, than our female adventurer? If these, and a thousand other instances too tedious to repeat, will not give our heroine an indisputable right and title to as high a character for her honor and virtue as the famed Pamela, though a fictitious one, I am greatly mistaken, and shall freely submit them to the superior judgment of our impartial readers.

ELIZABETH CARTER

Elizabeth Carter (1717–1806) was a distinguished member of the Bluestocking circle, a group of intellectual women and their male supporters that began meeting in the 1750s, led by Elizabeth Montagu (1718–1800). Gifted in languages, Carter published books of poems and numerous translations, and attained an eminence of reputation as a scholar by producing the first English translation of the complete extant works of Epictetus (ca. 50–135 C.E.), the ancient Greek Stoic philosopher. In the following poem, which first appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine in 1741 and later in her 1762 Poems on Several Occasions, she gives a witty account of the struggles undergone by the embodied intellect, turning everything “quite upside down” by gendering the mind as female, and depicting the body as its complaining husband.

A Dialogue

Says Body to Mind, "'tis amazing to see,
We're so nearly related yet never agree,
But lead a most wrangling strange sort of a life,
As great plagues to each other as husband and wife.
The fault is all yours, who with flagrant oppression,
5 Encroach every day on my lawful possession.
The best room<sup>1</sup> in my house you have seized for your own,
And turned the whole tenement quite upside down,
While you hourly call in a disorderly crew
Of vagabond rogues,<sup>2</sup> who have nothing to do 10 But to run in and out, hurry scurry, and keep Such a horrible uproar, I can't get to sleep.
There's my kitchen<sup>3</sup> sometimes is as empty as sound,
I call for my servants,<sup>4</sup> not one's to be found:
They are all sent out on your ladyship's errand,
15 To fetch some more riotous guests in, I warrant!
And since things are growing, I see, worse and worse,
I'm determined to force you to alter your course."
Poor Mind, who heard all with extreme moderation,
20 Thought it now time to speak, and make her allegation.
"'Tis I that, methinks, have most cause to complain,
Who am cramped and confined, like a slave in a chain.
I did but step out, on some weighty affairs,
To visit, last night, my good friends in the stars,

25 When, before I was got half as high as the moon,
 You dispatched Pain and Languor to hurry me down;
 Vi & Armis<sup>5</sup> they seized me, in midst of my flight,
 And shut me in caverns as dark as the night."
 "'Twas no more," replied Body, "than what you deserved,
 30 While you rambled abroad, I at home was half starved:
 And, unless I had closely confined you in hold,
 You had left me to perish with hunger and cold."
 "I've a friend,"<sup>6</sup> answers Mind, "who, though slow, is yet sure,
 And will rid me, at last, of your insolent power:
 35 Will knock down your mud walls,<sup>7</sup> the whole fabric<sup>o</sup> demolish,
 And at once your strong holds and my slavery
 abolish:
 And while in the dust your dull ruins decay,
 I shall snap off my chains, and fly freely away."

HESTER CHAPONE

From a young age, Hester Chapone (1727–1801) led the life of an intellectual woman. Her father, Thomas Mulso, was a gentleman farmer who encouraged her literary pursuits (her mother reportedly did not). She met numerous writers in her twenties and engaged in a well-known correspondence (1750–51) with Samuel Richardson, which challenged and impressed the older novelist. After a marriage of ten months to John Chapone, a lawyer, ended with his death in 1761, she continued to cultivate long, important friendships with talented women, including Elizabeth Carter and Elizabeth Montagu, both eminent members of the Bluestocking circle, which supported women's intellectual achievements. At Montagu's suggestion in 1770, Chapone decided to turn the letters of advice she had been sending her young niece since 1765 into a book. The result, Letters on the Improvement of the Mind, Addressed to a Young Lady, appeared in 1773 and ran to numerous editions into the nineteenth century.

Chapone's Letters are an outstanding, influential example of the conduct book, a genre directed particularly at middle-class young women, urging them to live useful, morally vigilant, modest lives. Most were written by men: notable among them were the Sermons to Young Women (1766) by James Fordyce (1720–1796; see p. 707) and A Father's Legacy to His Daughters (1774) by John Gregory (1724–1773), who tells its addressees to keep their learning to themselves if they wish to attract husbands. Chapone instead recommends that young women explore as many branches of respectable knowledge as they can, including not just household management but also literature, history, the Christian religion, botany, astronomy, the list goes on. (She warns her addressee about novels, advising her "never to read any thing of the sentimental kind" without guidance.) Mary Wollstonecraft, the great feminist author of A Vindication of the Rights of Woman (1792), singled out Chapone among other conduct-book writers: "Mrs. Chapone's Letters are written with such good sense, and unaffected humility, and contain so many useful observations, that I only mention them to pay the worthy writer this tribute of respect." (Wollstonecraft had only disdain for the deceptive, constricting advice of Fordyce and Gregory.) The selection below elaborates Chapone's views of a social arena of paramount importance to her and to countless other women of the eighteenth-century leisured classes: the emotionally full, mutually supportive female friendship. She inculcates traditional moral and religious teachings, warning young women to choose friends with special care, alert to the dangers of levity and vanity. But instead of adhering to these virtues merely to please fathers and potential husbands, young women should embrace them, according to Chapone, to keep themselves emotionally satisfied, safe, and in as much control of their own lives as possible.

From Letters on the Improvement of the Mind, Addressed to a Young Lady

From Letter V: On the Regulation of the Affections

It is a melancholy consideration that the judgment can only be formed by experience, which generally comes too late for our own use, and is seldom accepted for that of others.—I fear it is in vain for me to tell you what dangerous mistakes I made in the early choice of friends—how incapable I then was of finding out such as were fit for me, and how little I was acquainted with the true nature of friendship, when I thought myself most fervently engaged in it!—I am sensible<sup>1</sup> all this will hardly persuade you to choose by the eyes of others, or even to suspect that your own may be deceived.—Yet, if you should give any weight to my observations, it may not be quite useless to mention to you some of the essential requisites in a friend; and to exhort you never to choose one in whom they are wanting.

The first of these is a deep and sincere regard for religion.—If your friend draws her principles from the same source with yourself, if the gospel precepts are the rule of her life, as well as of yours, you will always know what to expect from her, and have one common standard of right and wrong to refer to, by which to regulate all material points of conduct. The woman who thinks lightly of sacred things, or who is ever heard to speak of them with levity or indifference, cannot reasonably be expected to pay a more serious regard to the laws of friendship, or to be uniformly punctual in the performance of any of the duties of society:—take no such person to your bosom, however recommended by good humor, wit, or any other qualification; nor let gaiety or thoughtlessness be deemed an excuse for offending in this important point.

A due regard to reputation is the next indispensable qualification.—“Have regard to thy name,” saith the wise son of Sirach, “for that will continue with thee above a thousand great treasures of gold.”<sup>2</sup>—The young person who is careless of blame, and indifferent to the esteem of the wise and prudent part of the world, is not only a most dangerous companion, but gives a certain proof of the want of rectitude in her own mind.—Discretion is the guardian of all the virtues; and, when she forsakes them, they cannot long resist the attacks of an enemy.—There is a profligacy of spirit in defying the rules of decorum, and despising censure, which seldom ends otherwise than in extreme corruption and utter ruin.—Modesty and prudence are qualities that early display themselves, and are easily discerned: where these do not appear, you should avoid not only friendship, but every step towards intimacy, lest your own character should suffer with that of your companion; but, where they shine forth in any eminent degree, you may safely cultivate an acquaintance, in the reasonable hope of finding the solid fruits of virtue beneath such sweet and promising blossoms: should you be disappointed, you will at least have run no risk in the search after them, and may cherish as a creditable acquaintance the person so adorned, though she may not deserve a place in your inmost heart.

The understanding must next be examined:—and this is a point which requires so much understanding to judge of in another, that I must earnestly recommend to you not to rely entirely on your own, but to take the opinion of your older friends.—I do not wish you to seek for bright and uncommon talents, though these are sources of inexhaustible delight and improvement, when found in company with solid judgment and sound principles.—Good sense (by which I mean a capacity for reasoning justly, and discerning truly) applied to the uses of life, and exercised in distinguishing characters and directing conduct, is alone necessary to an intimate connection; but without this, the best intentions—though certain of reward hereafter—may fail of producing their effects in this life; nor can they singly constitute the character of an useful and valuable friend.—On the other hand, the most dazzling genius, or the most engaging wit and humor, can but ill answer the purposes of friendship, without plain common sense and a faculty of just reasoning.

What can one do with those who will not be answered with reason—and who, when you are endeavoring to convince or persuade them by serious argument, will parry the blow with a witty repartee, or a stroke of poignant raillery?—I know not whether such a reply is less provoking than that of an obstinate fool, who answers your strongest reasons with—“What you say may be very true, but this is my way of thinking.”—

Fancy,<sup>3</sup> I know, will have her share in friendship, as well as in love;—you must please as well as serve me before I can love you as the friend of my heart.—But the faculties that please for an evening may not please for life.—The humorous man soon runs through his stock of odd stories, mimicry, and jest; and the wit, by constantly repeated flashes, confounds and tires one’s intellect, instead of enlivening it with agreeable surprise:—but good sense can neither tire nor wear out;—it improves by exercise—and increases in value, the more it is known:—the pleasure it gives in conversation is lasting and satisfactory, because it is accompanied with improvement;—its worth is proportioned to the occasion that calls for it, and rises highest on the most interesting topics;—the heart, as well as the understanding, finds its account in it;—and our noblest interests are promoted by the entertainment we receive from such a companion.

A good temper is the next qualification * * *. But as this is a quality in which you may be deceived, without a long and intimate acquaintance, you must not be hasty in forming connections before you have had sufficient opportunity for making observations on this head.—A young person, when pleased and enlivened by the presence of her youthful companions, seldom shows ill temper; which must be extreme indeed, if it is not at least controllable in such situations. But, you must watch her behavior to her own family, and the degree of estimation she stands in with them.—Observe her manner to servants and inferiors—to children—and even to animals.

—See in what manner she bears disappointments, contradiction, and restraint; and what degree of vexation she expresses on any accident of loss or trouble. If in such little trials she shows a meek, resigned, and cheerful temper, she will probably preserve it on greater occasions; but if she is impatient and discontented under these, how will she support the far greater evils which may await her in her progress through life? If you should have an opportunity of seeing her in sickness, observe whether her complaints are of a mild and gentle kind—forced from her by pain, and restrained as much as possible—or whether they are expressions of a turbulent, rebellious mind, that hardly submits to the divine hand. See whether she is tractable, considerate, kind, and grateful to those about her; or whether she takes the opportunity, which their compassion gives her, to tyrannize over and torment them. Women are in general very liable to ill health, which must necessarily make them in some measure troublesome and disagreeable to those they live with.—They should therefore take the more pains to lighten the burden as much as possible, by patience and good humor; and be careful not to let their infirmities break in on the health, freedom, or enjoyments of others, more than is needful and just.—Some ladies seem to think it very improper for any person within their reach to enjoy a moment's comfort while they are in pain; and make no scruple of sacrificing to their own least convenience, whenever they are indisposed, the proper rest, meals, or refreshments of their servants, and even sometimes of their husbands and children. But their selfishness defeats its own purpose, as it weakens that affection and tender pity which excites the most assiduous services, and affords the most healing balm to the heart of the sufferer.

1709–1784

Samuel Johnson was famous as a talker in his own time, and his conversation (preserved by James Boswell and others) has been famous ever since. But his wisdom survives above all in his writings: a few superb poems; the grave Rambler essays, which established his reputation as a stylist and a moralist; the lessons about life in Rasselas and the Lives of the Poets; and literary criticism that ranks among the best in English. The virtues of the talk and the writings are the same. They come hot from a mind well stored with knowledge, searingly honest, humane, and quick to seize the unexpected but appropriate image of truth. Johnson's wit is timeless, for it deals with the great facts of human experience, with hope and happiness and loss and duty and the fear of death. Whatever topic he addresses, whatever the form in which he writes, he holds to one commanding purpose: to see life as it is.

Two examples must suffice here. When Anna Williams wondered why a man should make a beast of himself through drunkenness, Johnson answered that "he who makes a beast of himself gets rid of the pain of being a man." In this reply Williams's tired metaphor is so charged with an awareness of the dark aspects of human life that it comes almost unbearably alive. Such moments characterize Johnson's writings as well. For instance, in reviewing the book of a fatuous would-be philosopher who blandly explained away the pains of poverty by declaring that a kindly providence compensates the poor by making them more hopeful, more healthy, more easily pleased, and less sensitive than the rich, Johnson retorted: "The poor indeed are insensible of many little vexations which sometimes embitter the possessions and pollute the enjoyments of the rich. They are not pained by casual incivility, or mortified by the mutilation of a compliment; but this happiness is like that of a malefactor who ceases to feel the cords that bind him when the pincers are tearing his flesh."

Johnson had himself known the pains of poverty. During his boyhood and youth in Lichfield, his father's bookshop and other businesses plunged into debt, so that he was forced to leave Oxford before he had taken a degree. An early marriage to a well-to-do widow, Elizabeth ("Tetty") Porter, more than twenty years older than he, enabled him to open a school. But the school failed, and he moved to London to make his way as a writer. The years between 1737, when he first arrived there with his pupil David Garrick (who later became the leading actor of his generation), and 1755, when the publication of the Dictionary established his reputation, were often difficult. He supported himself at first as best he could by doing hack work for the Gentleman's Magazine, but gradually his own original writings began to attract attention.

In 1747 Johnson published the Plan of his Dictionary, and he spent the next seven years compiling it—although he had expected to finish it in three. When in 1748 Dr. Adams, a friend from Oxford days, questioned his ability to carry out such a work alone so fast and reminded him that the Dictionary of the French Academy had needed forty academicians working for forty years, Johnson replied with humorous jingoism: "Sir, thus it is. This is the proportion. Let me see; forty times forty is sixteen hundred. As three to sixteen hundred, so is the proportion of an Englishman to a Frenchman."

Johnson's achievement in compiling the Dictionary seems even greater when we realize that he was writing some of his best essays and poems during the same period. Although the booksellers who published the Dictionary paid him what was then the large sum of £1575, it was not enough to enable him to support his household, buy materials, and pay the wages of the six assistants whom he employed year by year until the task was accomplished. He therefore had to earn more money by writing. In 1749, his early tragedy Irene (pronounced I-re-ně) was produced at long last by his old friend Garrick, by then the manager of Drury Lane. The play was not a success, although Johnson made some profit from it. In the same year appeared his finest poem, "The Vanity of Human Wishes." With the Rambler (1750–52) and the Idler (1758–60), two series of periodical essays, Johnson found a devoted audience, but his pleasure was tempered by the death of his wife in 1752. He never remarried.

Johnson is thought of as the great generalizer, but what gives his generalizations strength is that they are rooted in the particulars of his self-knowledge. He had constantly to fight against what he called "filling the mind" with illusions to avoid the call of duty, his own black melancholy, and the realities of life. The portrait (largely a self-portrait) of Sober in Idler 31 is revealing: he occupies his idle hours with crafts and hobbies and has now taken up chemistry—he "sits and counts the drops as they come from his retort, and forgets that, whilst a drop is falling, a moment flies away."

His theme of themes is expressed in the title "The Vanity of Human Wishes": the dangerous but all-pervasive power of wishful thinking, the feverish intrusion of desires and hopes that distort reality and lead to false expectations. Almost all of Johnson's major writings—verse satire, moral essay, or the prose fable Rasselas (1759)—express this theme. In Rasselas it is called "the hunger of imagination, which preys upon life," picturing things as one would like them to be, not as they are. The travelers who are the fable's protagonists pursue some formula for happiness; they reflect our naive hope, against the lessons of experience, that one choice of life will make us happy forever.

Johnson also developed a style of his own: balanced, extended sentences, phrases, or clauses moving to carefully controlled rhythms, in language that is characteristically general, often Latinate, and frequently polysyllabic. This style is far from Swift's simplicity or Addison's neatness, but it never becomes obscure or turgid, for even a very complex sentence reveals—as it should—the structure of the thought, and the learned words are always precisely used. While reading early scientists to collect words for the Dictionary, Johnson developed a new vocabulary: for example, obtund, exuberate, fugacity, and frigorific. But he used many of these strange words in conversation as well as in his writings, often with a peculiarly Johnsonian felicity, describing the operations of the mind with a scientific precision.

After Johnson received his pension from the Crown in 1762, he no longer had to write for a living, and because he held that “no man but a blockhead” ever wrote for any other reason, he produced as little as he decently could during the last twenty years of his life. His edition of Shakespeare, long delayed, was published in 1765, with a fine preface and fascinating notes. His last important work is the Lives of the Poets, which came out in two parts in 1779 and 1781. These biographical and critical prefaces were commissioned by a group of booksellers who had joined together to publish a large collection of the English poets and who wished to give their venture the prestige that Johnson would lend it. The poets to be included (except for four insisted on by Johnson) were selected by the booksellers according to current fashions. Therefore the collection begins with Abraham Cowley and John Milton and ends with Thomas Gray, and it omits such standard poets as Chaucer, Spenser, Sidney, Donne, and Marvell.

The ideal poet, according to Johnson, has a genius for making the things we see every day seem new. The same might be said of Johnson himself as a critic. Johnson is the great champion, in criticism, of common sense and the common reader. Without denying the right of the poet to flights of imagination, he also insists that poems must make sense, please readers, and help us not only understand the world but cope with it. Johnson holds poems to the truth, as he sees it: the principles of nature, logic, religion, and morality. Not even Shakespeare can be excused when “he sacrifices virtue to convenience” and “seems to write without any moral purpose." Yet Johnson is no worshiper of authority or mere "correctness." As a critic he is always the empiricist, testing theory by practice. He is determined to judge literature by its truth to life, not by abstract rules, and is never afraid to state the obvious, whether the lack of human interest in Paradise Lost or Shakespeare's temptation by puns. But at its best, as in the praise of Milton or Shakespeare, his criticism engages some of the deepest questions about literature: why it endures, and how it helps us endure.

The Vanity of Human Wishes This poem is an imitation of Juvenal's Satire 10. Although it closely follows the order and the ideas of the Latin poem, it remains a very personal work, for Johnson has used the Roman Stoic's satire as a means of expressing his own sense of the tragic and comic in human life. He has tried to reproduce in English verse the qualities he thought especially Juvenalian: stateliness, pointed sentences, and declamatory grandeur. The poem is difficult because of the extreme compactness of the style: every line is forced to convey the greatest possible amount of meaning. Johnson believed that "great thoughts are always general," but he certainly did not intend that the general should fade into the abstract: observe, for example, how he makes personified nouns concrete, active, and dramatic by using them as subjects of active and dramatic verbs: "Hate dogs their flight, and Insult mocks their end" (line 78). But the difficulty of the poem is also related to its theme, the difficulty of seeing anything clearly on this earth. In a world of blindness and illusion, human beings must struggle to find a point of view that will not deceive them, and a happiness that can last.

The Vanity of Human Wishes

In Imitation of the Tenth Satire of Juvenal

Let Observation, with extensive view,
Survey mankind, from China to Peru;
Remark each anxious toil, each eager strife,
And watch the busy scenes of crowded life;
5 Then say how hope and fear, desire and hate
O’erspread with snares the clouded maze of fate,
Where wavering man, betrayed by venturous Pride
To tread the dreary paths without a guide,
As treacherous phantoms in the mist delude,
Shuns fancied ills, or chases airy good.
10 How rarely Reason guides the stubborn choice,
Rules the bold hand, or prompts the suppliant voice;
How nations sink, by darling schemes oppressed,
When Vengeance listens to the fool’s request.
Fate wings with every wish the afflictive dart,
15 Each gift of nature, and each grace of art;
With fatal heat impetuous courage glows,
With fatal sweetness elocution flows,
Impeachment stops the speaker’s powerful breath,
And restless fire precipitates on death.
20 But scarce observed, the knowing and the bold
Fall in the general massacre of gold;
Wide-wasting pest! that rages unconfined,
And crowds with crimes the records of mankind;
For gold his sword the hireling ruffian draws,
25 For gold the hireling judge distorts the laws;
Wealth heaped on wealth, nor truth nor safety buys,
The dangers gather as the treasures rise.
Let History tell where rival kings command,

30 And dubious title<sup>o</sup> shakes the madded land,
When statutes glean the refuse of the sword,
How much more safe the vassal than the lord;
Low skulks the hind<sup>o</sup> beneath the rage of power,
And leaves the wealthy traitor in the Tower,<sup>1</sup>
Untouched his cottage, and his slumbers sound,
35 Though Confiscation's vultures hover round.
The needy traveler, serene and gay,
Walks the wild heath, and sings his toil away.
Does envy seize thee? crush the upbraiding joy,
Increase his riches and his peace destroy;
40 New fears in dire vicissitude invade,
The rustling brake<sup>o</sup> alarms, and quivering shade,
Nor light nor darkness bring his pain relief,
One shows the plunder, and one hides the thief.
Yet still one general cry the skies assails,
45 And gain and grandeur load the tainted gales;
Few know the toiling statesman's fear or care,
The insidious rival and the gaping heir.
Once more, Democritus,<sup>2</sup> arise on earth,
With cheerful wisdom and instructive mirth,
50 See motley life in modern trappings dressed,
And feed with varied fools the eternal jest:
Thou who couldst laugh where Want enchained
Caprice,
Toil crushed Conceit, and man was of a piece;
Where Wealth unloved without a mourner died;
55 And scarce a sycophant was fed by Pride;
Where ne'er was known the form of mock debate,
Or seen a new-made mayor's unwieldy state;<sup>3</sup>
Where change of favorites made no change of laws,
And senates heard before they judged a cause;
60 How wouldst thou shake at Britain's modish tribe,
Dart the quick taunt, and edge the piercing gibe?
Attentive truth and nature to descry,

And pierce each scene with philosophic eye.
To thee were solemn toys or empty show
65 The robes of pleasure and the veils of woe:
All aid the farce, and all thy mirth maintain,
Whose joys are causeless, or whose griefs are vain.
Such was the scorn that filled the sage's mind,
Renewed at every glance on human kind;
70 How just that scorn ere yet thy voice declare,
Search every state, and canvass every prayer.
Unnumbered suppliants crowd Preferment's gate,
Athirst for wealth, and burning to be great;
Delusive Fortune hears the incessant call,
75 They mount, they shine, evaporate,<sup>4</sup> and fall.
On every stage the foes of peace attend,
Hate dogs their flight, and Insult mocks their end.
Love ends with hope, the sinking statesman's door
Pours in the morning worshiper no more;<sup>5</sup>
80 For growing names the weekly scribbler lies,
To growing wealth the dedicator flies;
From every room descends the painted face,
That hung the bright palladium<sup>6</sup> of the place;
And smoked in kitchens, or in auctions sold,
85 To better features yields the frame of gold;
For now no more we trace in every line
Heroic worth, benevolence divine:
The form distorted justifies the fall,
And Detestation rids the indignant wall.
90 But will not Britain hear the last appeal,
Sign her foes' doom, or guard her favorites' zeal?
Through Freedom's sons no more remonstrance rings,
Degrading nobles and controlling kings;
Our supple tribes repress their patriot throats,
95 And ask no questions but the price of votes;
With weekly libels and septennial ale,<sup>7</sup>

Their wish is full to riot and to rail.

100 In full-blown dignity, see Wolsey<sup>8</sup> stand,
Law in his voice, and fortune in his hand:
To him the church, the realm, their powers consign,
Through him the rays of regal bounty shine;
Turned by his nod the stream of honor flows,
His smile alone security bestows:
105 Still to new heights his restless wishes tower,
Claim leads to claim, and power advances power;
Till conquest unresisted ceased to please,
And rights submitted, left him none to seize.
At length his sovereign frowns—the train of state
Mark the keen glance, and watch the sign to hate.
110 Where'er he turns, he meets a stranger's eye,
His suppliants scorn him, and his followers fly;
At once is lost the pride of awful state,
The golden canopy, the glittering plate,
The regal palace, the luxurious board,
115 The liveried army, and the menial lord.
With age, with cares, with maladies oppressed,
He seeks the refuge of monastic rest.
Grief aids disease, remembered folly stings,
And his last sighs reproach the faith of kings.
120 Speak thou, whose thoughts at humble peace
repine,
Shall Wolsey's wealth, with Wolsey's end be thine?
Or liv'st thou now, with safer pride content,
The wisest justice on the banks of Trent?
For why did Wolsey, near the steep of fate,
125 On weak foundations raise the enormous weight?
Why but to sink beneath misfortune's blow,
With louder ruin to the gulfs below?
What gave great Villiers<sup>9</sup> to the assassin's knife,
And fixed disease on Harley's<sup>1</sup> closing life?
130 What murdered Wentworth, and what exiled Hyde,<sup>2</sup>

By kings protected, and to kings allied?
What but their wish indulged in courts to shine,
And power too great to keep or to resign?
When first the college rolls receive his name,
135 The young enthusiast quits his ease for fame;
Through all his veins the fever of renown
Burns from the strong contagion of the gown:<sup>3</sup>
O'er Bodley's dome<sup>4</sup> his future labors spread,
And Bacon's<sup>5</sup> mansion trembles o'er his head.
140 Are these thy views? proceed, illustrious youth,
And Virtue guard thee to the throne of Truth!
Yet should thy soul indulge the generous heat,
Till captive Science<sup>o</sup> yields her last retreat;
Should Reason guide thee with her brightest ray,
145 And pour on misty Doubt resistless day;
Should no false kindness lure to loose delight,
Nor praise relax, nor difficulty fright;
Should tempting Novelty thy cell refrain,
And Sloth effuse her opiate fumes in vain;
150 Should Beauty blunt on fops her fatal dart,
Nor claim the triumph of a lettered heart;
Should no disease thy torpid veins invade,
Nor Melancholy's phantoms haunt thy shade;
Yet hope not life from grief or danger free,
155 Nor think the doom of man reversed for thee:
Deign on the passing world to turn thine eyes,
And pause a while from letters, to be wise;
There mark what ills the scholar's life assail,
Toil, envy, want, the patron,<sup>6</sup> and the jail.
160 See nations slowly wise, and meanly just,
To buried merit raise the tardy bust.
If dreams yet flatter, once again attend,
Hear Lydiat's life, and Galileo's<sup>7</sup> end.
Nor deem, when Learning her last prize bestows,
165 The glittering eminence exempt from foes;

See when the vulgar 'scapes, despised or awed,
Rebellion's vengeful talons seize on Laud.<sup>8</sup>
From meaner minds, though smaller fines content,
The plundered palace or sequestered rent;<sup>9</sup>
170 Marked out by dangerous parts<sup>o</sup> he meets the shock,
And fatal Learning leads him to the block:
Around his tomb let Art and Genius weep,
But hear his death, ye blockheads, hear and sleep.
The festal blazes, the triumphal show,
175 The ravished standard, and the captive foe,
The senate's thanks, the gazette's pompous tale,
With force resistless o'er the brave prevail.
Such bribes the rapid Greek<sup>o</sup> o'er Asia whirled,
For such the steady Romans shook the world;
180 For such in distant lands the Britons shine,
And stain with blood the Danube or the Rhine;
This power has praise that virtue scarce can warm,
Till fame supplies the universal charm.
Yet Reason frowns on War's unequal game,
185 Where wasted nations raise a single name,
And mortgaged states their grandsires' wreaths regret
From age to age in everlasting debt;
Wreaths which at last the dear-bought right convey
To rust on medals, or on stones decay.
190 On what foundation stands the warrior's pride?
How just his hopes, let Swedish Charles<sup>1</sup> decide;
A frame of adamant, a soul of fire,
No dangers fright him, and no labors tire;
O'er love, o'er fear, extends his wide domain,
195 Unconquered lord of pleasure and of pain;
No joys to him pacific scepters yield,
War sounds the trump, he rushes to the field;
Behold surrounding kings their powers combine,
And one capitulate, and one resign;<sup>2</sup> 200

Peace courts his hand, but spreads her charms in vain;
"Think nothing gained," he cries, "till naught remain,
On Moscow's walls till Gothic standards fly,
And all be mine beneath the polar sky."
The march begins in military state,
205 And nations on his eye suspended wait;
Stern Famine guards the solitary coast,
And Winter barricades the realms of Frost;
He comes, nor want nor cold his course delay—
Hide, blushing Glory, hide Pultowa's day:
210 The vanquished hero leaves his broken bands,
And shows his miseries in distant lands;
Condemned a needy suppliant to wait,
While ladies interpose, and slaves debate.
But did not Chance at length her error mend?
215 Did no subverted empire mark his end?
Did rival monarchs give the fatal wound?
Or hostile millions press him to the ground?
His fall was destined to a barren strand,
A petty fortress, and a dubious hand;<sup>3</sup>
220 He left the name at which the world grew pale,
To point a moral, or adorn a tale.
All times their scenes of pompous woes afford,
From Persia's tyrant to Bavaria's lord.<sup>4</sup>
In gay hostility, and barbarous pride,
225 With half mankind embattled at his side,
Great Xerxes comes to seize the certain prey,
And starves exhausted regions in his way;
Attendant Flattery counts his myriads o'er,
Till counted myriads soothe his pride no more;
230 Fresh praise is tried till madness fires his mind,
The waves he lashes, and enchains the wind;<sup>5</sup>
New powers are claimed, new powers are still bestowed,

Till rude resistance lops the spreading god;
The daring Greeks deride the martial show,
235 And heap their valleys with the gaudy foe;
The insulted sea with humbler thoughts he gains,
A single skiff to speed his flight remains;
The encumbered oar scarce leaves the dreaded coast
Through purple billows and a floating host.
240 The bold Bavarian, in a luckless hour,
Tries the dread summits of Caesarean power,
With unexpected legions bursts away,
And sees defenseless realms receive his sway;
Short sway! fair Austria spreads her mournful
245 charms,
The queen, the beauty, sets the world in arms;
From hill to hill the beacon's rousing blaze
Spreads wide the hope of plunder and of praise;
The fierce Croatian, and the wild Hussar,<sup>6</sup>
With all the sons of ravage crowd the war;
250 The baffled prince in honor's flattering bloom
Of hasty greatness finds the fatal doom,
His foes' derision, and his subjects' blame,
And steals to death from anguish and from shame.
Enlarge my life with multitude of days!
255 In health, in sickness, thus the suppliant prays;
Hides from himself his state, and shuns to know,
That life protracted is protracted woe.
Time hovers o'er, impatient to destroy,
And shuts up all the passages of joy;
260 In vain their gifts the bounteous seasons pour,
The fruit autumnal, and the vernal flower;
With listless eyes the dotard views the store,
He views, and wonders that they please no more;
Now pall the tasteless meats, and joyless wines,
265 And Luxury with sighs her slave resigns.

Approach, ye minstrels, try the soothing strain,
Diffuse the tuneful lenitives of pain:○
No sounds, alas! would touch the impervious ear,
Though dancing mountains witnessed Orpheus<sup>z</sup> 270       near;
Nor lute nor lyre his feeble powers attend,
Nor sweeter music of a virtuous friend,
But everlasting dictates crowd his tongue,
Perversely grave, or positively wrong.
The still returning tale, and lingering jest,
275       Perplex the fawning niece and pampered guest,
While growing hopes scarce awe the gathering
      sneer,
And scarce a legacy can bribe to hear;
The watchful guests still hint the last offense,
The daughter's petulance, the son's expense,
280       Improve○ his heady rage with treacherous skill,
And mold his passions till they make his will.
      Unnumbered maladies his joints invade,
Lay siege to life and press the dire blockade;
But unextinguished avarice still remains,
285       And dreaded losses aggravate his pains;
He turns, with anxious heart and crippled hands,
His bonds of debt, and mortgages of lands;
Or views his coffers with suspicious eyes,
Unlocks his gold, and counts it till he dies.
290       But grant, the virtues of a temperate prime Bless with an age exempt from scorn or crime;
An age that melts with unperceived decay,
And glides in modest innocence away;
Whose peaceful day Benevolence endears,
295       Whose night congratulating Conscience cheers;
The general favorite as the general friend:
Such age there is, and who shall wish its end?
      Yet even on this her load Misfortune flings,

300 To press the weary minutes' flagging wings;
New sorrow rises as the day returns,
A sister sickens, or a daughter mourns.
Now kindred Merit fills the sable bier,
Now lacerated Friendship claims a tear;
305 Year chases year, decay pursues decay,
Still drops some joy from withering life away;
New forms arise, and different views engage,
Superfluous lags the veteran<sup>8</sup> on the stage,
Till pitying Nature signs the last release,
And bids afflicted Worth retire to peace.
310 But few there are whom hours like these await,
Who set unclouded in the gulfs of Fate.
From Lydia's monarch<sup>9</sup> should the search descend,
By Solon cautioned to regard his end,
In life's last scene what prodigies surprise,
315 Fears of the brave, and follies of the wise!
From Marlborough's<sup>1</sup> eyes the streams of dotage flow,
And Swift<sup>2</sup> expires a driveler and a show.
The teeming mother, anxious for her race,<sup>o</sup>
Begs for each birth the fortune of a face:
320 Yet Vane<sup>3</sup> could tell what ills from beauty spring;
And Sedley<sup>4</sup> cursed the form that pleased a king.
Ye nymphs of rosy lips and radiant eyes,
Whom Pleasure keeps too busy to be wise,
Whom Joys with soft varieties invite,
325 By day the frolic, and the dance by night;
Who frown with vanity, who smile with art,
And ask the latest fashion of the heart;
What care, what rules your heedless charms shall save,
Each nymph your rival, and each youth your slave?
330 Against your fame with Fondness Hate combines,
The rival batters, and the lover mines.<sup>5</sup>

With distant voice neglected Virtue calls,
Less heard and less, the faint remonstrance falls;
Tired with contempt, she quits the slippery reign,
335 And Pride and Prudence take her seat in vain.
In crowd at once, where none the pass defend,
The harmless freedom, and the private friend.
The guardians yield, by force superior plied:
To Interest, Prudence; and to Flattery, Pride.
340 Now Beauty falls betrayed, despised, distressed,
And hissing Infamy proclaims the rest.
Where then shall Hope and Fear their objects find?
Must dull Suspense<sup>o</sup> corrupt the stagnant mind?
Must helpless man, in ignorance sedate,
345 Roll darkling down the torrent of his fate?
Must no dislike alarm, no wishes rise,
No cries invoke the mercies of the skies?
Inquirer, cease; petitions yet remain,
Which Heaven may hear, nor deem religion vain.
350 Still raise for good the supplicating voice,
But leave to Heaven the measure and the choice.
Safe in his power, whose eyes discern afar
The secret ambush of a specious prayer.
Implore his aid, in his decisions rest,
355 Secure, whate'er he gives, he gives the best.
Yet when the sense of sacred presence fires,
And strong devotion to the skies aspires,
Pour forth thy fervors for a healthful mind,
Obedient passions, and a will resigned;
360 For love, which scarce collective man can fill;<sup>6</sup>
For patience sovereign o'er transmuted ill;
For faith, that panting for a happier seat,
Counts death kind Nature's signal of retreat:
365 These goods for man the laws of Heaven ordain,

These goods he grants, who grants the power to gain;
With these celestial Wisdom calms the mind,
And makes the happiness she does not find.

—*Quid sit pulchrum, quid turpe, quid utile, quid non,
Plenius ac melius Chrysippo et Crantore dicit.*

—HORACE, Epistles, 1.2.3–4

Whose works the beautiful and base contain,
Of vice and virtue more instructive rules,
Than all the sober sages of the schools.

—FRANCIS

All joy or sorrow for the happiness or calamities of others is produced by an act of the imagination, that realizes the event, however fictitious, or approximates it,<sup>1</sup> however remote, by placing us, for a time, in the condition of him whose fortune we contemplate; so that we feel, while the deception lasts, whatever motions would be excited by the same good or evil happening to ourselves.

Our passions are therefore more strongly moved, in proportion as we can more readily adopt the pains or pleasure proposed to our minds, by recognizing them as once our own, or considering them as naturally incident to our state of life. It is not easy for the most artful writer to give us an interest in happiness or misery, which we think ourselves never likely to feel, and with which we have never yet been made acquainted. Histories of the downfall of kingdoms, and revolutions of empires, are read with great tranquility; the imperial tragedy pleases common auditors only by its pomp of ornament, and grandeur of ideas; and the man whose faculties have been engrossed by business, and whose heart never fluttered but at the rise or fall of stocks, wonders how the attention can be seized, or the affections agitated, by a tale of love.

Those parallel circumstances, and kindred images to which we readily conform our minds, are, above all other writings, to be found in narratives of the lives of particular persons; and therefore no species of writing seems more worthy of cultivation than biography, since none can be more delightful or more useful, none can more certainly enchain the heart by irresistible interest, or more widely diffuse instruction to every diversity of condition.

The general and rapid narratives of history, which involve a thousand fortunes in the business of a day, and complicate<sup>2</sup> innumerable incidents in one great transaction, afford few lessons applicable to private life, which derives its comforts and its wretchedness from the right or wrong management of things, which nothing but their frequency makes considerable, Parva si non fiunt quotidie, says Pliny,<sup>3</sup> and which can have no place in those relations which never descend below the consultation of senates, the motions of armies, and the schemes of conspirators.

I have often thought that there has rarely passed a life of which a judicious and faithful narrative would not be useful. For, not only every man has in the mighty mass of the world great numbers in the same condition with himself, to whom his mistakes and miscarriages, escapes and expedients, would be of immediate and apparent use; but there is such an uniformity in the state of man, considered apart from adventitious and separable decorations and disguises, that there is scarce any possibility of good or ill, but is common to humankind. A great part of the time of those who are placed at the greatest distance by fortune, or by temper, must unavoidably pass in the same manner; and though, when the claims of nature are satisfied, caprice, and vanity, and accident, begin to produce discriminations and peculiarities, yet the eye is not very heedful or quick, which cannot discover the same causes still<sup>4</sup> terminating their influence in the same effects, though sometimes accelerated, sometimes retarded, or perplexed by multiplied combinations. We are all prompted by the same motives, all deceived by the same fallacies, all animated by hope, obstructed by danger, entangled by desire, and seduced by pleasure.

It is frequently objected to relations of particular lives, that they are not distinguished by any striking or wonderful vicissitudes. The scholar who passed his life among his books, the merchant who conducted only his own affairs, the priest whose sphere of action was not extended beyond that of his duty, are considered as no proper objects of public regard, however they might have excelled in their several stations, whatever might have been their learning, integrity, and piety. But this notion arises from false measures of excellence and dignity, and must be eradicated by considering, that in the esteem of uncorrupted reason, what is of most use is of most value.

It is, indeed, not improper to take honest advantages of prejudice, and to gain attention by a celebrated name; but the business of the biographer is often to pass slightly over those performances and incidents, which produce vulgar greatness, to lead the thoughts into domestic privacies, and display the minute details of daily life, where exterior appendages are cast aside, and men excel each other only by prudence and by virtue. The account of Thuanus<sup>5</sup> is, with great propriety, said by its author to have been written, that it might lay open to posterity the private and familiar character of that man, cujus ingenium et candorem ex ipsius scriptis sunt olim semper miraturi, whose candor and genius will to the end of time be by his writings preserved in admiration.

There are many invisible circumstances which, whether we read as inquirers after natural or moral knowledge, whether we intend to enlarge our science, or increase our virtue, are more important than public occurrences. Thus Sallust, the great master of nature, has not forgot, in his account of Catiline,<sup>6</sup> to remark that his walk was now quick, and again slow, as an indication of a mind revolving something with violent commotion. Thus the story of Melancthon<sup>7</sup> affords a striking lecture on the value of time, by informing us that when he made an appointment, he expected not only the hour, but the minute to be fixed, that the day might not run out in the idleness of suspense; and all the plans and enterprises of De Witt are now of less importance to the world, than that part of his personal character, which represents him as careful of his health, and negligent of his life.<sup>8</sup>

But biography has often been allotted to writers who seem very little acquainted with the nature of their task, or very negligent about the performance. They rarely afford any other account than might be collected from public papers, but imagine themselves writing a life when they exhibit a chronological series of actions or preferments; and so little regard the manners or behavior of their heroes, that more knowledge may be gained of a man's real character, by a short conversation with one of his servants, than from a formal and studied narrative, begun with his pedigree, and ended with his funeral.

If now and then they condescend to inform the world of particular facts, they are not always so happy as to select the most important. I know not well what advantage posterity can receive from the only circumstance by which Tickell has distinguished Addison from the rest of mankind, the irregularity of his pulse:<sup>9</sup> nor can I think myself overpaid for the time spent in reading the life of Malherbe, by being enabled to relate, after the learned biographer,<sup>1</sup> that Malherbe had two predominant opinions; one, that the looseness of a single woman might destroy all her boast of ancient descent; the other, that the French beggars made use very improperly and barbarously of the phrase noble gentleman, because either word included the sense of both.

There are, indeed, some natural reasons why these narratives are often written by such as were not likely to give much instruction or delight, and why most accounts of particular persons are barren and useless. If a life be delayed till interest and envy are at an end, we may hope for impartiality, but must expect little intelligence;<sup>2</sup> for the incidents which give excellence to biography are of a volatile and evanescent kind, such as soon escape the memory, and are rarely transmitted by tradition. We know how few can portray a living acquaintance, except by his most prominent and observable particularities, and the grosser features of his mind; and it may be easily imagined how much of this little knowledge may be lost in imparting it, and how soon a succession of copies will lose all resemblance of the original.

If the biographer writes from personal knowledge, and makes haste to gratify the public curiosity, there is danger lest his interest, his fear, his gratitude, or his tenderness, overpower his fidelity, and tempt him to conceal, if not to invent. There are many who think it an act of piety to hide the faults or failings of their friends, even when they can no longer suffer by their detection; we therefore see whole ranks of characters adorned with uniform panegyric, and not to be known from one another, but by extrinsic and casual circumstances. "Let me remember," says Hale, "when I find myself inclined to pity a criminal, that there is likewise a pity due to the country." <sup>3</sup> If we owe regard to the memory of the dead, there is yet more respect to be paid to knowledge, to virtue, and to truth.

Rasselas Johnson wrote Rasselas in January 1759 during the evenings of one week, a remarkable instance of his ability to write rapidly and brilliantly under the pressure of necessity. His mother lay dying in Lichfield. Her son, famous for his Dictionary, was nonetheless in great need of money with which to make her last days comfortable, pay her funeral expenses, and settle her small debts. He was paid £100 for the first edition of Rasselas, but not in time to attend her deathbed or her funeral.

Rasselas is a philosophical fable cast in the popular form of an Oriental tale, a type of fiction that owed its popularity to the vogue of the Arabian Nights, first translated into English in the early eighteenth century (see p. 297). Because the work is a fable, we should not approach it as a novel: psychologically credible characters and a series of intricately involved actions that lead to a necessary resolution and conclusion are not to be found in Rasselas. Instead we are meant to reflect on the ideas and to savor the melancholy resonance and intelligence of the stately prose that expresses them. Johnson arranges the incidents of the fable to test a variety of possible solutions to a problem: What choice of life will bring us happiness? (The Choice of Life was his working title for the book.) Many ways of life are examined in turn, and each is found wanting. Johnson does not pretend to have solved the problem. Rather, he locates the sources of discontent in a basic principle of human nature: the “hunger of imagination which preys incessantly upon life” (Chapter 32) and which lures us to “listen with credulity to the whispers of fancy and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of hope” (Chapter 1). The tale is a gentle satire on one of the perennial topics of satirists: the folly of all of us who stubbornly cling to our illusions despite the evidence of experience. Rasselas is not all darkness and gloom, for Johnson’s theme invites comic as well as tragic treatment, and some of the episodes evoke that laughter of the mind that is the effect of high comedy. In its main theme, however—the folly of cherishing the dream of ever attaining unalloyed happiness in a world that can never wholly satisfy our desires—and in many of the sayings of its characters, especially of the sage Imlac, Rasselas expresses some of Johnson's own deepest convictions.

The History of Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia

Chapter 1. Description of a Palace in a Valley

Ye who listen with credulity to the whispers of fancy, and pursue with eagerness the phantoms of hope; who expect that age will perform the promises of youth, and that the deficiencies of the present day will be supplied by the morrow—attend to the history of Rasselas, prince of Abyssinia.

Rasselas was the fourth son of the mighty emperor in whose dominions the Father of Waters<sup>1</sup> begins his course; whose bounty pours down the streams of plenty, and scatters over half the world the harvests of Egypt.

According to the custom which has descended from age to age among the monarchs of the torrid zone, Rasselas was confined in a private palace, with the other sons and daughters of Abyssinian royalty, till the order of succession should call him to the throne.

The place which the wisdom or policy of antiquity had destined for the residence of the Abyssinian princes was a spacious valley<sup>2</sup> in the kingdom of Amhara, surrounded on every side by mountains, of which the summits overhang the middle part. The only passage by which it could be entered was a cavern that passed under a rock, of which it has long been disputed whether it was the work of nature or of human industry. The outlet of the cavern was concealed by a thick wood, and the mouth which opened into the valley was closed with gates of iron, forged by the artificers of ancient days, so massy that no man could, without the help of engines, open or shut them.

From the mountains on every side rivulets descended that filled all the valley with verdure and fertility, and formed a lake in the middle, inhabited by fish of every species, and frequented by every fowl whom nature has taught to dip the wing in water. This lake discharged its superfluities by a stream, which entered a dark cleft of the mountain on the northern side, and fell with dreadful noise from precipice to precipice till it was heard no more.

The sides of the mountains were covered with trees, the banks of the brooks were diversified with flowers; every blast<sup>3</sup> shook spices from the rocks, and every month dropped fruits upon the ground. All animals that bite the grass, or browse the shrub, whether wild or tame, wandered in this extensive circuit, secured from beasts of prey by the mountains which confined them. On one part were flocks and herds feeding in the pastures, on another all the beasts of chase frisking in the lawns; the sprightly kid was bounding on the rocks, the subtle monkey frolicking in the trees, and the solemn elephant reposing in the shade. All the diversities of the world were brought together, the blessings of nature were collected, and its evils extracted and excluded.

The valley, wide and fruitful, supplied its inhabitants with the necessities of life, and all delights and superfluities were added at the annual visit which the emperor paid his children, when the iron gate was opened to the sound of music, and during eight days everyone that resided in the valley was required to propose whatever might contribute to make seclusion pleasant, to fill up the vacancies of attention, and lessen the tediousness of time. Every desire was immediately granted. All the artificers of pleasure were called to gladden the festivity; the musicians exerted the power of harmony, and the dancers showed their activity before the princes, in hope that they should pass their lives in this blissful captivity, to which those only were admitted whose performance was thought able to add novelty to luxury. Such was the appearance of security and delight which this retirement afforded, that they to whom it was new always desired that it might be perpetual; and as those on whom the iron gate had once closed were never suffered to return, the effect of longer experience could not be known. Thus every year produced new schemes of delight and new competitors for imprisonment.

The palace stood on an eminence, raised about thirty paces<sup>4</sup> above the surface of the lake. It was divided into many squares or courts, built with greater or less magnificence according to the rank of those for whom they were designed. The roofs were turned into arches of massy stone, joined with a cement that grew harder by time, and the building stood from century to century, deriding the solstitial rains and equinoctial hurricanes, without need of reparation.

This house, which was so large as to be fully known to none but some ancient officers, who successively inherited the secrets of the place, was built as if suspicion herself had dictated the plan. To every room there was an open and secret passage; every square had a communication with the rest, either from the upper stories by private galleries, or by subterranean passages from the lower apartments. Many of the columns had unsuspected cavities, in which a long race of monarchs had repositied their treasures. They then closed up the opening with marble, which was never to be removed but in the utmost exigencies of the kingdom, and recorded their accumulations in a book, which was itself concealed in a tower, not entered but by the emperor, attended by the prince who stood next in succession.

Chapter 2. *The Discontent of Rasselas in the Happy Valley

Here the sons and daughters of Abyssinia lived only to know the soft vicissitudes of pleasure and repose, attended by all that were skillful to delight, and gratified with whatever the senses can enjoy. They wandered in gardens of fragrance, and slept in the fortresses of security. Every art was practiced to make them pleased with their own condition. The sages who instructed them told them of nothing but the miseries of public life, and described all beyond the mountains as regions of calamity, where discord was always raging, and where man preyed upon man.

To heighten their opinion of their own felicity, they were daily entertained with songs, the subject of which was the happy valley. Their appetites were excited by frequent enumerations of different enjoyments, and revelry and merriment was the business of every hour, from the dawn of morning to the close of even.

These methods were generally successful; few of the princes had ever wished to enlarge their bounds, but passed their lives in full conviction that they had all within their reach that art or nature could bestow, and pitied those whom fate had excluded from this seat of tranquility, as the sport of chance and the slaves of misery.

Thus they rose in the morning and lay down at night, pleased with each other and with themselves; all but Rasselas, who, in the twenty-sixth year of his age, began to withdraw himself from their pastimes and assemblies, and to delight in solitary walks and silent meditation. He often sat before tables covered with luxury, and forgot to taste the dainties that were placed before him; he rose abruptly in the midst of the song, and hastily retired beyond the sound of music. His attendants observed the change, and endeavored to renew his love of pleasure. He neglected their officiousness, repulsed their invitations, and spent day after day on the banks of rivulets sheltered with trees, where he sometimes listened to the birds in the branches, sometimes observed the fish playing in the stream, and anon cast his eyes upon the pastures and mountains filled with animals, of which some were biting the herbage, and some sleeping among the bushes.

This singularity of his humor made him much observed. One of the sages, in whose conversation he had formerly delighted, followed him secretly, in hope of discovering the cause of his disquiet. Rasselas, who knew not that anyone was near him, having for some time fixed his eyes upon the goats that were browsing among the rocks, began to compare their condition with his own.

"What," said he, "makes the difference between man and all the rest of the animal creation? Every beast that strays beside me has the same corporal necessities with myself; he is hungry, and crops the grass, he is thirsty, and drinks the stream, his thirst and hunger are appeased, he is satisfied, and sleeps; he rises again, and he is hungry, he is again fed, and is at rest. I am hungry and thirsty like him, but when thirst and hunger cease, I am not at rest; I am, like him, pained with want, but am not, like him, satisfied with fullness. The intermediate hours are tedious and gloomy; I long again to be hungry that I may again quicken my attention. The birds peck the berries or the corn, and fly away to the groves, where they sit in seeming happiness on the branches, and waste their lives in tuning one unvaried series of sounds. I likewise can call the lutanist and the singer, but the sounds that pleased me yesterday weary me today, and will grow yet more wearisome tomorrow. I can discover within me no power of perception which is not glutted with its proper pleasure, yet I do not feel myself delighted. Man has surely some latent sense for which this place affords no gratification, or he has some desires distinct from sense, which must be satisfied before he can be happy."

After this he lifted up his head, and seeing the moon rising, walked towards the palace. As he passed through the fields, and saw the animals around him, "Ye," said he, "are happy, and need not envy me that walk thus among you, burthened with myself; nor do I, ye gentle beings, envy your felicity, for it is not the felicity of man. I have many distresses from which ye are free; I fear pain when I do not feel it; I sometimes shrink at evils recollected, and sometimes start at evils anticipated. Surely the equity of Providence has balanced peculiar sufferings with peculiar enjoyments.”

With observations like these the prince amused himself as he returned, uttering them with a plaintive voice, yet with a look that discovered<sup>5</sup> him to feel some complacency in his own perspicacity, and to receive some solace of the miseries of life from consciousness of the delicacy with which he felt, and the eloquence with which he bewailed them. He mingled cheerfully in the diversions of the evening, and all rejoiced to find that his heart was lightened.

Chapter 3. The Wants of Him That Wants Nothing

On the next day his old instructor, imagining that he had now made himself acquainted with his disease of mind, was in the hope of curing it by counsel, and officiously sought an opportunity of conference, which the prince, having long considered him as one whose intellects were exhausted, was not very willing to afford. "Why," said he, "does this man thus intrude upon me; shall I be never suffered to forget those lectures which pleased only while they were new, and to become new again must be forgotten?" He then walked into the wood, and composed himself to his usual meditations; when, before his thoughts had taken any settled form, he perceived his pursuer at his side, and was at first prompted by his impatience to go hastily away; but, being unwilling to offend a man whom he had once revered and still loved, he invited him to sit down with him on the bank.

The old man, thus encouraged, began to lament the change which had been lately observed in the prince, and to inquire why he so often retired from the pleasures of the palace, to loneliness and silence. "I fly from pleasure," said the prince, "because pleasure has ceased to please; I am lonely because I am miserable, and am unwilling to cloud with my presence the happiness of others." "You, sir," said the sage, "are the first who has complained of misery in the happy valley. I hope to convince you that your complaints have no real cause. You are here in full possession of all that the emperor of Abyssinia can bestow; here is neither labor to be endured nor danger to be dreaded, yet here is all that labor or danger can procure or purchase. Look round and tell me which of your wants is without supply; if you want nothing, how are you unhappy?"

"That I want nothing," said the prince, "or that I know not what I want, is the cause of my complaint; if I had any known want, I should have a certain wish; that wish would excite endeavor, and I should not then repine to see the sun move so slowly towards the western mountain, or lament when the day breaks, and sleep will no longer hide me from myself. When I see the kids and the lambs chasing one another, I fancy that I should be happy if I had something to pursue. But, possessing all that I can want, I find one day and one hour exactly like another, except that the latter is still more tedious than the former. Let your experience inform me how the day may now seem as short as in my childhood, while nature was yet fresh and every moment showed me what I never had observed before. I have already enjoyed too much; give me something to desire."

The old man was surprised at this new species of affliction and knew not what to reply, yet was unwilling to be silent. "Sir," said he, "if you had seen the miseries of the world you would know how to value your present state." "Now," said the prince, "you have given me something to desire. I shall long to see the miseries of the world, since the sight of them is necessary to happiness."

Chapter 4. The Prince Continues to Grieve and Muse

At this time the sound of music proclaimed the hour of repast, and the conversation was concluded. The old man went away sufficiently discontented to find that his reasonings had produced the only conclusion which they were intended to prevent. But in the decline of life shame and grief are of short duration; whether it be that we bear easily what we have born long, or that, finding ourselves in age less regarded, we less regard others; or, that we look with slight regard upon afflictions, to which we know that the hand of death is about to put an end.

The prince, whose views were extended to a wider space, could not speedily quiet his emotions. He had been before terrified at the length of life which nature promised him, because he considered that in a long time much must be endured; he now rejoiced in his youth, because in many years much might be done.

This first beam of hope, that had been ever darted into his mind, rekindled youth in his cheeks, and doubled the luster of his eyes. He was fired with the desire of doing something, though he knew not yet with distinctness, either end or means.

He was now no longer gloomy and unsocial; but, considering himself as master of a secret stock of happiness, which he could enjoy only by concealing it, he affected to be busy in all schemes of diversion, and endeavored to make others pleased with the state of which he himself was weary. But pleasures never can be so multiplied or continued, as not to leave much of life unemployed; there were many hours, both of the night and day, which he could spend without suspicion in solitary thought. The load of life was much lightened: he went eagerly into the assemblies, because he supposed the frequency of his presence necessary to the success of his purposes; he retired gladly to privacy, because he had now a subject of thought.

His chief amusement was to picture to himself that world which he had never seen; to place himself in various conditions; to be entangled in imaginary difficulties, and to be engaged in wild adventures: but his benevolence always terminated his projects in the relief of distress, the detection of fraud, the defeat of oppression, and the diffusion of happiness.

Thus passed twenty months of the life of Rasselas. He busied himself so intensely in visionary bustle, that he forgot his real solitude; and, amidst hourly preparations for the various incidents of human affairs, neglected to consider by what means he should mingle with mankind.

One day, as he was sitting on a bank, he feigned to himself an orphan virgin robbed of her little portion<sup>6</sup> by a treacherous lover, and crying after him for restitution and redress. So strongly was the image impressed upon his mind, that he started up in the maid's defense, and ran forward to seize the plunderer, with all the eagerness of real pursuit. Fear naturally quickens the flight of guilt. Rasselas could not catch the fugitive with his utmost efforts; but, resolving to weary, by perseverance, him whom he could not surpass in speed, he pressed on till the foot of the mountain stopped his course.

Here he recollected himself, and smiled at his own useless impetuosity. Then raising his eyes to the mountain, "This," said he, "is the fatal obstacle that hinders at once the enjoyment of pleasure, and the exercise of virtue. How long is it that my hopes and wishes have flown beyond this boundary of my life, which yet I never have attempted to surmount!"

Struck with this reflection, he sat down to muse, and remembered, that since he first resolved to escape from his confinement, the sun had passed twice over him in his annual course. He now felt a degree of regret with which he had never been before acquainted. He considered how much might have been done in the time which had passed, and left nothing real behind it. He compared twenty months with the life of man. "In life," said he, "is not to be counted the ignorance of infancy, or imbecility<sup>7</sup> of age. We are long before we are able to think, and we soon cease from the power of acting. The true period of human existence may be reasonably estimated as forty years, of which I have mused away the four and twentieth part. What I have lost was certain, for I have certainly possessed it; but of twenty months to come who can assure me?"

The consciousness of his own folly pierced him deeply, and he was long before he could be reconciled to himself. "The rest of my time," said he, "has been lost by the crime or folly of my ancestors, and the absurd institutions of my country; I remember it with disgust, yet without remorse: but the months that have passed since new light darted into my soul, since I formed a scheme of reasonable felicity, have been squandered by my own fault. I have lost that which can never be restored: I have seen the sun rise and set for twenty months, an idle gazer on the light of heaven. In this time the birds have left the nest of their mother, and committed themselves to the woods and to the skies: the kid has forsaken the teat, and learned by degrees to climb the rocks in quest of independent sustenance. I only have made no advances, but am still helpless and ignorant. The moon, by more than twenty changes, admonished me of the flux of life; the stream that rolled before my feet upbraided my inactivity. I sat feasting on intellectual luxury, regardless alike of the examples of the earth, and the instructions of the planets. Twenty months are past, who shall restore them!"

These sorrowful meditations fastened upon his mind; he passed four months in resolving to lose no more time in idle resolves, and was awakened to more vigorous exertion by hearing a maid, who had broken a porcelain cup, remark that what cannot be repaired is not to be regretted.

This was obvious; and Rasselas reproached himself that he had not discovered it, having not known, or not considered, how many useful hints are obtained by chance, and how often the mind, hurried by her own ardor to distant views, neglects the truths that lie open before her. He, for a few hours, regretted his regret, and from that time bent his whole mind upon the means of escaping from the valley of happiness.

Chapter 5. *The Prince Meditates His Escape

He now found that it would be very difficult to effect that which it was very easy to suppose effected. When he looked round about him, he saw himself confined by the bars of nature which had never yet been broken, and by the gate, through which none that once had passed it were ever able to return. He was now impatient as an eagle in a grate.<sup>8</sup> He passed week after week in clambering the mountains, to see if there was any aperture which the bushes might conceal, but found all the summits inaccessible by their prominence. The iron gate he despaired to open; for it was not only secured with all the power of art, but was always watched by successive sentinels, and was by its position exposed to the perpetual observation of all the inhabitants.

He then examined the cavern through which the waters of the lake were discharged; and, looking down at a time when the sun shone strongly upon its mouth, he discovered it to be full of broken rocks, which, though they permitted the stream to flow through many narrow passages, would stop anybody of solid bulk. He returned discouraged and dejected; but, having now known the blessing of hope, resolved never to despair.

In these fruitless searches he spent ten months. The time, however, passed cheerfully away: in the morning he rose with new hope, in the evening applauded his own diligence, and in the night slept sound after his fatigue. He met a thousand amusements which beguiled his labor, and diversified his thoughts. He discerned the various instincts of animals, and properties of plants, and found the place replete with wonders, of which he purposed to solace himself with the contemplation, if he should never be able to accomplish his flight; rejoicing that his endeavors, though yet unsuccessful, had supplied him with a source of inexhaustible enquiry.

But his original curiosity was not yet abated; he resolved to obtain some knowledge of the ways of men. His wish still continued, but his hope grew less. He ceased to survey any longer the walls of his prison, and spared to search by new toils for interstices which he knew could not be found, yet determined to keep his design always in view, and lay hold on any expedient that time should offer.

Chapter 6. A Dissertation on the Art of Flying

Among the artists that had been allured into the happy valley, to labor for the accommodation and pleasure of its inhabitants, was a man eminent for his knowledge of the mechanic powers, who had contrived many engines<sup>9</sup> both of use and recreation. By a wheel, which the stream turned, he forced the water into a tower, whence it was distributed to all the apartments of the palace. He erected a pavillion in the garden, around which he kept the air always cool by artificial showers. One of the groves appropriated to the ladies, was ventilated by fans, to which the rivulet that run through it gave a constant motion; and instruments of soft music were placed at proper distances, of which some played by the impulse of the wind, and some by the power of the stream.

This artist was sometimes visited by Rasselas, who was pleased with every kind of knowledge, imagining that the time would come when all his acquisitions should be of use to him in the open world. He came one day to amuse himself in his usual manner, and found the master busy in building a sailing chariot: he saw that the design was practicable upon a level surface, and with expressions of great esteem solicited its completion. The workman was pleased to find himself so much regarded by the prince, and resolved to gain yet higher honors. "Sir," said he, "you have seen but a small part of what the mechanic sciences can perform. I have been long of opinion, that, instead of the tardy conveyance of ships and chariots, man might use the swifter migration of wings; that the fields of air are open to knowledge, and that only ignorance and idleness need crawl upon the ground."

This hint rekindled the prince's desire of passing the mountains; having seen what the mechanist had already performed, he was willing to fancy that he could do more; yet resolved to inquire further before he suffered hope to afflict him by disappointment. "I am afraid," said he to the artist, "that your imagination prevails over your skill, and that you now tell me rather what you wish than what you know. Every animal has his element assigned him; the birds have the air, and man and beasts the earth." "So," replied the mechanist, "fishes have the water, in which yet beasts can swim by nature, and men by art. He that can swim needs not despair to fly: to swim is to fly in a grosser fluid, and to fly is to swim in a subtler.<sup>1</sup> We are only to proportion our power of resistance to the different density of the matter through which we are to pass. You will be necessarily upborn by the air, if you can renew any impulse upon it, faster than the air can recede from the pressure."

Unknown engraver, Rasselas, 1787. Rasselas pulls the artist to shore. The History of Rasselas, Prince of Abissinia, a tale, in two volumes.

"But the exercise of swimming," said the prince, "is very laborious; the strongest limbs are soon wearied; I am afraid the act of flying will be yet more violent, and wings will be of no great use, unless we can fly further than we can swim."

"The labor of rising from the ground," said the artist, "will be great, as we see it in the heavier domestic fowls; but, as we mount higher, the earth's attraction, and the body's gravity, will be gradually diminished, till we shall arrive at a region where the man will float in the air without any tendency to fall: no care will then be necessary, but to move forwards, which the gentlest impulse will effect. You, Sir, whose curiosity is so extensive, will easily conceive with what pleasure a philosopher, furnished with wings, and hovering in the sky, would see the earth, and all its inhabitants, rolling beneath him, and presenting to him successively, by its diurnal motion, all the countries within the same parallel. How must it amuse the pendent spectator to see the moving scene of land and ocean, cities and deserts! To survey with equal security the marts of trade, and the fields of battle; mountains infested by barbarians, and fruitful regions gladdened by plenty, and lulled by peace! How easily shall we then trace the Nile through all his passage; pass over to distant regions, and examine the face of nature from one extremity of the earth to the other!"

"All this," said the prince, "is much to be desired, but I am afraid that no man will be able to breathe in these regions of speculation and tranquility. I have been told, that respiration is difficult upon lofty mountains, yet from these precipices, though so high as to produce great tenuity of the air, it is very easy to fall: therefore I suspect, that from any height, where life can be supported, there may be danger of too quick descent."

"Nothing," replied the artist, "will ever be attempted, if all possible objections must be first overcome. If you will favor my project I will try the first flight at my own hazard. I have considered the structure of all volant<sup>2</sup> animals, and find the folding continuity of the bat's wings most easily accommodated to the human form. Upon this model I shall begin my task tomorrow, and in a year expect to tower into the air beyond the malice or pursuit of man. But I will work only on this condition, that the art shall not be divulged, and that you shall not require me to make wings for any but ourselves."

"Why," said Rasselas, "should you envy others so great an advantage? All skill ought to be exerted for universal good; every man has owed much to others, and ought to repay the kindness that he has received."

"If men were all virtuous," returned the artist, "I should with great alacrity teach them all to fly. But what would be the security of the good, if the bad could at pleasure invade them from the sky? Against an army sailing through the clouds neither walls, nor mountains, nor seas, could afford any security. A flight of northern savages might hover in the wind, and light at once with irresistible violence upon the capital of a fruitful region that was rolling under them. Even this valley, the retreat of princes, the abode of happiness, might be violated by the sudden descent of some of the naked nations that swarm on the coast of the southern sea."

The prince promised secrecy, and waited for the performance, not wholly hopeless of success. He visited the work from time to time, observed its progress, and remarked many ingenious contrivances to facilitate motion, and unite levity with strength. The artist was every day more certain that he should leave vultures and eagles behind him, and the contagion of his confidence seized upon the prince.

In a year the wings were finished, and, on a morning appointed, the maker appeared furnished for flight on a little promontory: he waved his pinions a while to gather air, then leaped from his stand, and in an instant dropped into the lake. His wings, which were of no use in the air, sustained him in the water, and the prince drew him to land, half dead with terror and vexation.

Chapter 7. The Prince Finds a Man of Learning

The prince was not much afflicted by this disaster, having suffered himself to hope for a happier event, only because he had no other means of escape in view. He still persisted in his design to leave the happy valley by the first opportunity.

His imagination was now at a stand; he had no prospect of entering into the world; and, notwithstanding all his endeavors to support himself, discontent by degrees preyed upon him, and he began again to lose his thoughts in sadness, when the rainy season, which in these countries is periodical, made it inconvenient to wander in the woods.

The rain continued longer and with more violence than had been ever known; the clouds broke on the surrounding mountains, and the torrents streamed into the plain on every side, till the cavern was too narrow to discharge the water. The lake overflowed its banks, and all the level of the valley was covered with the inundation. The eminence, on which the palace was built, and some other spots of rising ground, were all that the eye could now discover. The herds and flocks left the pastures, and both the wild beasts and the tame retreated to the mountains.

This inundation confined all the princes to domestic amusements, and the attention of Rasselas was particularly seized by a poem, which Imlac rehearsed,<sup>3</sup> upon the various conditions of humanity. He commanded the poet to attend him in his apartment, and recite his verses a second time; then entering into familiar talk, he thought himself happy in having found a man who knew the world so well, and could so skillfully paint the scenes of life. He asked a thousand questions about things, to which, though common to all other mortals, his confinement from childhood had kept him a stranger. The poet pitied his ignorance, and loved his curiosity, and entertained him from day to day with novelty and instruction, so that the prince regretted the necessity of sleep, and longed till the morning should renew his pleasure.

As they were sitting together, the prince commanded Imlac to relate his history, and to tell by what accident he was forced, or by what motive induced, to close his life in the happy valley. As he was going to begin his narrative, Rasselas was called to a concert, and obliged to restrain his curiosity till the evening.

Chapter 8. The History of Imlac

The close of the day is, in the regions of the torrid zone, the only season of diversion and entertainment, and it was therefore midnight before the music ceased, and the princesses retired. Rasselas then called for his companion and required him to begin the story of his life.

"Sir," said Imlac, "my history will not be long: the life that is devoted to knowledge passes silently away, and is very little diversified by events. To talk in public, to think in solitude, to read and to hear, to inquire, and answer inquiries, is the business of a scholar. He wanders about the world without pomp or terror, and is neither known nor valued but by men like himself.

"I was born in the kingdom of Goiama,<sup>4</sup> at no great distance from the fountain of the Nile. My father was a wealthy merchant, who traded between the inland countries of Africk and the ports of the Red Sea. He was honest, frugal and diligent, but of mean sentiments, and narrow comprehension: he desired only to be rich, and to conceal his riches, lest he should be spoiled<sup>5</sup> by the governors of the province."

"Surely," said the prince, "my father must be negligent of his charge, if any man in his dominions dares take that which belongs to another. Does he not know that kings are accountable for injustice permitted as well as done? If I were emperor, not the meanest of my subjects should be oppressed with impunity. My blood boils when I am told that a merchant durst not enjoy his honest gains for fear of losing them by the rapacity of power. Name the governor who robbed the people, that I may declare his crimes to the emperor."

"Sir," said Imlac, "your ardor is the natural effect of virtue animated by youth: the time will come when you will acquit your father, and perhaps hear with less impatience of the governor. Oppression is, in the Abyssinian dominions, neither frequent nor tolerated; but no form of government has been yet discovered, by which cruelty can be wholly prevented. Subordination supposes power on one part and subjection on the other; and if power be in the hands of men, it will sometimes be abused. The vigilance of the supreme magistrate may do much, but much will still remain undone. He can never know all the crimes that are committed, and can seldom punish all that he knows."

"This," said the prince, "I do not understand, but I had rather hear thee than dispute. Continue thy narration."

"My father," proceeded Imlac, "originally intended that I should have no other education, than such as might qualify me for commerce; and discovering in me great strength of memory, and quickness of apprehension, often declared his hope that I should be some time the richest man in Abyssinia."

"Why," said the prince, "did thy father desire the increase of his wealth, when it was already greater than he durst discover or enjoy? I am unwilling to doubt thy veracity, yet inconsistencies cannot both be true."

"Inconsistencies," answered Imlac, "cannot both be right, but, imputed to man, they may both be true. Yet diversity is not inconsistency. My father might expect a time of greater security. However, some desire is necessary to keep life in motion, and he, whose real wants are supplied, must admit those of fancy."

"This," said the prince, "I can in some measure conceive. I repent that I interrupted thee."

"With this hope," proceeded Imlac, "he sent me to school; but when I had once found the delight of knowledge, and felt the pleasure of intelligence<sup>6</sup> and the pride of invention, I began silently to despise riches, and determined to disappoint the purpose of my father, whose grossness of conception raised my pity. I was twenty years old before his tenderness would expose me to the fatigue of travel, in which time I had been instructed, by successive masters, in all the literature of my native country. As every hour taught me something new, I lived in a continual course of gratifications; but, as I advanced towards manhood, I lost much of the reverence with which I had been used to look on my instructors; because, when the lesson was ended, I did not find them wiser or better than common men.

"At length my father resolved to initiate me in commerce, and, opening one of his subterranean treasures, counted out ten thousand pieces of gold. 'This, young man,' said he, 'is the stock with which you must negotiate.'<sup>7</sup> I began with less than the fifth part, and you see how diligence and parsimony have increased it. This is your own to waste or to improve. If you squander it by negligence or caprice, you must wait for my death before you will be rich: if, in four years, you double your stock, we will thenceforward let subordination cease, and live together as friends and partners; for he shall always be equal with me, who is equally skilled in the art of growing rich.'

"We laid our money upon camels, concealed in bales of cheap goods, and travelled to the shore of the Red Sea. When I cast my eye on the expanse of waters my heart bounded like that of a prisoner escaped. I felt an unextinguishable curiosity kindle in my mind, and resolved to snatch this opportunity of seeing the manners of other nations, and of learning sciences unknown in Abyssinia.

"I remembered that my father had obliged me to the improvement of my stock, not by a promise which I ought not to violate, but by a penalty which I was at liberty to incur; and therefore determined to gratify my predominant desire, and by drinking at the fountains of knowledge, to quench the thirst of curiosity.

"As I was supposed to trade without connection with my father, it was easy for me to become acquainted with the master of a ship, and procure a passage to some other country. I had no motives of choice to regulate my voyage; it was sufficient for me that, wherever I wandered, I should see a country which I had not seen before. I therefore entered a ship bound for Surat,<sup>8</sup> having left a letter for my father declaring my intention.

Chapter 9. The History of Imlac Continued

"When I first entered upon the world of waters, and lost sight of land, I looked round about me with pleasing terror, and thinking my soul enlarged by the boundless prospect, imagined that I could gaze round for ever without satiety; but, in a short time, I grew weary of looking on barren uniformity, where I could only see again what I had already seen. I then descended into the ship, and doubted for a while whether all my future pleasures would not end like this in disgust and disappointment. Yet, surely, said I, the ocean and the land are very different; the only variety of water is rest and motion, but the earth has mountains and valleys, deserts and cities: it is inhabited by men of different customs and contrary opinions; and I may hope to find variety in life, though I should miss it in nature.

"With this thought I quieted my mind; and amused myself during the voyage, sometimes by learning from the sailors the art of navigation, which I have never practiced, and sometimes by forming schemes for my conduct in different situations, in not one of which I have been ever placed.

"I was almost weary of my naval amusements when we landed safely at Surat. I secured my money, and purchasing some commodities for show, joined myself to a caravan that was passing into the inland country. My companions, for some reason or other, conjecturing that I was rich, and, by my inquiries and admiration, finding that I was ignorant, considered me as a novice whom they had a right to cheat, and who was to learn at the usual expense the art of fraud. They exposed me to the theft of servants, and the exaction of officers,<sup>9</sup> and saw me plundered upon false pretences, without any advantage to themselves, but that of rejoicing in the superiority of their own knowledge."

"Stop a moment," said the prince. "Is there such depravity in man, as that he should injure another without benefit to himself? I can easily conceive that all are pleased with superiority; but your ignorance was merely accidental, which, being neither your crime nor your folly, could afford them no reason to applaud themselves; and the knowledge which they had, and which you wanted, they might as effectually have shown by warning, as betraying you."

"Pride," said Imlac, "is seldom delicate, it will please itself with very mean advantages; and envy feels not its own happiness, but when it may be compared with the misery of others. They were my enemies because they grieved to think me rich, and my oppressors because they delighted to find me weak."

"Proceed," said the prince: "I doubt not of the facts which you relate, but imagine that you impute them to mistaken motives."

"In this company," said Imlac, "I arrived at Agra, the capital of Indostan, the city in which the great Mogul commonly resides. I applied myself to the language of the country, and in a few months was able to converse with the learned men; some of whom I found morose and reserved, and others easy and communicative; some were unwilling to teach another what they had with difficulty learned themselves; and some showed that the end<sup>1</sup> of their studies was to gain the dignity of instructing.

"To the tutor of the young princes I recommended myself so much, that I was presented to the emperor as a man of uncommon knowledge. The emperor asked me many questions concerning my country and my travels; and though I cannot now recollect any thing that he uttered above the power of a common man, he dismissed me astonished at his wisdom, and enamored of his goodness.

"My credit was now so high, that the merchants, with whom I had traveled, applied to me for recommendations to the ladies of the court. I was surprised at their confidence of solicitation, and gently reproached them with their practices on the road. They heard me with cold indifference, and showed no tokens of shame or sorrow.

"They then urged their request with the offer of a bribe; but what I would not do for kindness I would not do for money; and refused them, not because they had injured me, but because I would not enable them to injure others; for I knew they would have made use of my credit to cheat those who should buy their wares.

"Having resided at Agra till there was no more to be learned, I traveled into Persia, where I saw many remains of ancient magnificence, and observed many new accommodations<sup>2</sup> of life. The Persians are a nation eminently social, and their assemblies afforded me daily opportunities of remarking characters and manners, and of tracing human nature through all its variations.

“From Persia I passed into Arabia, where I saw a nation at once pastoral and warlike; who live without any settled habitation; whose only wealth is their flocks and herds; and who have yet carried on, through all ages, an hereditary war with all mankind, though they neither covet nor envy their possessions.

Chapter 10. *Imlac's History Continued. A Dissertation upon Poetry

"Wherever I went, I found that poetry was considered as the highest learning, and regarded with a veneration somewhat approaching to that which man would pay to the angelic nature. And yet it fills me with wonder that, in almost all countries, the most ancient poets are considered as the best: whether it be that every other kind of knowledge is an acquisition gradually attained, and poetry is a gift conferred at once; or that the first poetry of every nation surprised them as a novelty, and retained the credit by consent which it received by accident at first; or whether, as the province of poetry is to describe nature and passion, which are always the same, the first writers took possession of the most striking objects for description and the most probable occurrences for fiction, and left nothing to those that followed them, but transcription of the same events, and new combinations of the same images—whatever be the reason, it is commonly observed that the early writers are in possession of nature, and their followers of art; that the first excel in strength and invention, and the latter in elegance and refinement.

"I was desirous to add my name to this illustrious fraternity. I read all the poets of Persia and Arabia, and was able to repeat by memory the volumes that are suspended in the mosque of Mecca.<sup>3</sup> But I soon found that no man was ever great by imitation. My desire of excellence impelled me to transfer my attention to nature and to life. Nature was to be my subject, and men to be my auditors: I could never describe what I had not seen; I could not hope to move those with delight or terror, whose interests and opinions I did not understand.

"Being now resolved to be a poet, I saw everything with a new purpose; my sphere of attention was suddenly magnified; no kind of knowledge was to be overlooked. I ranged mountains and deserts for images and resemblances, and pictured upon my mind every tree of the forest and flower of the valley. I observed with equal care the crags of the rock and the pinnacles of the palace. Sometimes I wandered along the mazes of the rivulet, and sometimes watched the changes of the summer clouds. To a poet nothing can be useless. Whatever is beautiful, and whatever is dreadful, must be familiar to his imagination; he must be conversant with all that is awfully<sup>4</sup> vast or elegantly little. The plants of the garden, the animals of the wood, the minerals of the earth, and meteors of the sky, must all concur to store his mind with inexhaustible variety: for every idea<sup>5</sup> is useful for the enforcement or decoration of moral or religious truth; and he who knows most will have most power of diversifying his scenes, and of gratifying his reader with remote allusions and unexpected instruction.

"All the appearances of nature I was therefore careful to study, and every country which I have surveyed has contributed something to my poetical powers."

"In so wide a survey," said the prince, "you must surely have left much unobserved. I have lived till now within the circuit of these mountains, and yet cannot walk abroad without the sight of something which I have never beheld before, or never heeded."

"The business of a poet," said Imlac, "is to examine, not the individual, but the species; to remark general properties and large appearances; he does not number the streaks of the tulip, or describe the different shades in the verdure of the forest. He is to exhibit in his portraits of nature such prominent and striking features as recall the original to every mind, and must neglect the minuter discriminations, which one may have remarked and another have neglected, for those characteristics which are alike obvious to vigilance and carelessness.

"But the knowledge of nature is only half the task of a poet; he must be acquainted likewise with all the modes of life. His character requires that he estimate the happiness and misery of every condition; observe the power of all the passions in all their combinations, and trace the changes of the human mind, as they are modified by various institutions and accidental influences of climate or custom, from the sprightliness of infancy to the despondence of decrepitude. He must divest himself of the prejudices of his age or country; he must consider right and wrong in their abstracted and invariable state; he must disregard present laws and opinions, and rise to general and transcendental<sup>6</sup> truths, which will always be the same. He must, therefore, content himself with the slow progress of his name, condemn the applause of his own time, and commit his claims to the justice of posterity. He must write as the interpreter of nature and the legislator of mankind, and consider himself as presiding over the thoughts and manners of future generations, as a being superior to time and place.

"His labor is not yet at an end; he must know many languages and many sciences; and, that his style may be worthy of his thoughts, must by incessant practice familiarize to himself every delicacy of speech and grace of harmony."

Chapter 11. Imlac's Narrative Continued. A Hint on Pilgrimage

Imlac now felt the enthusiastic fit, and was proceeding to aggrandize his own profession, when the prince cried out: "Enough! thou hast convinced me that no human being can ever be a poet. Proceed with thy narration."

"To be a poet," said Imlac, "is indeed very difficult." "So difficult," returned the prince, "that I will at present hear no more of his labors. Tell me whither you went when you had seen Persia."

"From Persia," said the poet, "I traveled through Syria, and for three years resided in Palestine, where I conversed with great numbers of the northern and western nations of Europe, the nations which are now in possession of all power and all knowledge, whose armies are irresistible, and whose fleets command the remotest parts of the globe. When I compared these men with the natives of our own kingdom, and those that surround us, they appeared almost another order of beings. In their countries it is difficult to wish for anything that may not be obtained; a thousand arts, of which we never heard, are continually laboring for their convenience and pleasure; and whatever their own climate has denied them is supplied by their commerce."

"By what means," said the prince, "are the Europeans thus powerful, or why, since they can so easily visit Asia and Africa for trade or conquest, cannot the Asiatics and Africans invade their coasts, plant colonies in their ports, and give laws to their natural princes? The same wind that carries them back would bring us thither."

"They are more powerful, sir, than we," answered Imlac, "because they are wiser; knowledge will always predominate over ignorance, as man governs the other animals. But why their knowledge is more than ours, I know not what reason can be given, but the unsearchable will of the Supreme Being."

"When," said the prince with a sigh, "shall I be able to visit Palestine, and mingle with this mighty confluence of nations? Till that happy moment shall arrive, let me fill up the time with such representations as thou canst give me. I am not ignorant of the motive that assembles such numbers in that place, and cannot but consider it as the center of wisdom and piety, to which the best and wisest men of every land must be continually resorting."

"There are some nations," said Imlac, "that send few visitants to Palestine; for many numerous and learned sects in Europe concur to censure pilgrimage as superstitious, or deride it as ridiculous."

"You know," said the prince, "how little my life has made me acquainted with diversity of opinions. It will be too long to hear the arguments on both sides; you, that have considered them, tell me the result."

"Pilgrimage," said Imlac, "like many other acts of piety, may be reasonable or superstitious, according to the principles upon which it is performed. Long journeys in search of truth are not commanded. Truth, such as is necessary to the regulation of life, is always found where it is honestly sought. Change of place is no natural cause of the increase of piety, for it inevitably produces dissipation of mind. Yet, since men go every day to view the fields where great actions have been performed, and return with stronger impressions of the event, curiosity of the same kind may naturally dispose us to view that country whence our religion had its beginning; and I believe no man surveys those awful scenes without some confirmation of holy resolutions. That the Supreme Being may be more easily propitiated in one place than in another is the dream of idle superstition, but that some places may operate upon our own minds in an uncommon manner is an opinion which hourly experience will justify. He who supposes that his vices may be more successfully combated in Palestine, will, perhaps, find himself mistaken, yet he may go thither without folly; he who thinks they will be more freely pardoned, dishonors at once his reason and religion."

"These," said the prince, "are European distinctions. I will consider them another time. What have you found to be the effect of knowledge? Are those nations happier than we?"

"There is so much infelicity," said the poet, "in the world that scarce any man has leisure from his own distresses to estimate the comparative happiness of others. Knowledge is certainly one of the means of pleasure, as is confessed by the natural desire which every mind feels of increasing its ideas. Ignorance is mere privation, by which nothing can be produced; it is a vacuity in which the soul sits motionless and torpid for want of attraction; and, without knowing why, we always rejoice when we learn, and grieve when we forget. I am therefore inclined to conclude that if nothing counteracts the natural consequence of learning, we grow more happy as our minds take a wider range.

"In enumerating the particular comforts of life, we shall find many advantages on the side of the Europeans. They cure wounds and diseases with which we languish and perish. We suffer inclemencies of weather which they can obviate. They have engines for the despatch of many laborious works, which we must perform by manual industry. There is such communication between distant places that one friend can hardly be said to be absent from another. Their policy removes all public inconveniences; they have roads cut through their mountains, and bridges laid upon their rivers. And, if we descend to the privacies of life, their habitations are more commodious, and their possessions are more secure."

"They are surely happy," said the prince, "who have all these conveniencies, of which I envy none so much as the facility with which separated friends interchange their thoughts."

"The Europeans," answered Imlac, "are less unhappy than we, but they are not happy. Human life is everywhere a state in which much is to be endured, and little to be enjoyed."

Chapter 12. The Story of Imlac Continued

"I am not yet willing," said the prince, "to suppose that happiness is so parsimoniously distributed to mortals; nor can believe but that, if I had the choice of life, I should be able to fill every day with pleasure. I would injure no man, and should provoke no resentment: I would relieve every distress, and should enjoy the benedictions of gratitude. I would choose my friends among the wise, and my wife among the virtuous; and therefore should be in no danger from treachery, or unkindness. My children should, by my care, be learned and pious, and would repay to my age what their childhood had received. What would dare to molest him who might call on every side to thousands enriched by his bounty, or assisted by his power? And why should not life glide quietly away in the soft reciprocation of protection and reverence? All this may be done without the help of European refinements, which appear by their effects to be rather specious than useful. Let us leave them and pursue our journey."

"From Palestine," said Imlac, "I passed through many regions of Asia; in the more civilized kingdoms as a trader, and among the barbarians of the mountains as a pilgrim. At last I began to long for my native country, that I might repose after my travels, and fatigues, in the places where I had spent my earliest years, and gladden my old companions with the recital of my adventures. Often did I figure to myself those, with whom I had sported away the gay hours of dawning life, sitting round me in its evening, wondering at my tales, and listening to my counsels.

"When this thought had taken possession of my mind, I considered every moment as wasted which did not bring me nearer to Abyssinia. I hastened into Egypt, and, notwithstanding my impatience, was detained ten months in the contemplation of its ancient magnificence, and in enquiries after the remains of its ancient learning. I found in Cairo a mixture of all nations; some brought thither by the love of knowledge, some by the hope of gain, and many by the desire of living after their own manner without observation, and of lying hid in the obscurity of multitudes: for, in a city, populous as Cairo, it is possible to obtain at the same time the gratifications of society, and the secrecy of solitude.

"From Cairo I traveled to Suez, and embarked on the Red Sea, passing along the coast till I arrived at the port from which I had departed twenty years before. Here I joined myself to a caravan and re-entered my native country.

"I now expected the caresses of my kinsmen, and the congratulations of my friends, and was not without hope that my father, whatever value he had set upon riches, would own with gladness and pride a son who was able to add to the felicity and honor of the nation. But I was soon convinced that my thoughts were vain. My father had been dead fourteen years, having divided his wealth among my brothers, who were removed to some other provinces. Of my companions the greater part was in the grave, of the rest some could with difficulty remember me, and some considered me as one corrupted by foreign manners.

"A man used to vicissitudes is not easily dejected. I forgot, after a time, my disappointment, and endeavored to recommend myself to the nobles of the kingdom: they admitted me to their tables, heard my story, and dismissed me. I opened a school, and was prohibited to teach. I then resolved to sit down in the quiet of domestic life, and addressed a lady that was fond of my conversation, but rejected my suit, because my father was a merchant.

"Wearied at last with solicitation and repulses, I resolved to hide myself for ever from the world, and depend no longer on the opinion or caprice of others. I waited for the time when the gate of the happy valley should open, that I might bid farewell to hope and fear: the day came; my performance was distinguished with favor, and I resigned myself with joy to perpetual confinement."

"Hast thou here found happiness at last?" said Rasselas. "Tell me without reserve; art thou content with thy condition? or, dost thou wish to be again wandering and inquiring? All the inhabitants of this valley celebrate their lot, and, at the annual visit of the emperor, invite others to partake of their felicity."

"Great prince," said Imlac, "I shall speak the truth: I know not one of all your attendants who does not lament the hour when he entered this retreat. I am less unhappy than the rest, because I have a mind replete with images, which I can vary and combine at pleasure. I can amuse my solitude by the renovation of the knowledge which begins to fade from my memory, and by recollection of the accidents of my past life. Yet all this ends in the sorrowful consideration, that my acquirements are now useless, and that none of my pleasures can be again enjoyed. The rest, whose minds have no impression but of the present moment, are either corroded by malignant passions, or sit stupid in the gloom of perpetual vacancy."

"What passions can infest those," said the prince, "who have no trials? We are in a place where impotence precludes malice, and where all envy is repressed by community<sup>2</sup> of enjoyments."

"There may be community," said Imlac, "of material possessions, but there can never be community of love or of esteem. It must happen that one will please more than another; he that knows himself despised will always be envious; and still more envious and malevolent, if he is condemned to live in the presence of those who despise him. The invitations, by which they allure others to a state which they feel to be wretched, proceed from the natural malignity of hopeless misery. They are weary of themselves, and of each other, and expect to find relief in new companions. They envy the liberty which their folly has forfeited, and would gladly see all mankind imprisoned like themselves.

"From this crime, however, I am wholly free. No man can say that he is wretched by my persuasion. I look with pity on the crowds who are annually soliciting admission to captivity, and wish that it were lawful for me to warn them of their danger."

"My dear Imlac," said the prince, "I will open to thee my whole heart. I have long meditated an escape from the happy valley. I have examined the mountains on every side, but find myself insuperably barred: teach me the way to break my prison; thou shalt be the companion of my flight, the guide of my rambles, the partner of my fortune, and my sole director in the choice of life."

"Sir," answered the poet, "your escape will be difficult, and, perhaps, you may soon repent your curiosity. The world, which you figure to yourself smooth and quiet as the lake in the valley, you will find a sea foaming with tempests, and boiling with whirlpools: you will be sometimes overwhelmed by the waves of violence, and sometimes dashed against the rocks of treachery. Amidst wrongs and frauds, competitions and anxieties, you will wish a thousand times for these seats of quiet, and willingly quit hope to be free from fear."

"Do not seek to deter me from my purpose," said the prince: "I am impatient to see what thou hast seen; and, since thou art thyself weary of the valley, it is evident, that thy former state was better than this. Whatever be the consequence of my experiment, I am resolved to judge with my own eyes of the various conditions of men, and then to make deliberately my choice of life."

"I am afraid," said Imlac, "you are hindered by stronger restraints than my persuasions; yet, if your determination is fixed, I do not counsel you to despair. Few things are impossible to diligence and skill."

Chapter 13. *Rasselas Discovers the Means of Escape

The prince now dismissed his favorite to rest, but the narrative of wonders and novelties filled his mind with perturbation. He revolved all that he had heard, and prepared innumerable questions for the morning.

Much of his uneasiness was now removed. He had a friend to whom he could impart his thoughts, and whose experience could assist him in his designs. His heart was no longer condemned to swell with silent vexation. He thought that even the happy valley might be endured with such a companion, and that, if they could range the world together, he should have nothing further to desire.

In a few days the water was discharged, and the ground dried. The prince and Imlac then walked out together to converse without the notice of the rest. The prince, whose thoughts were always on the wing, as he passed by the gate, said, with a countenance of sorrow, "Why art thou so strong, and why is man so weak?"

"Man is not weak," answered his companion; "knowledge is more than equivalent to force. The master of mechanics laughs at strength. I can burst the gate, but cannot do it secretly. Some other expedient must be tried."

As they were walking on the side of the mountain, they observed that the conies,<sup>8</sup> which the rain had driven from their burrows, had taken shelter among the bushes, and formed holes behind them, tending upwards in an oblique line. "It has been the opinion of antiquity," said Imlac, "that human reason borrowed many arts from the instinct of animals; let us, therefore, not think ourselves degraded by learning from the coney. We may escape by piercing the mountain in the same direction. We will begin where the summit hangs over the middle part, and labor upward till we shall issue out beyond the prominence."

The eyes of the prince, when he heard this proposal, sparkled with joy. The execution was easy, and the success certain.

No time was now lost. They hastened early in the morning to choose a place proper for their mine. They clambered with great fatigue among crags and brambles, and returned without having discovered any part that favored their design. The second and the third day were spent in the same manner, and with the same frustration. But, on the fourth, they found a small cavern, concealed by a thicket, where they resolved to make their experiment.

Imlac procured instruments proper to hew stone and remove earth, and they fell to their work on the next day with more eagerness than vigor. They were presently exhausted by their efforts, and sat down to pant upon the grass. The prince, for a moment, appeared to be discouraged. "Sir," said his companion, "practice will enable us to continue our labor for a longer time; mark, however, how far we have advanced, and you will find that our toil will some time have an end. Great works are performed, not by strength, but perseverance: yonder palace was raised by single stones, yet you see its height and spaciousness. He that shall walk with vigor three hours a day will pass in seven years a space equal to the circumference of the globe."

They returned to their work day after day, and, in a short time, found a fissure in the rock, which enabled them to pass far with very little obstruction. This Rasselas considered as a good omen. "Do not disturb your mind," said Imlac, "with other hopes or fears than reason may suggest: if you are pleased with prognostics of good, you will be terrified likewise with tokens of evil, and your whole life will be a prey to superstition. Whatever facilitates our work is more than an omen, it is a cause of success. This is one of those pleasing surprises which often happen to active resolution. Many things difficult to design prove easy to performance."

Chapter 14. Rasselas and Imlac Receive an Unexpected Visit

They had now wrought their way to the middle, and solaced their toil with the approach of liberty, when the prince, coming down to refresh himself with air, found his sister Nekayah standing before the mouth of the cavity. He started and stood confused, afraid to tell his design, and yet hopeless to conceal it. A few moments determined him to repose on her fidelity, and secure her secrecy by a declaration without reserve.

“Do not imagine,” said the princess, “that I came hither as a spy: I had long observed from my window, that you and Imlac directed your walk every day towards the same point, but I did not suppose you had any better reason for the preference than a cooler shade, or more fragrant bank; nor followed you with any other design than to partake of your conversation. Since then not suspicion but fondness has detected you, let me not lose the advantage of my discovery. I am equally weary of confinement with yourself, and not less desirous of knowing what is done or suffered in the world. Permit me to fly with you from this tasteless tranquility, which will yet grow more loathsome when you have left me. You may deny me to accompany you, but cannot hinder me from following.”

The prince, who loved Nekayah above his other sisters, had no inclination to refuse her request, and grieved that he had lost an opportunity of showing his confidence by a voluntary communication. It was therefore agreed that she should leave the valley with them; and that, in the mean time, she should watch, lest any other straggler should, by chance or curiosity, follow them to the mountain.

At length their labor was at an end; they saw light beyond the prominence, and, issuing to the top of the mountain, beheld the Nile, yet a narrow current, wandering beneath them.

The prince looked round with rapture, anticipated all the pleasures of travel, and in thought was already transported beyond his father’s dominions. Imlac, though very joyful at his escape, had less expectation of pleasure in the world, which he had before tried, and of which he had been weary.

Rasselas was so much delighted with a wider horizon, that he could not soon be persuaded to return into the valley. He informed his sister that the way was open, and that nothing now remained but to prepare for their departure.

Chapter 15. *The Prince and Princess Leave the Valley, and See Many Wonders

The prince and princess had jewels sufficient to make them rich whenever they came into a place of commerce, which, by Imlac's direction, they hid in their clothes, and, on the night of the next full moon, all left the valley. The princess was followed only by a single favorite, who did not know whither she was going.

They clambered through the cavity, and began to go down on the other side. The princess and her maid turned their eyes towards every part, and, seeing nothing to bound their prospect, considered themselves as in danger of being lost in a dreary vacuity. They stopped and trembled. "I am almost afraid," said the princess, "to begin a journey of which I cannot perceive an end, and to venture into this immense plain where I may be approached on every side by men whom I never saw." The prince felt nearly the same emotions, though he thought it more manly to conceal them.

Imlac smiled at their terrors, and encouraged them to proceed; but the princess continued irresolute till she had been imperceptibly drawn forward too far to return.

In the morning they found some shepherds in the field, who set milk and fruits before them. The princess wondered that she did not see a palace ready for her reception, and a table spread with delicacies; but, being faint and hungry, she drank the milk and ate the fruits, and thought them of a higher flavor than the products of the valley.

They traveled forward by easy journeys, being all unaccustomed to toil or difficulty, and knowing, that though they might be missed, they could not be pursued. In a few days they came into a more populous region, where Imlac was diverted with the admiration which his companions expressed at the diversity of manners, stations and employments.

Their dress was such as might not bring upon them the suspicion of having any thing to conceal, yet the prince, wherever he came, expected to be obeyed, and the princess was frightened, because those that came into her presence did not prostrate themselves before her. Imlac was forced to observe them with great vigilance, lest they should betray their rank by their unusual behavior, and detained them several weeks in the first village to accustom them to the sight of common mortals.

By degrees the royal wanderers were taught to understand that they had for a time laid aside their dignity, and were to expect only such regard as liberality and courtesy could procure. And Imlac, having, by many admonitions, prepared them to endure the tumults of a port, and the ruggedness of the commercial race, brought them down to the seacoast.

The prince and his sister, to whom every thing was new, were gratified equally at all places, and therefore remained for some months at the port without any inclination to pass further. Imlac was content with their stay, because he did not think it safe to expose them, unpracticed in the world, to the hazards of a foreign country.

At last he began to fear lest they should be discovered, and proposed to fix a day for their departure. They had no pretensions to judge for themselves, and referred the whole scheme to his direction. He therefore took passage in a ship to Suez; and, when the time came, with great difficulty prevailed on the princess to enter the vessel. They had a quick and prosperous voyage, and from Suez traveled by land to Cairo.

Chapter 16. They Enter Cairo, and Find Every Man Happy

As they approached the city, which filled the strangers with astonishment, "This," said Imlac to the prince, "is the place where travelers and merchants assemble from all the corners of the earth. You will here find men of every character and every occupation. Commerce is here honorable. I will act as a merchant, and you shall live as strangers, who have no other end of travel than curiosity. It will soon be observed that we are rich; our reputation will procure us access to all whom we shall desire to know; you will see all the conditions of humanity, and enable yourself at leisure to make your choice of life."

They now entered the town, stunned by the noise, and offended by the crowds. Instruction had not yet so prevailed over habit, but that they wondered to see themselves pass undistinguished along the street, and met by the lowest of the people without reverence or notice. The princess could not at first bear the thought of being leveled with the vulgar,<sup>9</sup> and for some days continued in her chamber, where she was served by her favorite, Pekuah, as in the palace of the valley.

Imlac, who understood traffic,<sup>1</sup> sold part of the jewels the next day, and hired a house, which he adorned with such magnificence that he was immediately considered as a merchant of great wealth. His politeness attracted many acquaintance, and his generosity made him courted by many dependents. His table was crowded by men of every nation, who all admired his knowledge, and solicited his favor. His companions, not being able to mix in the conversation, could make no discovery<sup>2</sup> of their ignorance or surprise, and were gradually initiated in the world as they gained knowledge of the language.

The prince had, by frequent lectures, been, taught the use and nature of money; but the ladies could not for a long time comprehend what the merchants did with small pieces of gold and silver, or why things of so little use should be received as equivalent to the necessaries of life.

They studied the language two years, while Imlac was preparing to set before them the various ranks and conditions of mankind. He grew acquainted with all who had anything uncommon in their fortune or conduct. He frequented the voluptuous and the frugal, the idle and the busy, the merchants and the men of learning.

The prince being now able to converse with fluency, and having learned the caution necessary to be observed in his intercourse with strangers, began to accompany Imlac to places of resort, and to enter into all assemblies, that he might make his choice of life.

For some time he thought choice needless, because all appeared to him equally happy. Wherever he went he met gaiety and kindness, and heard the song of joy or the laugh of carelessness. He began to believe that the world overflowed with universal plenty, and that nothing was withheld either from want or merit; that every hand showered liberality, and every heart melted with benevolence: "And who then," says he, "will be suffered to be wretched?"

Imlac permitted the pleasing delusion, and was unwilling to crush the hope of inexperience, till one day, having sat awhile silent, "I know not," said the prince, "what can be the reason that I am more unhappy than any of our friends. I see them perpetually and unalterably cheerful, but feel my own mind restless and uneasy. I am unsatisfied with those pleasures which I seem most to court; I live in the crowds of jollity, not so much to enjoy company as to shun myself, and am only loud and merry to conceal my sadness."

"Every man," said Imlac, "may, by examining his own mind, guess what passes in the minds of others; when you feel that your own gaiety is counterfeit, it may justly lead you to suspect that of your companions not to be sincere. Envy is commonly reciprocal. We are long before we are convinced that happiness is never to be found, and each believes it possessed by others, to keep alive the hope of obtaining it for himself. In the assembly where you passed the last night, there appeared such sprightliness of air, and volatility of fancy, as might have suited beings of an higher order, formed to inhabit serener regions, inaccessible to care or sorrow; yet, believe me, prince, there was not one who did not dread the moment when solitude should deliver him to the tyranny of reflection."

"This," said the prince, "may be true of others, since it is true of me; yet, whatever be the general infelicity of man, one condition is more happy than another, and wisdom surely directs us to take the least evil in the choice of life."

"The causes of good and evil," answered Imlac, "are so various and uncertain, so often entangled with each other, so diversified by various relations, and so much subject to accidents which cannot be foreseen, that he who would fix his condition upon incontestable reasons of preference must live and die inquiring and deliberating."

"But, surely," said Rasselas, "the wise men, to whom we listen with reverence and wonder, chose that mode of life for themselves which they thought most likely to make them happy."

"Very few," said the poet, "live by choice. Every man is placed in his present condition by causes which acted without his foresight, and with which he did not always willingly cooperate; and therefore you will rarely meet one who does not think the lot of his neighbor better than his own."

"I am pleased to think," said the prince, "that my birth has given me at least one advantage over others, by enabling me to determine for myself. I have here the world before me. I will review it at leisure; surely happiness is somewhere to be found."

Chapter 17. The Prince Associates with Young Men of Spirit and Gaiety

Rasselas rose next day, and resolved to begin his experiments upon life. "Youth," cried he, "is the time of gladness: I will join myself to the young men, whose only business is to gratify their desires, and whose time is all spent in a succession of enjoyments."

To such societies he was readily admitted, but a few days brought him back weary and disgusted. Their mirth was without images,<sup>3</sup> their laughter without motive; their pleasures were gross and sensual, in which the mind had no part; their conduct was at once wild and mean; they laughed at order and at law, but the frown of power dejected, and the eye of wisdom abashed them.

The prince soon concluded, that he should never be happy in a course of life of which he was ashamed. He thought it unsuitable to a reasonable being to act without a plan, and to be sad or cheerful only by chance. "Happiness," said he, "must be something solid and permanent, without fear and without uncertainty."

But his young companions had gained so much of his regard by their frankness and courtesy, that he could not leave them without warning and remonstrance. "My friends," said he, "I have seriously considered our manners and our prospects, and find that we have mistaken our own interest. The first years of man must make provision for the last. He that never thinks never can be wise. Perpetual levity must end in ignorance; and intemperance, though it may fire the spirits for an hour, will make life short or miserable. Let us consider that youth is of no long duration, and that in maturer age, when the enchantments of fancy shall cease, and phantoms of delight dance no more about us, we shall have no comforts but the esteem of wise men, and the means of doing good. Let us, therefore, stop, while to stop is in our power: let us live as men who are sometime to grow old, and to whom it will be the most dreadful of all evils not to count their past years but by follies, and to be reminded of their former luxuriance of health only by the maladies which riot has produced."

They stared a while in silence one upon another, and, at last, drove him away by a general chorus of continued laughter.

The consciousness that his sentiments were just, and his intentions kind, was scarcely sufficient to support him against the horror of derision. But he recovered his tranquillity, and pursued his search.

Chapter 18. *The Prince Finds a Wise and Happy Man

As he was one day walking in the street, he saw a spacious building which all were, by the open doors, invited to enter: he followed the stream of people, and found it a hall or school of declamation, in which professors read lectures to their auditory.<sup>4</sup> He fixed his eye upon a sage raised above the rest, who discoursed with great energy on the government of the passions. His look was venerable, his action graceful, his pronunciation clear, and his diction elegant. He showed with great strength of sentiment and variety of illustration that human nature is degraded and debased, when the lower faculties predominate over the higher; that when fancy, the parent of passion, usurps the dominion of the mind, nothing ensues but the natural effect of unlawful government, perturbation, and confusion; that she betrays the fortresses of the intellect to rebels, and excites her children to sedition against reason, their lawful sovereign. He compared reason to the sun, of which the light is constant, uniform and lasting; and fancy to a meteor, of bright but transitory luster, irregular in its motion, and delusive in its direction.

He then communicated the various precepts given from time to time for the conquest of passion, and displayed the happiness of those who had obtained the important victory, after which man is no longer the slave of fear, nor the fool of hope; is no more emaciated by envy, inflamed by anger, emasculated by tenderness, or depressed by grief; but walks on calmly through the tumults or the privacies of life, as the sun pursues alike his course through the calm or the stormy sky.

He enumerated many examples of heroes immovable by pain or pleasure, who looked with indifference on those modes or accidents to which the vulgar give the names of good and evil. He exhorted his hearers to lay aside their prejudices, and arm themselves against the shafts of malice or misfortune, by invulnerable patience; concluding that this state only was happiness, and that this happiness was in everyone's power.

Rasselas listened to him with the veneration due to the instructions of a superior being, and, waiting for him at the door, humbly implored the liberty of visiting so great a master of true wisdom. The lecturer hesitated a moment, when Rasselas put a purse of gold into his hand, which he received with a mixture of joy and wonder.

"I have found," said the prince at his return to Imlac, "a man who can teach all that is necessary to be known; who, from the unshaken throne of rational fortitude, looks down on the scenes of life changing beneath him. He speaks, and attention watches his lips. He reasons, and conviction closes his periods.<sup>5</sup> This man shall be my future guide; I will learn his doctrines, and imitate his life."

"Be not too hasty," said Imlac, "to trust or to admire the teachers of morality: they discourse like angels, but they live like men."

Rasselas, who could not conceive how any man could reason so forcibly without feeling the cogency of his own arguments, paid his visit in a few days, and was denied admission. He had now learned the power of money, and made his way by a piece of gold to the inner apartment, where he found the philosopher in a room half darkened, with his eyes misty and his face pale. "Sir," said he, "you are come at a time when all human friendship is useless; what I suffer cannot be remedied, what I have lost cannot be supplied. My daughter, my only daughter, from whose tenderness I expected all the comforts of my age, died last night of a fever. My views, my purposes, my hopes are at an end; I am now a lonely being, disunited from society."

"Sir," said the prince, "mortality is an event by which a wise man can never be surprised; we know that death is always near, and it should therefore always be expected." "Young man," answered the philosopher, "you speak like one that has never felt the pangs of separation." "Have you then forgot the precepts," said Rasselas, "which you so powerfully enforced? Has wisdom no strength to arm the heart against calamity? Consider that external things are naturally variable, but truth and reason are always the same." "What comfort," said the mourner, "can truth and reason afford me? Of what effect are they now, but to tell me that my daughter will not be restored?"

The prince, whose humanity would not suffer him to insult misery with reproof, went away, convinced of the emptiness of rhetorical sound, and the inefficacy of polished periods and studied sentences.<sup>6</sup>

Chapter 19. A Glimpse of Pastoral Life

He was still eager upon the same inquiry; and having heard of a hermit that lived near the lowest cataract of the Nile, and filled the whole country with the fame of his sanctity, resolved to visit his retreat, and inquire whether that felicity which public life could not afford was to be found in solitude; and whether a man whose age and virtue made him venerable could teach any peculiar art of shunning evils, or enduring them.

Imlac and the princess agreed to accompany him, and, after the necessary preparations, they began their journey. Their way lay through fields, where shepherds tended their flocks and the lambs were playing upon the pasture. "This," said the poet, "is the life which has been often celebrated for its innocence and quiet; let us pass the heat of the day among the shepherds' tents, and know whether all our searches are not to terminate in pastoral simplicity."

The proposal pleased them, and they induced the shepherds, by small presents and familiar questions, to tell their opinion of their own state. They were so rude and ignorant, so little able to compare the good with the evil of the occupation, and so indistinct in their narratives and descriptions, that very little could be learned from them. But it was evident that their hearts were cankered with discontent; that they considered themselves as condemned to labor for the luxury of the rich, and looked up with stupid malevolence toward those that were placed above them.

The princess pronounced with vehemence that she would never suffer these envious savages to be her companions, and that she should not soon be desirous of seeing any more specimens of rustic happiness; but could not believe that all the accounts of primeval pleasures were fabulous,<sup>7</sup> and was yet in doubt whether life had anything that could be justly preferred to the placid gratifications of fields and woods. She hoped that the time would come, when, with a few virtuous and elegant companions, she could gather flowers planted by her own hand, fondle the lambs of her own ewe, and listen, without care, among brooks and breezes, to one of her maidens reading in the shade.

Chapter 20. *The Danger of Prosperity

On the next day they continued their journey, till the heat compelled them to look round for shelter. At a small distance they saw a thick wood, which they no sooner entered than they perceived that they were approaching the habitations of men. The shrubs were diligently cut away to open walks where the shades were darkest; the boughs of opposite trees were artificially interwoven; seats of flowery turf were raised in vacant spaces, and a rivulet, that wantoned along the side of a winding path, had its banks sometimes opened into small basins, and its stream sometimes obstructed by little mounds of stone heaped together to increase its murmurs.

They passed slowly through the wood, delighted with such unexpected accommodations, and entertained each other with conjecturing what, or who, he could be, that, in those rude and unfrequented regions, had leisure and art for such harmless luxury.

As they advanced, they heard the sound of music, and saw youths and virgins dancing in the grove; and, going still further, beheld a stately palace built upon a hill surrounded with woods. The laws of eastern hospitality allowed them to enter, and the master welcomed them like a man liberal and wealthy.

He was skilful enough in appearances soon to discern that they were no common guests, and spread his table with magnificence. The eloquence of Imlac caught his attention, and the lofty courtesy of the princess excited his respect. When they offered to depart he entreated their stay, and was the next day still more unwilling to dismiss them than before. They were easily persuaded to stop, and civility grew up in time to freedom and confidence.

The prince now saw all the domestics cheerful, and all the face of nature smiling round the place, and could not forbear to hope that he should find here what he was seeking; but when he was congratulating the master upon his possessions, he answered with a sigh, "My condition has indeed the appearance of happiness, but appearances are delusive. My prosperity puts my life in danger; the Bassa<sup>8</sup> of Egypt is my enemy, incensed only by my wealth and popularity. I have been hitherto protected against him by the princes of the country; but, as the favor of the great is uncertain, I know not how soon my defenders may be persuaded to share the plunder with the Bassa. I have sent my treasures into a distant country, and, upon the first alarm, am prepared to follow them. Then will my enemies riot in my mansion, and enjoy the gardens which I have planted.”

They all joined in lamenting his danger, and deprecating his exile; and the princess was so much disturbed with the tumult of grief and indignation, that she retired to her apartment. They continued with their kind inviter a few days longer, and then went forward to find the hermit.

Chapter 21. The Happiness of Solitude. The Hermit's History

They came on the third day, by the direction of the peasants, to the hermit's cell: it was a cavern in the side of a mountain, overshadowed with palm-trees; at such a distance from the cataract, that nothing more was heard than a gentle uniform murmur, such as composed the mind to pensive meditation, especially when it was assisted by the wind whistling among the branches. The first rude essay of nature had been so much improved by human labor, that the cave contained several apartments, appropriated to different uses, and often afforded lodging to travelers, whom darkness or tempests happened to overtake.

The hermit sat on a bench at the door, to enjoy the coolness of the evening. On one side lay a book with pens and papers, on the other mechanical instruments of various kinds. As they approached him unregarded, the princess observed that he had not the countenance of a man that had found, or could teach, the way to happiness.

They saluted him with great respect, which he repaid like a man not unaccustomed to the forms of courts. "My children," said he, "if you have lost your way, you shall be willingly supplied with such conveniencies for the night as this cavern will afford. I have all that nature requires, and you will not expect delicacies in a hermit's cell."

They thanked him, and, entering, were pleased with the neatness and regularity of the place. The hermit set flesh and wine before them, though he fed only upon fruits and water. His discourse was cheerful without levity, and pious without enthusiasm.<sup>9</sup> He soon gained the esteem of his guests, and the princess repented of her hasty censure.

At last Imlac began thus: "I do not now wonder that your reputation is so far extended; we have heard at Cairo of your wisdom, and came hither to implore your direction for this young man and maiden in the choice of life."

"To him that lives well," answered the hermit, "every form of life is good; nor can I give any other rule for choice, than to remove from all apparent evil."

"He will remove most certainly from evil," said the prince, "who shall devote himself to that solitude which you have recommended by your example."

"I have indeed lived fifteen years in solitude," said the hermit, "but have no desire that my example should gain any imitators. In my youth I professed arms, and was raised by degrees to the highest military rank. I have traversed wide countries at the head of my troops, and seen many battles and sieges. At last, being disgusted by the preferment of a younger officer, and feeling that my vigor was beginning to decay, I resolved to close my life in peace, having found the world full of snares, discord, and misery. I had once escaped from the pursuit of the enemy by the shelter of this cavern, and therefore chose it for my final residence. I employed artificers to form it into chambers, and stored it with all that I was likely to want.

"For some time after my retreat, I rejoiced like a tempest-beaten sailor at his entrance into the harbor, being delighted with the sudden change of the noise and hurry of war, to stillness and repose. When the pleasure of novelty went away, I employed my hours in examining the plants which grow in the valley, and the minerals which I collected from the rocks. But that inquiry is now grown tasteless and irksome. I have been for some time unsettled and distracted: my mind is disturbed with a thousand perplexities of doubt, and vanities of imagination, which hourly prevail upon me, because I have no opportunities of relaxation or diversion. I am sometimes ashamed to think that I could not secure myself from vice, but by retiring from the exercise of virtue, and begin to suspect that I was rather impelled by resentment, than led by devotion, into solitude. My fancy riots in scenes of folly, and I lament that I have lost so much, and have gained so little. In solitude, if I escape the example of bad men, I want likewise the counsel and conversation of the good. I have been long comparing the evils with the advantages of society, and resolve to return into the world tomorrow. The life of a solitary man will be certainly miserable, but not certainly devout."

They heard his resolution with surprise, but, after a short pause, offered to conduct him to Cairo. He dug up a considerable treasure which he had hid among the rocks, and accompanied them to the city, on which, as he approached it, he gazed with rapture.

Chapter 22. *The Happiness of a Life Led according to Nature

Rasselas went often to an assembly of learned men, who met at stated times to unbend their minds and compare their opinions. Their manners were somewhat coarse, but their conversation was instructive, and their disputations acute, though sometimes too violent, and often continued till neither controvertist remembered upon what question they began. Some faults were almost general among them; everyone was desirous to dictate to the rest, and everyone was pleased to hear the genius or knowledge of another depreciated.

In this assembly Rasselas was relating his interview with the hermit, and the wonder with which he heard him censure a course of life which he had so deliberately chosen, and so laudably followed. The sentiments of the hearers were various. Some were of opinion that the folly of his choice had been justly punished by condemnation to perpetual perseverance. One of the youngest among them, with great vehemence, pronounced him an hypocrite. Some talked of the right of society to the labor of individuals, and considered retirement as a desertion of duty. Others readily allowed that there was a time when the claims of the public were satisfied, and when a man might properly sequester himself, to review his life and purify his heart.

One, who appeared more affected with the narrative than the rest, thought it likely that the hermit would in a few years go back to his retreat, and perhaps, if shame did not restrain, or death intercept him, return once more from his retreat into the world. "For the hope of happiness," said he, "is so strongly impressed that the longest experience is not able to efface it. Of the present state, whatever it be, we feel and are forced to confess the misery; yet when the same state is again at a distance, imagination paints it as desirable. But the time will surely come when desire will be no longer our torment, and no man shall be wretched but by his own fault."

"This," said a philosopher who had heard him with tokens of great impatience, "is the present condition of a wise man. The time is already come when none are wretched but by their own fault. Nothing is more idle than to inquire after happiness, which nature has kindly placed within our reach. The way to be happy is to live according to nature, in obedience to that universal and unalterable law with which every heart is originally impressed; which is not written on it by precept, but engraven by destiny, not instilled by education, but infused at our nativity. He that lives according to nature will suffer nothing from the delusions of hope, or importunities of desire; he will receive and reject with equability of temper, and act or suffer as the reason of things shall alternately prescribe. Other men may amuse themselves with subtle definitions, or intricate ratiocination. Let them learn to be wise by easier means; let them observe the hind of the forest, and the linnet of the grove; let them consider the life of animals, whose motions are regulated by instinct; they obey their guide, and are happy. Let us therefore, at length, cease to dispute, and learn to live; throw away the encumbrance of precepts, which they who utter them with so much pride and pomp do not understand, and carry with us this simple and intelligible maxim, that deviation from nature is deviation from happiness."

When he had spoken, he looked round him with a placid air, and enjoyed the consciousness of his own beneficence. "Sir," said the prince with great modesty, "as I, like all the rest of mankind, am desirous of felicity, my closest attention has been fixed upon your discourse. I doubt not the truth of a position which a man so learned has so confidently advanced. Let me only know what it is to live according to nature."

"When I find young men so humble and so docile," said the philosopher, "I can deny them no information which my studies have enabled me to afford. To live according to nature, is to act always with due regard to the fitness arising from the relations and qualities of causes and effects; to concur with the great and unchangeable scheme of universal felicity; to co-operate with the general disposition and tendency of the present system of things."

The prince soon found that this was one of the sages whom he should understand less as he heard him longer. He therefore bowed and was silent; and the philosopher, supposing him satisfied, and the rest vanquished, rose up and departed with the air of a man that had co-operated with the present system.

Chapter 23. *The Prince and His Sister Divide between Them the Work of Observation

Rasselas returned home full of reflections, doubtful how to direct his future steps. Of the way to happiness he found the learned and simple equally ignorant; but, as he was yet young, he flattered himself that he had time remaining for more experiments, and further inquiries. He communicated to Imlac his observations and his doubts, but was answered by him with new doubts, and remarks that gave him no comfort. He therefore discoursed more frequently and freely with his sister, who had yet the same hope with himself, and always assisted him to give some reason why, though he had been hitherto frustrated, he might succeed at last.

"We have hitherto," said she, "known but little of the world: we have never yet been either great or mean. In our own country, though we had royalty, we had no power, and in this we have not yet seen the private recesses of domestic peace. Imlac favors not our search, lest we should in time find him mistaken. We will divide the task between us: you shall try what is to be found in the splendor of courts, and I will range the shades of humbler life. Perhaps command and authority may be the supreme blessings, as they afford most opportunities of doing good: or, perhaps, what this world can give may be found in the modest habitations of middle fortune; too low for great designs, and too high for penury and distress."

Chapter 24. The Prince Examines the Happiness of High Stations

Rasselas applauded the design, and appeared next day with a splendid retinue at the court of the Bassa. He was soon distinguished for his magnificence, and admitted, as a prince whose curiosity had brought him from distant countries, to an intimacy with the great officers, and frequent conversation with the Bassa himself.

He was at first inclined to believe, that the man must be pleased with his own condition, whom all approached with reverence, and heard with obedience, and who had the power to extend his edicts to a whole kingdom. "There can be no pleasure," said he, "equal to that of feeling at once the joy of thousands all made happy by wise administration. Yet, since, by the law of subordination, this sublime delight can be in one nation but the lot of one, it is surely reasonable to think that there is some satisfaction more popular<sup>1</sup> and accessible, and that millions can hardly be subjected to the will of a single man, only to fill his particular breast with incommunicable content."

These thoughts were often in his mind, and he found no solution of the difficulty. But as presents and civilities gained him more familiarity, he found that almost every man who stood high in employment hated all the rest, and was hated by them, and that their lives were a continual succession of plots and detections, stratagems and escapes, faction and treachery. Many of those, who surrounded the Bassa, were sent only to watch and report his conduct; every tongue was muttering censure and every eye was searching for a fault.

At last the letters of revocation arrived, the Bassa was carried in chains to Constantinople, and his name was mentioned no more.

"What are we now to think of the prerogatives of power," said Rasselas to his sister; "is it without any efficacy to good? or, is the subordinate degree only dangerous, and the supreme safe and glorious? Is the Sultan the only happy man in his dominions? or, is the Sultan himself subject to the torments of suspicion, and the dread of enemies?”

In a short time the second Bassa was deposed. The Sultan, that had advanced him, was murdered by the Janisaries,<sup>2</sup> and his successor had other views and different favorites.

Chapter 25. *The Princess Pursues Her Inquiry with More Diligence Than Success

The princess, in the mean time, insinuated herself into many families; for there are few doors, through which liberality, joined with good humor, cannot find its way. The daughters of many houses were airy<sup>3</sup> and cheerful, but Nekayah had been too long accustomed to the conversation of Imlac and her brother to be much pleased with childish levity and prattle which had no meaning. She found their thoughts narrow, their wishes low, and their merriment often artificial. Their pleasures, poor as they were, could not be preserved pure, but were embittered by petty competitions and worthless emulation. They were always jealous of the beauty of each other; of a quality to which solicitude can add nothing, and from which detraction can take nothing away. Many were in love with triflers like themselves, and many fancied that they were in love when in truth they were only idle. Their affection was seldom fixed on sense or virtue, and therefore seldom ended but in vexation. Their grief, however, like their joy, was transient; everything floated in their mind unconnected with the past or future, so that one desire easily gave way to another, as a second stone cast into the water effaces and confounds the circles of the first.

With these girls she played as with inoffensive animals, and found them proud of her countenance,<sup>4</sup> and weary of her company.

But her purpose was to examine more deeply, and her affability easily persuaded the hearts that were swelling with sorrow to discharge their secrets in her ear: and those whom hope flattered, or prosperity delighted, often courted her to partake their pleasures.

The princess and her brother commonly met in the evening in a private summer-house on the bank of the Nile, and related to each other the occurrences of the day. As they were sitting together, the princess cast her eyes upon the river that flowed before her.

"Answer," said she, "great father of waters, thou that rollest thy floods through eighty nations, to the invocations of the daughter of thy native king. Tell me if thou waterest, through all thy course, a single habitation from which thou dost not hear the murmurs of complaint?"

"You are then," said Rasselas, "not more successful in private houses than I have been in courts." "I have, since the last partition of our provinces,"<sup>5</sup> said the princess, "enabled myself to enter familiarly into many families, where there was the fairest show of prosperity and peace, and know not one house that is not haunted by some fury that destroys its quiet.

"I did not seek ease among the poor, because I concluded that there it could not be found. But I saw many poor whom I had supposed to live in affluence. Poverty has, in large cities, very different appearances: it is often concealed in splendor, and often in extravagance. It is the care of a very great part of mankind to conceal their indigence from the rest: they support themselves by temporary expedients, and every day is lost in contriving for the morrow.

"This, however, was an evil, which, though frequent, I saw with less pain, because I could relieve it. Yet some have refused my bounties; more offended with my quickness to detect their wants, than pleased with my readiness to succor them: and others, whose exigencies compelled them to admit my kindness, have never been able to forgive their benefactress. Many, however, have been sincerely grateful without the ostentation of gratitude, or the hope of other favors."

Chapter 26. *The Princess Continues Her Remarks upon Private Life

Nekayah, perceiving her brother's attention fixed, proceeded in her narrative.

"In families where there is or is not poverty, there is commonly discord. If a kingdom be, as Imlac tells us, a great family, a family likewise is a little kingdom, torn with factions and exposed to revolutions. An unpracticed observer expects the love of parents and children to be constant and equal; but this kindness seldom continues beyond the years of infancy: in a short time the children become rivals to their parents. Benefits are allayed<sup>6</sup> by reproaches, and gratitude debased by envy.

"Parents and children seldom act in concert; each child endeavors to appropriate the esteem or fondness of the parents, and the parents, with yet less temptation, betray each other to their children. Thus, some place their confidence in the father, and some in the mother, and by degrees the house is filled with artifices and feuds.

"The opinions of children and parents, of the young and the old, are naturally opposite, by the contrary effects of hope and despondence, of expectation and experience, without crime or folly on either side. The colors of life in youth and age appear different, as the face of nature in spring and winter. And how can children credit the assertions of parents, which their own eyes show them to be false?

"Few parents act in such a manner as much to enforce their maxims by the credit of their lives. The old man trusts wholly to slow contrivance and gradual progression; the youth expects to force his way by genius, vigor, and precipitance. The old man pays regard to riches, and the youth reverences virtue. The old man deifies prudence; the youth commits himself to magnanimity and chance. The young man, who intends no ill, believes that none is intended, and therefore acts with openness and candor; but his father, having suffered the injuries of fraud, is impelled to suspect, and too often allured to practice it. Age looks with anger on the temerity of youth, and youth with contempt on the scrupulosity<sup>2</sup> of age. Thus parents and children, for the greatest part, live on to love less and less; and, if those whom nature has thus closely united are the torments of each other, where shall we look for tenderness and consolation?"

"Surely," said the prince, "you must have been unfortunate in your choice of acquaintance: I am unwilling to believe that the most tender of all relations is thus impeded in its effects by natural necessity."

"Domestic discord," answered she, "is not inevitably and fatally necessary, but yet is not easily avoided. We seldom see that a whole family is virtuous; the good and evil cannot well agree, and the evil can yet less agree with one another. Even the virtuous fall sometimes to variance, when their virtues are of different kinds, and tending to extremes. In general, those parents have most reverence who most deserve it; for he that lives well cannot be despised.

"Many other evils infest private life. Some are the slaves of servants whom they have trusted with their affairs. Some are kept in continual anxiety to the caprice of rich relations, whom they cannot please, and dare not offend. Some husbands are imperious, and some wives perverse; and, as it is always more easy to do evil than good, though the wisdom or virtue of one can very rarely make many happy, the folly or vice of one may often make many miserable."

"If such be the general effect of marriage," said the prince, "I shall for the future think it dangerous to connect my interest with that of another, lest I should be unhappy by my partner's fault."

"I have met," said the princess, "with many who live single for that reason; but I never found that their prudence ought to raise envy. They dream away their time without friendship, without fondness, and are driven to rid themselves of the day, for which they have no use, by childish amusements, or vicious delights. They act as beings under the constant sense of some known inferiority that fills their minds with rancor, and their tongues with censure. They are peevish at home, and malevolent abroad; and, as the outlaws of human nature, make it their business and their pleasure to disturb that society which debars them from its privileges. To live without feeling or exciting sympathy, to be fortunate without adding to the felicity of others, or afflicted without tasting the balm of pity, is a state more gloomy than solitude; it is not retreat but exclusion from mankind. Marriage has many pains, but celibacy has no pleasures."

"What then is to be done?" said Rasselas; "the more we inquire, the less we can resolve. Surely he is most likely to please himself that has no other inclination to regard."

Chapter 27. Disquisition upon Greatness

The conversation had a short pause. The prince, having considered his sister's observations, told her, that she had surveyed life with prejudice, and supposed misery where she did not find it. "Your narrative," says he, "throws yet a darker gloom upon the prospects of futurity: the predictions of Imlac were but faint sketches of the evils painted by Nekayah. I have been lately, convinced that quiet is not the daughter of grandeur, or of power: that her presence is not to be bought by wealth, nor enforced by conquest. It is evident, that as any man acts in a wider compass, he must be more exposed to opposition from enmity or miscarriage from chance; whoever has many to please or to govern, must use the ministry of many agents, some of whom will be wicked, and some ignorant; by some he will be misled, and by others betrayed. If he gratifies one he will offend another: those that are not favored will think themselves injured; and, since favors can be conferred but upon few, the greater number will be always discontented."

"The discontent," said the princess, "which is thus unreasonable, I hope that I shall always have spirit to despise, and you, power to repress."

"Discontent," answered Rasselas, "will not always be without reason under the most just or vigilant administration of public affairs. None, however attentive, can always discover that merit which indigence or faction may happen to obscure; and none, however powerful, can always reward it. Yet, he that sees inferior desert<sup>8</sup> advanced above him, will naturally impute that preference to partiality or caprice; and, indeed, it can scarcely be hoped that any man, however magnanimous by nature, or exalted by condition, will be able to persist for ever in fixed and inexorable justice of distribution: he will sometimes indulge his own affections, and sometimes those of his favorites; he will permit some to please him who can never serve him; he will discover in those whom he loves qualities which in reality they do not possess; and to those, from whom he receives pleasure, he will in his turn endeavor to give it.

Thus will recommendations sometimes prevail which were purchased by money, or by the more destructive bribery of flattery and servility.

"He that has much to do will do something wrong, and of that wrong must suffer the consequences; and, if it were possible that he should always act rightly, yet when such numbers are to judge of his conduct, the bad will censure and obstruct him by malevolence, and the good sometimes by mistake.

"The highest stations cannot therefore hope to be the abodes of happiness, which I would willingly believe to have fled from thrones and palaces to seats of humble privacy and placid obscurity. For what can hinder the satisfaction, or intercept the expectations, of him whose abilities are adequate to his employments, who sees with his own eyes the whole circuit of his influence, who chooses by his own knowledge all whom he trusts, and whom none are tempted to deceive by hope or fear? Surely he has nothing to do but to love and to be loved, to be virtuous and to be happy."

"Whether perfect happiness would be procured by perfect goodness," said Nekayah, "this world will never afford an opportunity of deciding. But this, at least, may be maintained, that we do not always find visible happiness in proportion to visible virtue. All natural and almost all political evils, are incident alike to the bad and good: they are confounded in the misery of a famine, and not much distinguished in the fury of a faction; they sink together in a tempest, and are driven together from their country by invaders. All that virtue can afford is quietness of conscience, a steady prospect of a happier state; this may enable us to endure calamity with patience; but remember that patience must suppose pain."

Chapter 28. *Rasselas and Nekayah Continue Their Conversation

"Dear princess," said Rasselas, "you fall into the common errors of exaggeratory declamation, by producing, in a familiar disquisition,<sup>9</sup> examples of national calamities, and scenes of extensive misery, which are found in books rather than in the world, and which, as they are horrid, are ordained to be rare. Let us not imagine evils which we do not feel, nor injure life by misrepresentations. I cannot bear that querulous eloquence which threatens every city with a siege like that of Jerusalem,<sup>1</sup> that makes famine attend on every flight of locusts, and suspends pestilence on the wing of every blast that issues from the south.

"On necessary and inevitable evils, which overwhelm kingdoms at once, all disputation is vain: when they happen they must be endured. But it is evident, that these bursts of universal distress are more dreaded than felt: thousands and ten thousands flourish in youth, and wither in age, without the knowledge of any other than domestic evils, and share the same pleasures and vexations whether their kings are mild or cruel, whether the armies of their country pursue their enemies, or retreat before them. While courts are disturbed with intestine<sup>2</sup> competitions, and ambassadors are negotiating in foreign countries, the smith still plies his anvil, and the husbandman drives his plow forward; the necessaries of life are required and obtained, and the successive business of the seasons continues to make its wonted revolutions.

"Let us cease to consider what, perhaps, may never happen, and what, when it shall happen, will laugh at human speculation. We will not endeavor to modify the motions of the elements, or to fix the destiny of kingdoms. It is our business to consider what beings like us may perform; each laboring for his own happiness, by promoting within his circle, however narrow, the happiness of others.

"Marriage is evidently the dictate of nature; men and women were made to be companions of each other, and therefore I cannot be persuaded but that marriage is one of the means of happiness."

"I know not," said the princess, "whether marriage be more than one of the innumerable modes of human misery. When I see and reckon the various forms of connubial infelicity, the unexpected causes of lasting discord, the diversities of temper, the oppositions of opinion, the rude collisions of contrary desire where both are urged by violent impulses, the obstinate contests of disagreeing virtues, where both are supported by consciousness of good intention, I am sometimes disposed to think with the severer casuists of most nations, that marriage is rather permitted than approved, and that none, but by the instigation of a passion too much indulged, entangle themselves with indissoluble compacts."

"You seem to forget," replied Rasselas, "that you have, even now, represented celibacy as less happy than marriage. Both conditions may be bad, but they cannot both be worst. Thus it happens when wrong opinions are entertained, that they mutually destroy each other, and leave the mind open to truth."

"I did not expect," answered the princess, "to hear that imputed to falsehood which is the consequence only of frailty. To the mind, as to the eye, it is difficult to compare with exactness objects vast in their extent, and various in their parts. Where we see or conceive the whole at once we readily note the discriminations and decide the preference: but of two systems, of which neither can be surveyed by any human being in its full compass of magnitude and multiplicity of complication, where is the wonder, that judging of the whole by parts, I am alternately affected by one and the other as either presses on my memory or fancy? We differ from ourselves just as we differ from each other, when we see only part of the question, as in the multifarious relations of politics and morality: but when we perceive the whole at once, as in numerical computations, all agree in one judgment, and none ever varies his opinion."

"Let us not add," said the prince, "to the other evils of life, the bitterness of controversy, nor endeavor to vie with each other in subtleties of argument. We are employed in a search, of which both are equally to enjoy the success, or suffer by the miscarriage. It is therefore fit that we assist each other. You surely conclude too hastily from the infelicity of marriage against its institution; will not the misery of life prove equally that life cannot be the gift of heaven? The world must be peopled by marriage, or peopled without it."

"How the world is to be peopled," returned Nekayah, "is not my care, and needs not be yours. I see no danger that the present generation should omit to leave successors behind them: we are not now inquiring for the world, but for ourselves."

Chapter 29. *The Debate on Marriage Continued

"The good of the whole," says Rasselas, "is the same with the good of all its parts. If marriage be best for mankind it must be evidently best for individuals, or a permanent and necessary duty must be the cause of evil, and some must be inevitably sacrificed to the convenience of others. In the estimate which you have made of the two states, it appears that the inconveniences of a single life are, in a great measure, necessary and certain, but those of the conjugal state accidental and avoidable.

"I cannot forbear to flatter myself that prudence and benevolence will make marriage happy. The general folly of mankind is the cause of general complaint. What can be expected but disappointment and repentance from a choice made in the immaturity of youth, in the ardor of desire, without judgment, without foresight, without inquiry after conformity of opinions, similarity of manners, rectitude of judgment, or purity of sentiment.

"Such is the common process of marriage. A youth and maiden meeting by chance, or brought together by artifice, exchange glances, reciprocate civilities, go home, and dream of one another. Having little to divert attention, or diversify thought, they find themselves uneasy when they are apart, and therefore conclude that they shall be happy together. They marry, and discover what nothing but voluntary blindness had before concealed; they wear out life in altercations, and charge nature with cruelty.

"From those early marriages proceeds likewise the rivalry of parents and children: the son is eager to enjoy the world before the father is willing to forsake it, and there is hardly room at once for two generations. The daughter begins to bloom before the mother can be content to fade, and neither can forbear to wish for the absence of the other.

"Surely all these evils may be avoided by that deliberation and delay which prudence prescribes to irrevocable choice. In the variety and jollity of youthful pleasures life may be well enough supported without the help of a partner. Longer time will increase experience, and wider views will allow better opportunities of inquiry and selection: one advantage, at least, will be certain; the parents will be visibly older than their children."

"What reason cannot collect," said Nekayah, "and what experiment has not yet taught, can be known only from the report of others. I have been told that late marriages are not eminently happy. This is a question too important to be neglected, and I have often proposed it to those, whose accuracy of remark, and comprehensiveness of knowledge, made their suffrages<sup>3</sup> worthy of regard. They have generally determined that it is dangerous for a man and woman to suspend their fate upon each other, at a time when opinions are fixed, and habits are established; when friendships have been contracted on both sides, when life has been planned into method, and the mind has long enjoyed the contemplation of its own prospects.

"It is scarcely possible that two traveling through the world under the conduct of chance should have been both directed to the same path, and it will not often happen that either will quit the track which custom has made pleasing. When the desultory levity of youth has settled into regularity, it is soon succeeded by pride ashamed to yield, or obstinacy delighting to contend. And even though mutual esteem produces mutual desire to please, time itself, as it modifies unchangeably the external mien, determines likewise the direction of the passions, and gives an inflexible rigidity to the manners. Long customs are not easily broken: he that attempts to change the course of his own life very often labors in vain; and how shall we do that for others which we are seldom able to do for ourselves?"

"But surely," interposed the prince, "you suppose the chief motive of choice forgotten or neglected. Whenever I shall seek a wife, it shall be my first question, whether she be willing to be led by reason?"

"Thus it is," said Nekayah, "that philosophers are deceived. There are a thousand familiar<sup>4</sup> disputes which reason never can decide; questions that elude investigation, and make logic ridiculous; cases where something must be done, and where little can be said.

Consider the state of mankind, and inquire how few can be supposed to act upon any occasions, whether small or great, with all the reasons of action present to their minds. Wretched would be the pair above all names of wretchedness, who should be doomed to adjust by reason every morning all the minute detail of a domestic day.

"Those who marry at an advanced age will probably escape the encroachments of their children; but, in diminution of this advantage, they will be likely to leave them, ignorant and helpless, to a guardian's mercy: or, if that should not happen, they must at least go out of the world before they see those whom they love best either wise or great.

"From their children, if they have less to fear, they have less also to hope, and they lose, without equivalent, the joys of early love, and the convenience of uniting with manners pliant and minds susceptible of new impressions, which might wear away their dissimilitudes by long cohabitation, as soft bodies, by continual attrition, conform their surfaces to each other.

"I believe it will be found that those who marry late are best pleased with their children, and those who marry early with their partners."

"The union of these two affections," said Rasselas, "would produce all that could be wished. Perhaps there is a time when marriage might unite them, a time neither too early for the father, nor too late for the husband."

"Every hour," answered the princess, "confirms my prejudice in favor of the position so often uttered by the mouth of Imlac, 'That nature sets her gifts on the right hand and on the left.' Those conditions, which flatter hope and attract desire, are so constituted that, as we approach one, we recede from another. There are goods so opposed that we cannot seize both, but, by too much prudence, may pass between them at too great a distance to reach either. This is often the fate of long consideration; he does nothing who endeavors to do more than is allowed to humanity. Flatter not yourself with contrarieties of pleasure. Of the blessings set before you make your choice, and be content. No man can taste the fruits of autumn, while he is delighting his scent with the flowers of the spring: no man can, at the same time, fill his cup from the source and from the mouth of the Nile.”

Chapter 30. Imlac Enters, and Changes the Conversation

Here Imlac entered, and interrupted them. "Imlac," said Rasselas, "I have been taking from the princess the dismal history of private life, and am almost discouraged from further search."

"It seems to me," said Imlac, "that while you are making the choice of life, you neglect to live. You wander about a single city, which, however large and diversified, can now afford few novelties, and forget that you are in a country, famous among the earliest monarchies for the power and wisdom of its inhabitants; a country where the sciences first dawned that illuminate the world, and beyond which the arts cannot be traced of civil society or domestic life.

"The old Egyptians have left behind them monuments of industry and power before which all European magnificence is confessed to fade away. The ruins of their architecture are the schools of modern builders, and from the wonders which time has spared we may conjecture, though uncertainly, what it has destroyed."

"My curiosity," said Rasselas, "does not very strongly lead me to survey piles of stone, or mounds of earth; my business is with man. I came hither not to measure fragments of temples, or trace choked aqueducts, but to look upon the various scenes of the present world."

"The things that are now before us," said the princess, "require attention, and deserve it. What have I to do with the heroes or the monuments of ancient times? with times which never can return, and heroes, whose form of life was different from all that the present condition of mankind requires or allows."

"To know anything," returned the poet, "we must know its effects; to see men we must see their works, that we may learn what reason has dictated, or passion has incited, and find what are the most powerful motives of action. To judge rightly of the present we must oppose it to the past; for all judgment is comparative, and of the future nothing can be known. The truth is, that no mind is much employed upon the present: recollection and anticipation fill up almost all our moments. Our passions are joy and grief, love and hatred, hope and fear. Of joy and grief the past is the object, and the future of hope and fear; even love and hatred respect the past, for the cause must have been before the effect.

"The present state of things is the consequence of the former, and it is natural to inquire what were the sources of the good that we enjoy, or of the evil that we suffer. If we act only for ourselves, to neglect the study of history is not prudent: if we are entrusted with the care of others, it is not just. Ignorance, when it is voluntary, is criminal; and he may properly be charged with evil who refused to learn how he might prevent it.

"There is no part of history so generally useful as that which relates the progress of the human mind, the gradual improvement of reason, the successive advances of science, the vicissitudes of learning and ignorance, which are the light and darkness of thinking beings, the extinction and resuscitation of arts, and all the revolutions of the intellectual world. If accounts of battles and invasions are peculiarly the business of princes, the useful or elegant arts are not to be neglected; those who have kingdoms to govern, have understandings to cultivate.

"Example is always more efficacious than precept. A soldier is formed in war, and a painter must copy pictures. In this, contemplative life has the advantage: great actions are seldom seen, but the labors of art are always at hand for those who desire to know what art has been able to perform.

"When the eye or the imagination is struck with any uncommon work the next transition of an active mind is to the means by which it was performed. Here begins the true use of such contemplation; we enlarge our comprehension by new ideas, and perhaps recover some art lost to mankind, or learn what is less perfectly known in our own country. At least we compare our own with former times, and either rejoice at our improvements, or, what is the first motion towards good, discover our defects."

"I am willing," said the prince, "to see all that can deserve my search." "And I," said the princess, "shall rejoice to learn something of the manners of antiquity.”

“The most pompous monument of Egyptian greatness, and one of the most bulky works of manual industry,” said Imlac, “are the pyramids; fabrics<sup>5</sup> raised before the time of history, and of which the earliest narratives afford us only uncertain traditions. Of these the greatest is still standing, very little injured by time.”

“Let us visit them tomorrow,” said Nekayah. “I have often heard of the pyramids, and shall not rest, till I have seen them within and without with my own eyes.”

Chapter 31. They Visit the Pyramids

The resolution being thus taken, they set out the next day. They laid tents upon their camels, being resolved to stay among the pyramids till their curiosity was fully satisfied. They traveled gently, turned aside to everything remarkable, stopped from time to time and conversed with the inhabitants, and observed the various appearances of towns ruined and inhabited, of wild and cultivated nature.

When they came to the great pyramid, they were astonished at the extent of the base, and the height of the top. Imlac explained to them the principles upon which the pyramidal form was chosen for a fabric intended to coextend its duration with that of the world; he showed that its gradual diminution gave it such stability as defeated all the common attacks of the elements, and could scarcely be overthrown by earthquakes themselves, the least resistible of natural violence. A concussion that should shatter the pyramid would threaten the dissolution of the continent.

They measured all its dimensions, and pitched their tents at its foot. Next day they prepared to enter its interior apartments, and having hired the common guides, climbed up to the first passage, when the favorite of the princess, looking into the cavity, stepped back and trembled. "Pekuah," said the princess, "of what art thou afraid?" "Of the narrow entrance," answered the lady, "and of the dreadful gloom. I dare not enter a place which must surely be inhabited by unquiet souls. The original possessors of these dreadful vaults will start up before us, and perhaps shut us in forever." She spoke, and threw her arms round the neck of her mistress.

"If all your fear be of apparitions," said the prince, "I will promise you safety. There is no danger from the dead; he that is once buried will be seen no more."

"That the dead are seen no more," said Imlac, "I will not undertake to maintain, against the concurrent and unvaried testimony of all ages, and of all nations. There is no people, rude or learned, among whom apparitions of the dead are not related and believed. This opinion, which perhaps prevails as far as human nature is diffused, could become universal only by its truth; those that never heard of one another would not have agreed in a tale which nothing but experience can make credible. That it is doubted by single cavilers can very little weaken the general evidence; and some who deny it with their tongues confess it by their fears.

"Yet I do not mean to add new terrors to those which have already seized upon Pekuah. There can be no reason why specters should haunt the pyramid more than other places, or why they should have power or will to hurt innocence and purity. Our entrance is no violation of their privileges; we can take nothing from them, how then can we offend them?"

"My dear Pekuah," said the princess, "I will always go before you, and Imlac shall follow you. Remember that you are the companion of the princess of Abyssinia."

"If the princess is pleased that her servant should die," returned the lady, "let her command some death less dreadful than enclosure in this horrid cavern. You know I dare not disobey you; I must go if you command me, but if I once enter, I never shall come back."

The princess saw that her fear was too strong for expostulation or reproof, and, embracing her, told her that she should stay in the tent till their return. Pekuah was yet not satisfied, but entreated the princess not to pursue so dreadful a purpose as that of entering the recesses of the pyramid. "Though I cannot teach courage," said Nekayah, "I must not learn cowardice, nor leave at last undone what I came hither only to do."

Chapter 32. They Enter the Pyramid

Pekuah descended to the tents, and the rest entered the pyramid. They passed through the galleries, surveyed the vaults of marble, and examined the chest in which the body of the founder is supposed to have been repositied. They then sat down in one of the most spacious chambers to rest a while before they attempted to return.

"We have now," said Imlac, "gratified our minds with an exact view of the greatest work of man, except the wall of China.

"Of the wall it is very easy to assign the motive. It secured a wealthy and timorous nation from the incursions of barbarians, whose unskillfulness in arts made it easier for them to supply their wants by rapine than by industry, and who from time to time poured in upon the habitations of peaceful commerce, as vultures descend upon domestic fowl. Their celerity and fierceness made the wall necessary, and their ignorance made it efficacious.

"But for the pyramids, no reason has ever been given adequate to the cost and labor of the work. The narrowness of the chambers proves that it could afford no retreat from enemies, and treasures might have been repositied at far less expense with equal security. It seems to have been erected only in compliance with that hunger of imagination which preys incessantly upon life, and must be always appeased by some employment. Those who have already all that they can enjoy must enlarge their desires. He that has built for use till use is supplied, must begin to build for vanity, and extend his plan to the utmost power of human performance, that he may not be soon reduced to form another wish.

"I consider this mighty structure as a monument of the insufficiency of human enjoyments. A king, whose power is unlimited, and whose treasures surmount all real and imaginary wants, is compelled to solace, by the erection of a pyramid, the satiety of dominion and tastelessness of pleasures, and to amuse the tediousness of declining life by seeing thousands laboring without end, and one stone, for no purpose, laid upon another. Whoever thou art, that, not content with a moderate condition, imaginest happiness in royal magnificence, and dreamest that command or riches can feed the appetite of novelty with perpetual gratifications, survey the pyramids, and confess thy folly!"

Chapter 33. *The Princess Meets with an Unexpected Misfortune

They rose up, and returned through the cavity at which they had entered, and the princess prepared for her favorite a long narrative of dark labyrinths, and costly rooms, and of the different impressions which the varieties of the way had made upon her. But when they came to their train, they found every one silent and dejected: the men discovered<sup>6</sup> shame and fear in their countenances, and the women were weeping in the tents.

What had happened they did not try to conjecture, but immediately inquired. "You had scarcely entered into the pyramid," said one of the attendants, "when a troop of Arabs rushed upon us: we were too few to resist them, and too slow to escape. They were about to search the tents, set us on our camels, and drive us along before them, when the approach of some Turkish horsemen put them to flight; but they seized the lady Pekuah with her two maids, and carried them away: the Turks are now pursuing them by our instigation, but I fear they will not be able to overtake them."

The princess was overpowered with surprise and grief. Rasselas, in the first heat of his resentment, ordered his servants to follow him, and prepared to pursue the robbers with his saber in his hand. "Sir," said Imlac, "what can you hope from violence or valor? the Arabs are mounted on horses trained to battle and retreat; we have only beasts of burden. By leaving our present station we may lose the princess, but cannot hope to regain Pekuah."

In a short time the Turks returned, having not been able to reach the enemy. The princess burst out into new lamentations, and Rasselas could scarcely forbear to reproach them with cowardice; but Imlac was of opinion, that the escape of the Arabs was no addition to their misfortune, for, perhaps, they would have killed their captives rather than have resigned them.

Chapter 34. They Return to Cairo without Pekuah

There was nothing to be hoped from longer stay. They returned to Cairo repenting of their curiosity, censuring the negligence of the government, lamenting their own rashness which had neglected to procure a guard, imagining many expedients by which the loss of Pekuah might have been prevented, and resolving to do something for her recovery, though none could find any thing proper to be done.

Nekayah retired to her chamber, where her women attempted to comfort her, by telling her that all had their troubles, and that lady Pekuah had enjoyed much happiness in the world for a long time, and might reasonably expect a change of fortune. They hoped that some good would befall her wheresoever she was, and that their mistress would find another friend who might supply her place.

The princess made them no answer, and they continued the form of condolence, not much grieved in their hearts that the favorite was lost.

Next day the prince presented to the Bassa a memorial<sup>7</sup> of the wrong which he had suffered, and a petition for redress. The Bassa threatened to punish the robbers, but did not attempt to catch them, nor, indeed, could any account or description be given by which he might direct the pursuit.

It soon appeared that nothing would be done by authority. Governors, being accustomed to hear of more crimes than they can punish, and more wrongs than they can redress, set themselves at ease by indiscriminate negligence, and presently<sup>8</sup> forget the request when they lose sight of the petitioner.

Imlac then endeavored to gain some intelligence by private agents. He found many who pretended to an exact knowledge of all the haunts of the Arabs, and to regular correspondence with their chiefs, and who readily undertook the recovery of Pekuah. Of these, some were furnished with money for their journey, and came back no more; some were liberally paid for accounts which a few days discovered to be false. But the princess would not suffer any means, however improbable, to be left untried. While she was doing something she kept her hope alive. As one expedient failed, another was suggested; when one messenger returned unsuccessful, another was dispatched to a different quarter.

Two months had now passed, and of Pekuah nothing had been heard; the hopes which they had endeavored to raise in each other grew more languid, and the princess, when she saw nothing more to be tried, sunk down inconsolable in hopeless dejection. A thousand times she reproached herself with the easy compliance by which she permitted her favorite to stay behind her. "Had not my fondness," said she, "lessened my authority, Pekuah had not dared to talk of her terrors. She ought to have feared me more than specters. A severe look would have overpowered her; a peremptory command would have compelled obedience. Why did foolish indulgence prevail upon me? Why did I not speak and refuse to hear?"

"Great princess," said Imlac, "do not reproach yourself for your virtue, or consider that as blameable by which evil has accidentally been caused. Your tenderness for the timidity of Pekuah was generous and kind. When we act according to our duty, we commit the event to him by whose laws our actions are governed, and who will suffer none to be finally punished for obedience. When, in prospect of some good, whether natural or moral, we break the rules prescribed us, we withdraw from the direction of superior wisdom, and take all consequences upon ourselves. Man cannot so far know the connection of causes and events, as that he may venture to do wrong in order to do right. When we pursue our end by lawful means, we may always console our miscarriage by the hope of future recompense. When we consult only our own policy, and attempt to find a nearer way to good, by overleaping the settled boundaries of right and wrong, we cannot be happy even by success, because we cannot escape the consciousness of our fault; but, if we miscarry, the disappointment is irremediably embittered. How comfortless is the sorrow of him, who feels at once the pangs of guilt, and the vexation of calamity which guilt has brought upon him?"

“Consider, princess, what would have been your condition, if the lady Pekuah had entreated to accompany you, and, being compelled to stay in the tents, had been carried away; or how would you have borne the thought, if you had forced her into the pyramid, and she had died before you in agonies of terror.”

“Had either happened,” said Nekayah, “I could not have endured life till now: I should have been tortured to madness by the remembrance of such cruelty, or must have pined away in abhorrence of myself.”

“This at least,” said Imlac, “is the present reward of virtuous conduct, that no unlucky consequence can oblige us to repent it.”

Chapter 35. *The Princess Languishes for Want of Pekuah

Nekayah, being thus reconciled to herself, found that no evil is insupportable but that which is accompanied with consciousness of wrong. She was, from that time, delivered from the violence of tempestuous sorrow, and sunk into silent pensiveness and gloomy tranquillity. She sat from morning to evening recollecting all that had been done or said by her Pekuah, treasured up with might recall to mind any little incident or careless conversation. The sentiments of her, whom she now expected to see no more, were treasured in her memory as rules of life, and she deliberated to no other end than to conjecture on any occasion what would have been the opinion and counsel of Pekuah.

The women, by whom she was attended, knew nothing of her real condition, and therefore she could not talk to them but with caution and reserve. She began to remit<sup>9</sup> her curiosity, having no great care to collect notions which she had no convenience of uttering. Rasselas endeavored first to comfort and afterwards to divert her; he hired musicians, to whom she seemed to listen, but did not hear them, and procured masters to instruct her in various arts, whose lectures, when they visited her again, were again to be repeated. She had lost her taste of pleasure and her ambition of excellence. And her mind, though forced into short excursions, always recurred to the image of her friend.

Imlac was every morning earnestly enjoined to renew his inquiries, and was asked every night whether he had yet heard of Pekuah, till not being able to return the princess the answer that she desired, he was less and less willing to come into her presence. She observed his backwardness, and commanded him to attend her. "You are not," said she, "to confound impatience with resentment, or to suppose that I charge you with negligence, because I repine at your unsuccessfulness. I do not much wonder at your absence; I know that the unhappy are never pleasing, and that all naturally avoid the contagion of misery. To hear complaints is wearisome alike to the wretched and the happy; for who would cloud by adventitious grief the short gleams of gaiety which life allows us? or who, that is struggling under his own evils, will add to them the miseries of another?

"The time is at hand, when none shall be disturbed any longer by the sighs of Nekayah: my search after happiness is now at an end. I am resolved to retire from the world with all its flatteries and deceits, and will hide myself in solitude, without any other care than to compose my thoughts, and regulate my hours by a constant succession of innocent occupations, till, with a mind purified from all earthly desires, I shall enter into that state, to which all are hastening, and in which I hope again to enjoy the friendship of Pekuah."

"Do not entangle your mind," said Imlac, "by irrevocable determinations, nor increase the burden of life by a voluntary accumulation of misery: the weariness of retirement will continue or increase when the loss of Pekuah is forgotten. That you have been deprived of one pleasure is no very good reason for rejection of the rest."

"Since Pekuah was taken from me," said the princess, "I have no pleasure to reject or to retain. She that has no one to love or trust has little to hope. She wants the radical principle of happiness. We may, perhaps, allow that what satisfaction this world can afford, must arise from the conjunction of wealth, knowledge and goodness: wealth is nothing but as it is bestowed, and knowledge nothing but as it is communicated: they must therefore be imparted to others, and to whom could I now delight to impart them? Goodness affords the only comfort which can be enjoyed without a partner, and goodness may be practised in retirement."

"How far solitude may admit goodness, or advance it, I shall not," replied Imlac, "dispute at present. Remember the confession of the pious hermit. You will wish to return into the world, when the image of your companion has left your thoughts." "That time," said Nekayah, "will never come. The generous frankness, the modest obsequiousness,<sup>1</sup> and the faithful secrecy of my dear Pekuah, will always be more missed, as I shall live longer to see vice and folly."

"The state of a mind oppressed with a sudden calamity," said Imlac, "is like that of the fabulous inhabitants of the new created earth, who, when the first night came upon them, supposed that day never would return. When the clouds of sorrow gather over us, we see nothing beyond them, nor can imagine how they will be dispelled: yet a new day succeeded to the night, and sorrow is never long without a dawn of ease. But they who restrain themselves from receiving comfort, do as the savages would have done, had they put out their eyes when it was dark. Our minds, like our bodies, are in continual flux; something is hourly lost, and something acquired. To lose much at once is inconvenient to either, but while the vital powers remain uninjured, nature will find the means of reparation. Distance has the same effect on the mind as on the eye, and while we glide along the stream of time, whatever we leave behind us is always lessening, and that which we approach increasing in magnitude. Do not suffer life to stagnate; it will grow muddy for want of motion: commit yourself again to the current of the world; Pekuah will vanish by degrees; you will meet in your way some other favorite, or learn to diffuse yourself in general conversation."

"At least," said the prince, "do not despair before all remedies have been tried: the inquiry after the unfortunate lady is still continued, and shall be carried on with yet greater diligence, on condition that you will promise to wait a year for the event, without any unalterable resolution."

Nekayah thought this a reasonable demand, and made the promise to her brother, who had been advised by Imlac to require it. Imlac had, indeed, no great hope of regaining Pekuah, but he supposed, that if he could secure the interval of a year, the princess would be then in no danger of a cloister.

Chapter 36. Pekuah Is Still Remembered. The Progress of Sorrow

Nekayah, seeing that nothing was omitted for the recovery of her favorite, and having, by her promise, set her intention of retirement at a distance, began imperceptibly to return to common cares and common pleasures. She rejoiced without her own consent at the suspension of her sorrows, and sometimes caught herself with indignation in the act of turning away her mind from the remembrance of her, whom yet she resolved never to forget.

She then appointed a certain hour of the day for meditation on the merits and fondness of Pekuah, and for some weeks retired constantly at the time fixed, and returned with her eyes swollen and her countenance clouded. By degrees she grew less scrupulous, and suffered any important and pressing avocation to delay the tribute of daily tears. She then yielded to less occasions; sometimes forgot what she was indeed afraid to remember, and, at last, wholly released herself from the duty of periodical affliction.

Her real love of Pekuah was yet not diminished. A thousand occurrences brought her back to memory, and a thousand wants, which nothing but the confidence of friendship can supply, made her frequently regretted. She, therefore, solicited Imlac never to desist from inquiry, and to leave no art of intelligence untried, that, at least, she might have the comfort of knowing that she did not suffer by negligence or sluggishness. "Yet what," said she, "is to be expected from our pursuit of happiness, when we find the state of life to be such, that happiness itself is the cause of misery? Why should we endeavor to attain that, of which the possession cannot be secured? I shall henceforward fear to yield my heart to excellence, however bright, or to fondness, however tender, lest I should lose again what I have lost in Pekuah."

Chapter 37. *The Princess Hears News of Pekuah

In seven months, one of the messengers, who had been sent away upon the day when the promise was drawn from the princess, returned, after many unsuccessful rambles, from the borders of Nubia, with an account that Pekuah was in the hands of an Arab chief, who possessed a castle or fortress on the extremity of Egypt. The Arab, whose revenue was plunder, was willing to restore her, with her two attendants, for two hundred ounces of gold.

The price was no subject of debate. The princess was in ecstasies when she heard that her favorite was alive, and might so cheaply be ransomed. She could not think of delaying for a moment Pekuah's happiness or her own, but entreated her brother to send back the messenger with the sum required. Imlac, being consulted, was not very confident of the veracity of the relator, and was still more doubtful of the Arab's faith, who might, if he were too liberally trusted, detain at once the money and the captives. He thought it dangerous to put themselves in the power of the Arab, by going into his district, and could not expect that the rover<sup>2</sup> would so much expose himself as to come into the lower country, where he might be seized by the forces of the Bassa.

It is difficult to negotiate where neither will trust. But Imlac, after some deliberation, directed the messenger to propose that Pekuah should be conducted by ten horsemen to the monastery of St. Anthony, which is situated in the deserts of Upper Egypt, where she should be met by the same number, and her ransom should be paid.

That no time might be lost, as they expected that the proposal would not be refused, they immediately began their journey to the monastery; and, when they arrived, Imlac went forward with the former messenger to the Arab's fortress. Rasselas was desirous to go with them, but neither his sister nor Imlac would consent. The Arab, according to the custom of his nation, observed the laws of hospitality with great exactness to those who put themselves into his power, and, in a few days, brought Pekuah with her maids, by easy journeys, to their place appointed, where receiving the stipulated price, he restored her with great respect to liberty and her friends, and undertook to conduct them back toward Cairo beyond all danger of robbery or violence.

The princess and her favorite embraced each other with transport too violent to be expressed, and went out together to pour the tears of tenderness in secret, and exchange professions of kindness and gratitude. After a few hours they returned into the refectory of the convent, where, in the presence of the prior and his brethren, the prince required of Pekuah the history of her adventures.

Chapter 38. The Adventures of the Lady Pekuah

"At what time, and in what manner, I was forced away," said Pekuah, "your servants have told you. The suddenness of the event struck me with surprise, and I was at first rather stupified than agitated with any passion of either fear or sorrow. My confusion was increased by the speed and tumult of our flight while we were followed by the Turks, who, as it seemed, soon despaired to overtake us, or were afraid of those whom they made a show of menacing.

"When the Arabs saw themselves out of danger they slackened their course, and, as I was less harassed by external violence, I began to feel more uneasiness in my mind. After some time we stopped near a spring shaded with trees in a pleasant meadow, where we were set upon the ground, and offered such refreshments as our masters were partaking. I was suffered to sit with my maids apart from the rest, and none attempted to comfort or insult us. Here I first began to feel the full weight of my misery. The girls sat weeping in silence, and from time to time looked on me for succor. I knew not to what condition we were doomed, nor could conjecture where would be the place of our captivity, or whence to draw any hope of deliverance. I was in the hands of robbers and savages, and had no reason to suppose that their pity was more than their justice, or that they would forbear the gratification of any ardor of desire, or caprice of cruelty. I, however, kissed my maids, and endeavored to pacify them by remarking, that we were yet treated with decency, and that, since we were now carried beyond pursuit, there was no danger of violence to our lives.

"When we were to be set again on horseback, my maids clung round me, and refused to be parted, but I commanded them not to irritate those who had us in their power. We traveled the remaining part of the day through an unfrequented and pathless country, and came by moonlight to the side of a hill, where the rest of the troop was stationed. Their tents were pitched, and their fires kindled, and our chief was welcomed as a man much beloved by his dependents.

"We were received into a large tent, where we found women who had attended their husbands in the expedition. They set before us the supper which they had provided, and I eat it rather to encourage my maids than to comply with any appetite of my own. When the meat was taken away they spread the carpets for repose. I was weary, and hoped to find in sleep that remission of distress which nature seldom denies. Ordering myself therefore to be undressed, I observed that the women looked very earnestly upon me, not expecting, I suppose, to see me so submissively attended. When my upper vest was taken off, they were apparently struck with the splendor of my clothes, and one of them timorously laid her hand upon the embroidery. She then went out, and, in a short time, came back with another woman, who seemed to be of higher rank, and greater authority. She did, at her entrance, the usual act of reverence, and, taking me by the hand, placed me in a smaller tent, spread with finer carpets, where I spent the night quietly with my maids.

"In the morning, as I was sitting on the grass, the chief of the troop came towards me: I rose up to receive him, and he bowed with great respect. 'Illustrious lady,' said he, 'my fortune is better than I had presumed to hope; I am told by my women that I have a princess in my camp.' 'Sir,' answered I, 'your women have deceived themselves and you; I am not a princess, but an unhappy stranger who intended soon to have left this country, in which I am now to be imprisoned for ever.' 'Whoever, or whencesoever, you are,' returned the Arab, 'your dress, and that of your servants, show your rank to be high, and your wealth to be great. Why should you, who can so easily procure your ransom, think yourself in danger of perpetual captivity? The purpose of my incursions is to increase my riches, or more properly to gather tribute. The sons of Ishmael<sup>3</sup> are the natural and hereditary lords of this part of the continent, which is usurped by late invaders, and low-born tyrants, from whom we are compelled to take by the sword what is denied to justice. The violence of war admits no distinction; the lance that is lifted at guilt and power will sometimes fall on innocence and gentleness.'

“‘How little,’ said I, ‘did I expect that yesterday it should have fallen upon me.’

“‘Misfortunes,’ answered the Arab, ‘should always be expected. If the eye of hostility could learn reverence or pity, excellence like yours had been exempt from injury. But the angels of affliction spread their toils alike for the virtuous and the wicked, for the mighty and the mean. Do not be disconsolate; I am not one of the lawless and cruel rovers of the desert; I know the rules of civil life: I will fix your ransom, give a passport to your messenger, and perform my stipulation with nice punctuality.’<sup>4</sup>

“You will easily believe that I was pleased with his courtesy; and finding that his predominant passion was desire of money, I began now to think my danger less, for I knew that no sum would be thought too great for the release of Pekuah. I told him that he should have no reason to charge me with ingratitude, if I was used with kindness, and that any ransom, which could be expected for a maid of common rank, would be paid, but that he must not persist to rate me as a princess. He said, he would consider what he should demand, and then, smiling, bowed and retired.

“Soon after the women came about me, each contending to be more officious<sup>5</sup> than the other, and my maids themselves were served with reverence. We traveled onward by short journeys. On the fourth day the chief told me, that my ransom must be two hundred ounces of gold, which I not only promised him, but told him, that I would add fifty more, if I and my maids were honorably treated.

“I never knew the power of gold before. From that time I was the leader of the troop. The march of every day was longer or shorter as I commanded, and the tents were pitched where I chose to rest. We now had camels and other conveniencies for travel, my own women were always at my side, and I amused myself with observing the manners of the vagrant nations,<sup>6</sup> and with viewing remains of ancient edifices with which these deserted countries appear to have been, in some distant age, lavishly embellished.

“The chief of the band was a man far from illiterate: he was able to travel by the stars or the compass, and had marked in his erratic expeditions such places as are most worthy the notice of a passenger.<sup>7</sup> He observed to me, that buildings are always best preserved in places little frequented, and difficult of access: for, when once a country declines from its primitive splendor, the more inhabitants are left, the quicker ruin will be made. Walls supply stones more easily than quarries, and palaces and temples will be demolished to make stables of granite, and cottages of porphyry.

Chapter 39. *The Adventures of Pekuah Continued

"We wandered about in this manner for some weeks, whether, as our chief pretended, for my gratification, or, as I rather suspected, for some convenience of his own. I endeavored to appear contented where sullenness and resentment would have been of no use, and that endeavor conduced much to the calmness of my mind; but my heart was always with Nekayah, and the troubles of the night much overbalanced the amusements of the day. My women, who threw all their cares upon their mistress, set their minds at ease from the time when they saw me treated with respect, and gave themselves up to the incidental alleviations of our fatigue without solicitude or sorrow. I was pleased with their pleasure, and animated with their confidence. My condition had lost much of its terror, since I found that the Arab ranged the country merely to get riches. Avarice is an uniform and tractable vice: other intellectual distempers are different in different constitutions of mind; that which soothes the pride of one will offend the pride of another; but to the favor of the covetous there is a ready way, bring money and nothing is denied.

"At last we came to the dwelling of our chief, a strong and spacious house built with stone in an island of the Nile, which lies, as I was told, under the tropic. 'Lady,' said the Arab, 'you shall rest after your journey a few weeks in this place, where you are to consider yourself as sovereign. My occupation is war: I have therefore chosen this obscure residence, from which I can issue unexpected, and to which I can retire unpursued. You may now repose in security: here are few pleasures, but here is no danger.' He then led me into the inner apartments, and seating me on the richest couch, bowed to the ground. His women, who considered me as a rival, looked on me with malignity; but being soon informed that I was a great lady detained only for my ransom, they began to vie with each other in obsequiousness and reverence.

"Being again comforted with new assurances of speedy liberty, I was for some days diverted from impatience by the novelty of the place. The turrets overlooked the country to a great distance, and afforded a view of many windings of the stream. In the day I wandered from one place to another as the course of the sun varied the splendor of the prospect, and saw many things which I had never seen before. The crocodiles and river-horses<sup>8</sup> are common in this unpeopled region, and I often looked upon them with terror, though I knew that they could not hurt me. For some time I expected to see mermaids and tritons, which, as Imlac has told me, the European travelers have stationed in the Nile, but no such beings ever appeared, and the Arab, when I inquired after them, laughed at my credulity.

"At night the Arab always attended me to a tower set apart for celestial observations, where he endeavored to teach me the names and courses of the stars. I had no great inclination to this study, but an appearance of attention was necessary to please my instructor, who valued himself for his skill, and, in a little while, I found some employment requisite to beguile the tediousness of time, which was to be passed always amidst the same objects. I was weary of looking in the morning on things from which I had turned away weary in the evening: I therefore was at last willing to observe the stars rather than do nothing, but could not always compose my thoughts, and was very often thinking on Nekayah when others imagined me contemplating the sky. Soon after the Arab went upon another expedition, and then my only pleasure was to talk with my maids about the accident by which we were carried away, and the happiness that we should all enjoy at the end of our captivity."

"There were women in your Arab's fortress," said the princess, "why did you not make them your companions, enjoy their conversation, and partake their diversions? In a place where they found business or amusement, why should you alone sit corroded with idle melancholy? or why could not you bear for a few months that condition to which they were condemned for life?"

"The diversions of the women," answered Pekuah, "were only childish play, by which the mind accustomed to stronger operations could not be kept busy. I could do all which they delighted in doing by powers merely sensitive,<sup>9</sup> while my intellectual faculties were flown to Cairo. They ran from room to room as a bird hops from wire to wire in his cage. They danced for the sake of motion, as lambs frisk in a meadow. One sometimes pretended to be hurt that the rest might be alarmed, or hid herself that another might seek her. Part of their time passed in watching the progress of light bodies that floated on the river, and part in marking the various forms into which clouds broke in the sky.

"Their business was only needlework, in which I and my maids sometimes helped them; but you know that the mind will easily straggle from the fingers, nor will you suspect that captivity and absence from Nekayah could receive solace from silken flowers.

"Nor was much satisfaction to be hoped from their conversation: for of what could they be expected to talk? They had seen nothing; for they had lived from early youth in that narrow spot: of what they had not seen they could have no knowledge, for they could not read. They had no ideas but of the few things that were within their view, and had hardly names for anything but their clothes and their food. As I bore a superior character, I was often called to terminate their quarrels, which I decided as equitably as I could. If it could have amused me to hear the complaints of each against the rest, I might have been often detained by long stories, but the motives of their animosity were so small that I could not listen without intercepting the tale."

"How," said Rasselas, "can the Arab, whom you represented as a man of more than common accomplishments, take any pleasure in his seraglio, when it is filled only with women like these. Are they exquisitely beautiful?"

"They do not," said Pekuah, "want that unaffecting and ignoble beauty which may subsist without spriteliness or sublimity, without energy of thought or dignity of virtue. But to a man like the Arab such beauty was only a flower casually plucked and carelessly thrown away. Whatever pleasures he might find among them, they were not those of friendship or society. When they were playing about him he looked on them with inattentive superiority: when they vied for his regard he sometimes turned away disgusted. As they had no knowledge, their talk could take nothing from the tediousness of life: as they had no choice, their fondness, or appearance of fondness, excited in him neither pride nor gratitude; he was not exalted in his own esteem by the smiles of a woman who saw no other man, nor was much obliged by that regard, of which he could never know the sincerity, and which he might often perceive to be exerted not so much to delight him as to pain a rival. That which he gave, and they received, as love, was only a careless distribution of superfluous time, such love as man can bestow upon that which he despises, such as has neither hope nor fear, neither joy nor sorrow."

"You have reason, lady, to think yourself happy," said Imlac, "that you have been thus easily dismissed. How could a mind, hungry for knowledge, be willing, in an intellectual famine, to lose such a banquet as Pekuah's conversation?"

"I am inclined to believe," answered Pekuah, "that he was for some time in suspense; for, notwithstanding his promise, whenever I proposed to dispatch a messenger to Cairo, he found some excuse for delay. While I was detained in his house he made many incursions into the neighboring countries, and, perhaps, he would have refused to discharge me, had his plunder been equal to his wishes. He returned always courteous, related his adventures, delighted to hear my observations, and endeavored to advance my acquaintance with the stars. When I importuned him to send away my letters, he soothed me with professions of honor and sincerity; and, when I could be no longer decently denied, put his troop again in motion, and left me to govern in his absence. I was much afflicted by this studied procrastination, and was sometimes afraid that I should be forgotten; that you would leave Cairo, and I must end my days in an island of the Nile.

"I grew at last hopeless and dejected, and cared so little to entertain him, that he for a while more frequently talked with my maids. That he should fall in love with them, or with me, might have been equally fatal, and I was not much pleased with the growing friendship. My anxiety was not long; for, as I recovered some degree of cheerfulness, he returned to me, and I could not forbear to despise my former uneasiness.

“He still delayed to send for my ransom, and would, perhaps, never have determined, had not your agent found his way to him. The gold, which he would not fetch, he could not reject when it was offered. He hastened to prepare for our journey hither, like a man delivered from the pain of an intestine conflict. I took leave of my companions in the house, who dismissed me with cold indifference.”

Nekayah, having heard her favorite’s relation, rose and embraced her, and Rasselas gave her an hundred ounces of gold, which she presented to the Arab for the fifty that were promised.

Chapter 40. *The History of a Man of Learning

They returned to Cairo, and were so well pleased at finding themselves together, that none of them went much abroad. The prince began to love learning, and one day declared to Imlac, that he intended to devote himself to science,<sup>1</sup> and pass the rest of his days in literary solitude.

"Before you make your final choice," answered Imlac, "you ought to examine its hazards, and converse with some of those who are grown old in the company of themselves. I have just left the observatory of one of the most learned astronomers in the world, who has spent forty years in unwearied attention to the motions and appearances of the celestial bodies, and has drawn out his soul in endless calculations. He admits a few friends once a month to hear his deductions and enjoy his discoveries. I was introduced as a man of knowledge worthy of his notice. Men of various ideas and fluent conversation are commonly welcome to those whose thoughts have been long fixed upon a single point, and who find the images of other things stealing away. I delighted him with my remarks, he smiled at the narrative of my travels, and was glad to forget the constellations, and descend for a moment into the lower world.

"On the next day of vacation<sup>2</sup> I renewed my visit, and was so fortunate as to please him again. He relaxed from that time the severity of his rule, and permitted me to enter at my own choice. I found him always busy, and always glad to be relieved. As each knew much which the other was desirous of learning, we exchanged our notions with great delight. I perceived that I had every day more of his confidence, and always found new cause of admiration in the profundity of his mind. His comprehension is vast, his memory capacious and retentive, his discourse is methodical, and his expression clear.

"His integrity and benevolence are equal to his learning. His deepest researches and most favorite studies are willingly interrupted for any opportunity of doing good by his counsel or his riches. To his closest retreat,<sup>3</sup> at his most busy moments, all are admitted that want his assistance: 'For though I exclude idleness and pleasure, I will never,' says he, 'bar my doors against charity. To man is permitted the contemplation of the skies, but the practice of virtue is commanded.' "

"Surely," said the princess, "this man is happy."

"I visited him," said Imlac, "with more and more frequency, and was every time more enamored of his conversation: he was sublime without haughtiness, courteous without formality, and communicative without ostentation. I was at first, great princess, of your opinion, thought him the happiest of mankind, and often congratulated him on the blessing that he enjoyed. He seemed to hear nothing with indifference but the praises of his condition, to which he always returned a general answer, and diverted the conversation to some other topic.

"Amidst this willingness to be pleased, and labor to please, I had quickly reason to imagine that some painful sentiment pressed upon his mind. He often looked up earnestly towards the sun, and let his voice fall in the midst of his discourse. He would sometimes, when we were alone, gaze upon me in silence with the air of a man who longed to speak what he was yet resolved to suppress. He would often send for me with vehement injunctions of haste, though, when I came to him, he had nothing extraordinary to say. And sometimes, when I was leaving him, he would call me back, pause a few moments and then dismiss me.

Chapter 41. *The Astronomer Discovers the Cause of His Uneasiness

"At last the time came when the secret burst his reserve. We were sitting together last night in the turret of his house, watching the emersion of a satellite of Jupiter. A sudden tempest clouded the sky, and disappointed our observation. We sat a while silent in the dark, and then he addressed himself to me in these words: 'Imlac, I have long considered thy friendship as the greatest blessing of my life. Integrity without knowledge is weak and useless, and knowledge without integrity is dangerous and dreadful. I have found in thee all the qualities requisite for trust, benevolence, experience, and fortitude. I have long discharged an office which I must soon quit at the call of nature, and shall rejoice in the hour of imbecility<sup>4</sup> and pain to devolve it upon thee.'

"I thought myself honored by this testimony, and protested that whatever could conduce to his happiness would add likewise to mine.

"Hear, Imlac, what thou wilt not without difficulty credit. I have possessed for five years the regulation of weather, and the distribution of the seasons: the sun has listened to my dictates, and passed from tropic to tropic by my direction; the clouds, at my call, have poured their waters, and the Nile has overflowed at my command; I have restrained the rage of the dog-star, and mitigated the fervors of the crab.<sup>5</sup> The winds alone, of all the elemental powers, have hitherto refused my authority, and multitudes have perished by equinoctial tempests which I found myself unable to prohibit or restrain. I have administered this great office with exact justice, and made to the different nations of the earth an impartial dividend of rain and sunshine. What must have been the misery of half the globe, if I had limited the clouds to particular regions, or confined the sun to either side of the equator?'

Chapter 42. *The Opinion of the Astronomer Is Explained and Justified

"I suppose he discovered in me, through the obscurity of the room, some tokens of amazement and doubt, for, after a short pause, he proceeded thus:

"Not to be easily credited will neither surprise nor offend me; for I am, probably, the first of human beings to whom this trust has been imparted. Nor do I know whether to deem this distinction a reward or punishment; since I have possessed it I have been far less happy than before, and nothing but the consciousness of good intention could have enabled me to support the weariness of unremitted vigilance.'

"How long, Sir,' said I, 'has this great office been in your hands?'

"About ten years ago,' said he, 'my daily observations of the changes of the sky led me to consider, whether, if I had the power of the seasons, I could confer greater plenty upon the inhabitants of the earth. This contemplation fastened on my mind, and I sat days and nights in imaginary dominion, pouring upon this country and that the showers of fertility, and seconding every fall of rain with a due proportion of sunshine. I had yet only the will to do good, and did not imagine that I should ever have the power.

"One day as I was looking on the fields withering with heat, I felt in my mind a sudden wish that I could send rain on the southern mountains, and raise the Nile to an inundation. In the hurry of my imagination I commanded rain to fall, and, by comparing the time of my command, with that of the inundation, I found that the clouds had listened to my lips.'

"Might not some other cause,' said I, 'produce this concurrence? the Nile does not always rise on the same day.'

"Do not believe,' said he with impatience, 'that such objections could escape me: I reasoned long against my own conviction, and labored against truth with the utmost obstinacy. I sometimes suspected myself of madness, and should not have dared to impart this secret but to a man like you, capable of distinguishing the wonderful from the impossible, and the incredible from the false.'

""Why, Sir,' said I, 'do you call that incredible, which you know, or think you know, to be true?'

""Because,' said he, 'I cannot prove it by any external evidence; and I know too well the laws of demonstration to think that my conviction ought to influence another, who cannot, like me, be conscious of its force. I therefore shall not attempt to gain credit by disputation. It is sufficient that I feel this power, that I have long possessed, and every day exerted it. But the life of man is short, the infirmities of age increase upon me, and the time will soon come when the regulator of the year must mingle with the dust. The care of appointing a successor has long disturbed me; the night and the day have been spent in comparisons of all the characters which have come to my knowledge, and I have yet found none so worthy as thyself.

Chapter 43. *The Astronomer Leaves Imlac His Directions

“Hear therefore, what I shall impart, with attention, such as the welfare of a world requires. If the task of a king be considered as difficult, who has the care only of a few millions, to whom he cannot do much good or harm, what must be the anxiety of him, on whom depends the action of the elements, and the great gifts of light and heat!—Hear me therefore with attention.

“I have diligently considered the position of the earth and sun, and formed innumerable schemes in which I changed their situation. I have sometimes turned aside the axis of the earth, and sometimes varied the ecliptic of the sun: but I have found it impossible to make a disposition by which the world may be advantaged; what one region gains, another loses by any imaginable alteration, even without considering the distant parts of the solar system with which we are unacquainted. Do not, therefore, in thy administration of the year, indulge thy pride by innovation; do not please thyself with thinking that thou canst make thyself renowned to all future ages, by disordering the seasons. The memory of mischief is no desirable fame. Much less will it become thee to let kindness or interest prevail. Never rob other countries of rain to pour it on thine own. For us the Nile is sufficient.’

“I promised that when I possessed the power, I would use it with inflexible integrity, and he dismissed me, pressing my hand. ‘My heart,’ said he, ‘will be now at rest, and my benevolence will no more destroy my quiet: I have found a man of wisdom and virtue, to whom I can cheerfully bequeath the inheritance of the sun.’”

The prince heard this narration with very serious regard, but the princess smiled, and Pekuah convulsed herself with laughter.

“Ladies,” said Imlac, “to mock the heaviest of human afflictions is neither charitable nor wise. Few can attain this man’s knowledge, and few practice his virtues; but all may suffer his calamity. Of the uncertainties of our present state, the most dreadful and alarming is the uncertain continuance of reason.”

The princess was recollected, and the favorite was abashed. Rasselas, more deeply affected, inquired of Imlac, whether he thought such maladies of the mind frequent, and how they were contracted.

Chapter 44. *The Dangerous Prevalence<sup>6</sup> of Imagination

"Disorders of intellect," answered Imlac, "happen much more often than superficial observers will easily believe. Perhaps, if we speak with rigorous exactness, no human mind is in its right state. There is no man whose imagination does not sometimes predominate over his reason, who can regulate his attention wholly by his will, and whose ideas will come and go at his command. No man will be found in whose mind airy notions do not sometimes tyrannize, and force him to hope or fear beyond the limits of sober probability. All power of fancy over reason is a degree of insanity; but while this power is such as we can control and repress, it is not visible to others, nor considered as any depravation of the mental faculties; it is not pronounced madness but when it comes ungovernable, and apparently influences speech or action.

"To indulge the power of fiction, and send imagination out upon the wing, is often the sport of those who delight too much in silent speculation. When we are alone we are not always busy; the labor of excogitation is too violent to last long; the ardor of inquiry will sometimes give way to idleness or satiety. He who has nothing external that can divert him must find pleasure in his own thoughts, and must conceive himself what he is not; for who is pleased with what he is? He then expatiates in boundless futurity, and culls from all imaginable conditions that which for the present moment he should most desire, amuses his desires with impossible enjoyments, and confers upon his pride unattainable dominion. The mind dances from scene to scene, unites all pleasures in all combinations, and riots in delights which nature and fortune, with all their bounty, cannot bestow.

"In time, some particular train of ideas fixes the attention; all other intellectual gratifications are rejected; the mind, in weariness or leisure, recurs constantly to the favorite conception, and feasts on the luscious falsehood, whenever she is offended with the bitterness of truth. By degrees the reign of fancy is confirmed; she grows first imperious, and in time despotic. Then fictions begin to operate as realities, false opinions fasten upon the mind, and life passes in dreams of rapture or of anguish.

"This, sir, is one of the dangers of solitude, which the hermit has confessed not always to promote goodness, and the astronomer's misery has proved to be not always propitious to wisdom."

"I will no more," said the favorite, "imagine myself the queen of Abyssinia. I have often spent the hours which the princess gave to my own disposal, in adjusting ceremonies and regulating the court; I have repressed the pride of the powerful, and granted the petitions of the poor; I have built new palaces in more happy situations, planted groves upon the tops of mountains, and have exulted in the beneficence of royalty, till, when the princess entered, I had almost forgotten to bow down before her."

"And I," said the princess, "will not allow myself any more to play the shepherdess in my waking dreams. I have often soothed my thoughts with the quiet and innocence of pastoral employments, till I have in my chamber heard the winds whistle, and the sheep bleat; sometimes freed the lamb entangled in the thicket, and sometimes with my crook encountered the wolf. I have a dress like that of the village maids, which I put on to help my imagination, and a pipe on which I play softly, and suppose myself followed by my flocks."

"I will confess," said the prince, "an indulgence of fantastic delight more dangerous than yours. I have frequently endeavored to image the possibility of a perfect government, by which all wrong should be restrained, all vice reformed, and all the subjects preserved in tranquility and innocence. This thought produced innumerable schemes of reformation, and dictated many useful regulations and salutary edicts. This has been the sport, and sometimes the labor, of my solitude; and I start, when I think with how little anguish I once supposed the death of my father and my brothers."

"Such," says Imlac, "are the effects of visionary schemes; when we first form them, we know them to be absurd, but familiarize them by degrees, and in time lose sight of their folly."

Chapter 45. *They Discourse with an Old Man

The evening was now far past, and they rose to return home. As they walked along the bank of the Nile, delighted with the beams of the moon quivering on the water, they saw at a small distance an old man, whom the prince had often heard in the assembly of the sages. "Yonder," said he, "is one whose years have calmed his passions, but not clouded his reason. Let us close the disquisitions of the night by inquiring what are his sentiments of his own state, that we may know whether youth alone is to struggle with vexation, and whether any better hope remains for the latter part of life."

Here the sage approached and saluted them. They invited him to join their walk, and prattled a while, as acquaintance that had unexpectedly met one another. The old man was cheerful and talkative, and the way seemed short in his company. He was pleased to find himself not disregarded, accompanied them to their house, and, at the prince's request, entered with them. They placed him in the seat of honor, and set wine and conserves before him.

"Sir," said the princess, "an evening walk must give to a man of learning like you pleasures which ignorance and youth can hardly conceive. You know the qualities and the causes of all that you behold, the laws by which the river flows, the periods in which the planets perform their revolutions. Everything must supply you with contemplation, and renew the consciousness of your own dignity."

"Lady," answered he, "let the gay and the vigorous expect pleasure in their excursions; it is enough that age can obtain ease. To me the world has lost its novelty; I look round, and see what I remember to have seen in happier days. I rest against a tree, and consider that in the same shade I once disputed upon the annual overflow of the Nile with a friend who is now silent in the grave. I cast my eyes upward, fix them on the changing moon, and think with pain on the vicissitudes of life. I have ceased to take much delight in physical truth; for what have I to do with those things which I am soon to leave?"

"You may at least recreate<sup>7</sup> yourself," said Imlac, "with the recollection of an honorable and useful life, and enjoy the praise which all agree to give you."

"Praise," said the sage with a sigh, "is to an old man an empty sound. I have neither mother to be delighted with the reputation of her son, nor wife to partake the honors of her husband. I have outlived my friends and my rivals. Nothing is now of much importance; for I cannot extend my interest beyond myself. Youth is delighted with applause, because it is considered as the earnest of some future good, and because the prospect of life is far extended; but to me, who am now declining to decrepitude, there is little to be feared from the malevolence of men, and yet less to be hoped from their affection or esteem. Something they may yet take away, but they can give me nothing. Riches would now be useless, and high employment would be pain. My retrospect of life recalls to my view many opportunities of good neglected, much time squandered upon trifles, and more lost in idleness and vacancy. I leave many great designs unattempted, and many great attempts unfinished. My mind is burthened with no heavy crime, and therefore I compose myself to tranquility; endeavor to abstract my thoughts from hopes and cares which, though reason knows them to be vain, still try to keep their old possession of the heart; expect,<sup>8</sup> with serene humility, that hour which nature cannot long delay; and hope to possess, in a better state, that happiness which here I could not find, and that virtue which here I have not attained."

He arose and went away, leaving his audience not much elated with the hope of long life. The prince consoled himself with remarking that it was not reasonable to be disappointed by this account; for age had never been considered as the season of felicity, and if it was possible to be easy in decline and weakness, it was likely that the days of vigor and alacrity might be happy; that the noon of life might be bright, if the evening could be calm.

The princess suspected that age was querulous and malignant, and delighted to repress the expectations of those who had newly entered the world. She had seen the possessors of estates look with envy on their heirs, and known many who enjoy pleasure no longer than they can confine it to themselves.

Pekuah conjectured that the man was older than he appeared, and was willing to impute his complaints to delirious dejection; or else supposed that he had been unfortunate, and was therefore discontented. "For nothing," said she, "is more common than to call our own condition the condition of life."

Imlac, who had no desire to see them depressed, smiled at the comforts which they could so readily procure to themselves, and remembered that, at the same age, he was equally confident of unmingled prosperity, and equally fertile of consolatory expedients. He forbore to force upon them unwelcome knowledge, which time itself would too soon impress. The princess and her lady retired; the madness of the astronomer hung upon their minds, and they desired Imlac to enter upon his office, and delay next morning the rising of the sun.

Chapter 46. *The Princess and Pekuah Visit the Astronomer

The princess and Pekuah, having talked in private of Imlac's astronomer, thought his character at once so amiable and so strange, that they could not be satisfied without a nearer knowledge, and Imlac was requested to find the means of bringing them together.

This was somewhat difficult; the philosopher had never received any visits from women, though he lived in a city that had in it many Europeans who followed the manners of their own countries, and many from other parts of the world that lived there with European liberty. The ladies would not be refused, and several schemes were proposed for the accomplishment of their design. It was proposed to introduce them as strangers in distress, to whom the sage was always accessible; but, after some deliberation, it appeared, that by this artifice, no acquaintance could be formed, for their conversation would be short, and they could not decently importune him often. "This," said Rasselas, "is true; but I have yet a stronger objection against the misrepresentation of your state. I have always considered it as treason against the great republic of human nature, to make any man's virtues the means of deceiving him, whether on great or little occasions. All imposture weakens confidence and chills benevolence. When the sage finds that you are not what you seemed, he will feel the resentment natural to a man who, conscious of great abilities, discovers that he has been tricked by understandings meaner than his own, and, perhaps, the distrust, which he can never afterwards wholly lay aside, may stop the voice of counsel, and close the hand of charity; and where will you find the power of restoring his benefactions to mankind, or his peace to himself?"

To this no reply was attempted, and Imlac began to hope that their curiosity would subside; but next day Pekuah told him, she had now found an honest pretense for a visit to the astronomer, for she would solicit permission to continue under him the studies in which she had been initiated by the Arab, and the princess might go with her either as a fellow-student, or because a woman could not decently come alone. "I am afraid," said Imlac, "that he will be soon weary of your company: men advanced far in knowledge do not love to repeat the elements of their art, and I am not certain, that even of the elements, as he will deliver them connected with inferences, and mingled with reflections, you are a very capable auditress." "That," said Pekuah, "must be my care: I ask of you only to take me thither. My knowledge is, perhaps, more than you imagine it, and by concurring always with his opinions I shall make him think it greater than it is."

The astronomer, in pursuance of this resolution, was told, that a foreign lady, traveling in search of knowledge, had heard of his reputation, and was desirous to become his scholar. The uncommonness of the proposal raised at once his surprise and curiosity, and when, after a short deliberation, he consented to admit her, he could not stay without impatience till the next day.

The ladies dressed themselves magnificently, and were attended by Imlac to the astronomer, who was pleased to see himself approached with respect by persons of so splendid an appearance. In the exchange of the first civilities he was timorous and bashful; but when the talk became regular, he recollected his powers, and justified the character which Imlac had given. Inquiring of Pekuah what could have turned her inclination towards astronomy, he received from her a history of her adventure at the pyramid, and of the time passed in the Arab's island. She told her tale with ease and elegance, and her conversation took possession of his heart. The discourse was then turned to astronomy: Pekuah displayed what she knew: he looked upon her as a prodigy of genius, and entreated her not to desist from a study which she had so happily begun.

They came again and again, and were every time more welcome than before. The sage endeavored to amuse them, that they might prolong their visits, for he found his thoughts grow brighter in their company; the clouds of solicitude vanished by degrees, as he forced himself to entertain them, and he grieved when he was left at their departure to his old employment of regulating the seasons.

The princess and her favorite had now watched his lips for several months, and could not catch a single word from which they could judge whether he continued, or not, in the opinion of his preternatural commission. They often contrived to bring him to an open declaration, but he easily eluded all their attacks, and on which side soever they pressed him escaped from them to some other topic.

As their familiarity increased they invited him often to the house of Imlac, where they distinguished him by extraordinary respect. He began gradually to delight in sublunary pleasures. He came early and departed late; labored to recommend himself by assiduity and compliance; excited their curiosity after new arts, that they might still want his assistance; and when they made any excursion of pleasure or inquiry, entreated to attend them.

By long experience of his integrity and wisdom, the prince and his sister were convinced that he might be trusted without danger; and lest he should draw any false hopes from the civilities which he received, discovered to him their condition, with the motives of their journey, and required his opinion on the choice of life.

"Of the various conditions which the world spreads before you, which you shall prefer," said the sage, "I am not able to instruct you. I can only tell that I have chosen wrong. I have passed my time in study without experience; in the attainment of sciences which can, for the most part, be but remotely useful to mankind. I have purchased knowledge at the expense of all the common comforts of life: I have missed the endearing elegance of female friendship, and the happy commerce of domestic tenderness. If I have obtained any prerogatives above other students, they have been accompanied with fear, disquiet, and scrupulosity; but even of these prerogatives, whatever they were, I have, since my thoughts have been diversified by more intercourse with the world, begun to question the reality. When I have been for a few days lost in pleasing dissipation, I am always tempted to think that my inquiries have ended in error, and that I have suffered much, and suffered it in vain."

Imlac was delighted to find that the sage's understanding was breaking through its mists, and resolved to detain him from the planets till he should forget his task of ruling them, and reason should recover its original influence.

From this time the astronomer was received into familiar friendship, and partook of all their projects and pleasures: his respect kept him attentive, and the activity of Rasselas did not leave much time unengaged. Something was always to be done; the day was spent in making observations which furnished talk for the evening, and the evening was closed with a scheme for the morrow.

The sage confessed to Imlac, that since he had mingled in the gay tumults of life, and divided his hours by a succession of amusements, he found the conviction of his authority over the skies fade gradually from his mind, and began to trust less to an opinion which he never could prove to others, and which he now found subject to variation from causes in which reason had no part. "If I am accidentally left alone for a few hours," said he, "my inveterate persuasion rushes upon my soul, and my thoughts are chained down by some irresistible violence, but they are soon disentangled by the prince's conversation, and instantaneously released at the entrance of Pekuah. I am like a man habitually afraid of specters, who is set at ease by a lamp, and wonders at the dread which harassed him in the dark, yet, if his lamp be extinguished, feels again the terrors which he knows that when it is light he shall feel no more. But I am sometimes afraid lest I indulge my quiet by criminal negligence, and voluntarily forget the great charge with which I am entrusted. If I favor myself in a known error, or am determined by my own ease in a doubtful question of this importance, how dreadful is my crime!"

"No disease of the imagination," answered Imlac, "is so difficult of cure, as that which is complicated with the dread of guilt: fancy and conscience then act interchangeably upon us, and so often shift their places, that the illusions of one are not distinguished from the dictates of the other. If fancy presents images not moral or religious, the mind drives them away when they give it pain, but when melancholic<sup>9</sup> notions take the form of duty, they lay hold on the faculties without opposition, because we are afraid to exclude or banish them. For this reason the superstitious are often melancholy, and the melancholy almost always superstitious.

“But do not let the suggestions of timidity overpower your better reason: the danger of neglect can be but as the probability of the obligation, which, when you consider it with freedom, you find very little, and that little growing every day less. Open your heart to the influence of the light, which, from time to time, breaks in upon you: when scruples importune you, which you in your lucid moments know to be vain, do not stand to parley, but fly to business or to Pekuah, and keep this thought always prevalent, that you are only one atom of the mass of humanity, and have neither such virtue nor vice, as that you should be singled out for supernatural favors or afflictions.”

Chapter 47. The Prince Enters, and Brings a New Topic

"All this," said the astronomer, "I have often thought, but my reason has been so long subjugated by an uncontrollable and overwhelming idea, that it durst not confide in its own decisions. I now see how fatally I betrayed my quiet, by suffering chimeras to prey upon me in secret; but melancholy shrinks from communication, and I never found a man before, to whom I could impart my troubles, though I had been certain of relief. I rejoice to find my own sentiments confirmed by yours, who are not easily deceived, and can have no motive or purpose to deceive. I hope that time and variety will dissipate the gloom that has so long surrounded me, and the latter part of my days will be spent in peace."

"Your learning and virtue," said Imlac, "may justly give you hopes."

Rasselas then entered with the princess and Pekuah, and inquired whether they had contrived any new diversion for the next day. "Such," said Nekayah, "is the state of life, that none are happy but by the anticipation of change: the change itself is nothing; when we have made it, the next wish is to change again. The world is not yet exhausted; let me see something tomorrow which I never saw before."

"Variety," said Rasselas, "is so necessary to content, that even the happy valley disgusted me by the recurrence of its luxuries; yet I could not forbear to reproach myself with impatience, when I saw the monks of St. Anthony support without complaint, a life, not of uniform delight, but uniform hardship."

"Those men," answered Imlac, "are less wretched in their silent convent than the Abyssinian princes in their prison of pleasure. Whatever is done by the monks is incited by an adequate and reasonable motive. Their labor supplies them with necessaries; it therefore cannot be omitted, and is certainly rewarded. Their devotion prepares them for another state, and reminds them of its approach, while it fits them for it. Their time is regularly distributed; one duty succeeds another, so that they are not left open to the distraction of unguided choice, nor lost in the shades of listless inactivity. There is a certain task to be performed at an appropriated hour; and their toils are cheerful, because they consider them as acts of piety, by which they are always advancing towards endless felicity."

"Do you think," said Nekayah, "that the monastic rule is a more holy and less imperfect state than any other? May not he equally hope for future happiness who converses openly with mankind, who succors the distressed by his charity, instructs the ignorant by his learning, and contributes by his industry to the general system of life; even though he should omit some of the mortifications which are practiced in the cloister, and allow himself such harmless delights as his condition may place within his reach?"

"This," said Imlac, "is a question which has long divided the wise, and perplexed the good. I am afraid to decide on either part. He that lives well in the world is better than he that lives well in a monastery. But perhaps everyone is not able to stem the temptations of public life; and if he cannot conquer, he may properly retreat. Some have little power to do good, and have likewise little strength to resist evil. Many are weary of their conflicts with adversity, and are willing to eject those passions which have long busied them in vain. And many are dismissed by age and diseases from the more laborious duties of society. In monasteries the weak and timorous may be happily sheltered, the weary may repose, and the penitent may meditate. Those retreats of prayer and contemplation have something so congenial to the mind of man, that, perhaps, there is scarcely one that does not purpose to close his life in pious abstraction with a few associates serious as himself."

"Such," said Pekuah, "has often been my wish, and I have heard the princess declare, that she should not willingly die in a crowd."

"The liberty of using harmless pleasures," proceeded Imlac, "will not be disputed; but it is still to be examined what pleasures are harmless. The evil of any pleasure that Nekayah can image is not in the act itself, but in its consequences. Pleasure, in itself harmless, may become mischievous, by endearing to us a state which we know to be transient and probatory,<sup>1</sup> and withdrawing our thoughts from that, of which every hour brings us nearer to the beginning, and of which no length of time will bring us to the end. Mortification is not virtuous in itself, nor has any other use, but that it disengages us from the allurements of sense. In the state of future perfection, to which we all aspire, there will be pleasure without danger, and security without restraint."

The princess was silent, and Rasselas, turning to the astronomer, asked him, whether he could not delay her retreat, by showing her something which she had not seen before.

"Your curiosity," said the sage, "has been so general, and your pursuit of knowledge so vigorous, that novelties are not now very easily to be found: but what you can no longer procure from the living may be given by the dead. Among the wonders of this country are the catacombs, or the ancient repositories, in which the bodies of the earliest generations were lodged, and where, by the virtue of the gums which embalmed them, they yet remain without corruption."

"I know not," said Rasselas, "what pleasure the sight of the catacombs can afford; but, since nothing else is offered, I am resolved to view them, and shall place this with many other things which I have done, because I would do something."

They hired a guard of horsemen, and the next day visited the catacombs. When they were about to descend into the sepulchral caves, "Pekuah," said the princess, "we are now again invading the habitations of the dead; I know that you will stay behind; let me find you safe when I return." "No, I will not be left," answered Pekuah; "I will go down between you and the prince."

They then all descended, and roved with wonder through the labyrinth of subterraneous passages, where the bodies were laid in rows on either side.

Chapter 48. *Imlac Discourses on the Nature of the Soul

"What reason," said the prince, "can be given, why the Egyptians should thus expensively preserve those carcasses which some nations consume with fire, others lay to mingle with the earth, and all agree to remove from their sight, as soon as decent rites can be performed?"

"The original of ancient customs," said Imlac, "is commonly unknown; for the practice often continues when the cause has ceased; and concerning superstitious ceremonies it is vain to conjecture; for what reason did not dictate reason cannot explain. I have long believed that the practice of embalming arose only from tenderness to the remains of relations or friends, and to this opinion I am more inclined, because it seems impossible that this care should have been general: had all the dead been embalmed, their repositories must in time have been more spacious than the dwellings of the living. I suppose only the rich or honorable were secured from corruption, and the rest left to the course of nature.

"But it is commonly supposed that the Egyptians believed the soul to live as long as the body continued undissolved, and therefore tried this method of eluding death."

"Could the wise Egyptians," said Nekayah, "think so grossly of the soul? If the soul could once survive its separation, what could it afterwards receive or suffer from the body?"

"The Egyptians would doubtless think erroneously," said the astronomer, "in the darkness of heathenism, and the first dawn of philosophy. The nature of the soul is still disputed amidst all our opportunities of clearer knowledge: some yet say, that it may be material, who, nevertheless, believe it to be immortal."

"Some," answered Imlac, "have indeed said that the soul is material, but I can scarcely believe that any man has thought it, who knew how to think; for all the conclusions of reason enforce the immateriality of mind, and all the notices of sense and investigations of science concur to prove the unconsciousness of matter.

"It was never supposed that cogitation is inherent in matter, or that every particle is a thinking being. Yet if any part of matter be devoid of thought, what part can we suppose to think? Matter can differ from matter only in form, density, bulk, motion, and direction of motion: to which of these, however varied or combined, can consciousness be annexed? To be round or square, to be solid or fluid, to be great or little, to be moved slowly or swiftly one way or another, are modes of material existence, all equally alien from the nature of cogitation. If matter be once without thought, it can only be made to think by some new modification, but all the modifications which it can admit are equally unconnected with cogitative powers."

"But the materialists," said the astronomer, "urge that matter may have qualities with which we are unacquainted."

"He who will determine," returned Imlac, "against that which he knows, because there may be something which he knows not; he that can set hypothetical possibility against acknowledged certainty, is not to be admitted among reasonable beings. All that we know of matter is, that matter is inert, senseless and lifeless; and if this conviction cannot be opposed but by referring us to something that we know not, we have all the evidence that human intellect can admit. If that which is known may be overruled by that which is unknown, no being, not omniscient, can arrive at certainty."

"Yet let us not," said the astronomer, "too arrogantly limit the Creator's power."

"It is no limitation of omnipotence," replied the poet, "to suppose that one thing is not consistent with another, that the same proposition cannot be at once true and false, that the same number cannot be even and odd, that cogitation cannot be conferred on that which is created incapable of cogitation."

"I know not," said Nekayah, "any great use of this question. Does that immateriality, which, in my opinion, you have sufficiently proved, necessarily include eternal duration?"

"Of immateriality," said Imlac, "our ideas are negative, and therefore obscure. Immateriality seems to imply a natural power of perpetual duration as a consequence of exemption from all causes of decay: whatever perishes, is destroyed by the solution of its contexture,<sup>2</sup> and separation of its parts; nor can we conceive how that which has no parts, and therefore admits no solution, can be naturally corrupted or impaired."

"I know not," said Rasselas, "how to conceive anything without extension: what is extended must have parts, and you allow, that whatever has parts may be destroyed."

"Consider your own conceptions," replied Imlac, "and the difficulty will be less. You will find substance without extension. An ideal form is no less real than material bulk: yet an ideal form has no extension. It is no less certain, when you think on a pyramid, that your mind possesses the idea of a pyramid, than that the pyramid itself is standing. What space does the idea of a pyramid occupy more than the idea of a grain of corn? or how can either idea suffer laceration? As is the effect such is the cause; as thought is, such is the power that thinks; a power impassive and indiscerptible."<sup>3</sup>

"But the Being," said Nekayah, "whom I fear to name, the Being which made the soul, can destroy it."

"He, surely, can destroy it," answered Imlac, "since, however unperishable, it receives from a superior nature its power of duration. That it will not perish by any inherent cause of decay, or principle of corruption, may be shown by philosophy; but philosophy can tell no more. That it will not be annihilated by him that made it, we must humbly learn from higher authority."

The whole assembly stood a while silent and collected. "Let us return," said Rasselas, "from this scene of mortality. How gloomy would be these mansions of the dead to him who did not know that he shall never die; that what now acts shall continue its agency, and what now thinks shall think on for ever. Those that lie here stretched before us, the wise and the powerful of ancient times, warn us to remember the shortness of our present state: they were, perhaps, snatched away while they were busy, like us, in the choice of life."

"To me," said the princess, "the choice of life is become less important; I hope hereafter to think only on the choice of eternity."

They then hastened out of the caverns, and, under the protection of their guard, returned to Cairo.

Chapter 49. *The Conclusion, in Which Nothing Is Concluded

It was now the time of the inundation of the Nile: a few days after their visit to the catacombs, the river began to rise.

They were confined to their house. The whole region being under water gave them no invitation to any excursions, and being well supplied with materials for talk, they diverted themselves with comparisons of the different forms of life which they had observed, and with various schemes of happiness which each of them had formed.

Pekuah was never so much charmed with any place as the convent of St. Anthony, where the Arab restored her to the princess, and wished only to fill it with pious maidens, and to be made prioress of the order; she was weary of expectation and disgust,<sup>4</sup> and would gladly be fixed in some unvariable state.

The princess thought that, of all sublunary things, knowledge was the best: she desired first to learn all sciences, and then purposed to found a college of learned women, in which she would preside, that, by conversing with the old and educating the young, she might divide her time between the acquisition and communication of wisdom, and raise up for the next age models of prudence, and patterns of piety.

The prince desired a little kingdom, in which he might administer justice in his own person, and see all the parts of government with his own eyes; but he could never fix the limits of his dominion, and was always adding to the number of his subjects.

Imlac and the astronomer were contented to be driven along the stream of life, without directing their course to any particular port.

Of these wishes that they had formed, they well knew that none could be obtained. They deliberated a while what was to be done, and resolved, when the inundation should cease, to return to Abyssinia.<sup>5</sup>

A Dictionary of the English Language Before Johnson, no standard dictionary of the English language existed. The lack had troubled speakers of English for some time, both because Italian and French academies had produced major dictionaries of their own tongues and because, in the absence of any authority, English seemed likely to change utterly from one generation to another. Many eighteenth-century authors feared that their own language would soon become obsolete: as Alexander Pope wrote in An Essay on Criticism,

Our sons their fathers' failing language see,
And such as Chaucer is, shall Dryden be.

A dictionary could help slow such change, and commercially it would be a book that everyone would need to buy. In 1746 a group of London publishers commissioned Johnson, still an unknown author, to undertake the project. He hoped to finish it in three years; it took him nine. But the quantity and quality of work he accomplished, aided only by six part-time assistants, made him famous as "Dictionary Johnson." The Dictionary remained a standard reference book for one hundred years.

Johnson's achievement is notable in three respects: its size (forty thousand words), the wealth of illustrative quotations, and the excellence of the definitions. No earlier English dictionary rivaled the scope of Johnson's two large folio volumes. About 114,000 quotations, gathered from the best English writers from Sidney to the eighteenth century, exemplify the usage of words as well as their meanings. Above all, it was the definitions, however, that established the authority of Johnson's Dictionary. A small selection is only too likely to concentrate on a few amusing or notorious definitions, but the great majority are full, clear, and totally free from eccentricity. Indeed, many of them are still repeated in modern dictionaries. Language, Johnson knew, cannot be fixed once and for all; many of the words he defines have radically changed meaning since the eighteenth century. Yet Johnson did more than any other person of his time to preserve the ideal of a standard English.

From Preface

* * *

A large work is difficult because it is large, even though all its parts might singly be performed with facility; where there are many things to be done, each must be allowed its share of time and labor, in the proportion only which it bears to the whole; nor can it be expected that the stones which form the dome of a temple should be squared and polished like the diamond of a ring.

Of the event of this work, for which, having labored it with so much application, I cannot but have some degree of parental fondness, it is natural to form conjectures. Those who have been persuaded to think well of my design will require that it should fix our language, and put a stop to those alterations which time and chance have hitherto been suffered to make in it without opposition. With this consequence I will confess that I flattered myself for a while;<sup>1</sup> but now begin to fear that I have indulged expectation which neither reason nor experience can justify. When we see men grow old and die at a certain time one after another, from century to century, we laugh at the elixir that promises to prolong life to a thousand years; and with equal justice may the lexicographer be derided, who being able to produce no example of a nation that has preserved their words and phrases from mutability, shall imagine that his dictionary can embalm his language and secure it from corruption and decay, that it is in his power to change sublunary nature, or clear the world at once from folly, vanity, and affectation.

With this hope, however, academies have been instituted, to guard the avenues of their languages, to retain fugitives, and repulse intruders; but their vigilance and activity have hitherto been vain; sounds are too volatile and subtle for legal restraints; to enchain syllables, and to lash the wind, are equally the undertakings of pride, unwilling to measure its desires by its strength. The French language has visibly changed under the inspection of the academy;<sup>2</sup> the style of Amelot's translation of father Paul is observed by Le Courayer to be un peu passé;<sup>3</sup> and no Italian will maintain that the diction of any modern writer is not perceptibly different from that of Boccace, Machiavel, or Caro.<sup>4</sup>

Total and sudden transformations of a language seldom happen; conquests and migrations are now very rare: but there are other causes of change, which, though slow in their operation, and invisible in their progress, are perhaps as much superior to human resistance as the revolutions of the sky, or intumescence<sup>5</sup> of the tide. Commerce, however necessary, however lucrative, as it depraves the manners, corrupts the language; they that have frequent intercourse with strangers, to whom they endeavor to accommodate themselves, must in time learn a mingled dialect, like the jargon which serves the traffickers<sup>6</sup> on the Mediterranean and Indian coasts. This will not always be confined to the exchange, the warehouse, or the port, but will be communicated by degrees to other ranks of the people, and be at last incorporated with the current speech.

There are likewise internal causes equally forcible. The language most likely to continue long without alteration would be that of a nation raised a little, and but a little, above barbarity, secluded from strangers, and totally employed in procuring the conveniencies of life; either without books, or, like some of the Mahometan countries, with very few: men thus busied and unlearned, having only such words as common use requires, would perhaps long continue to express the same notions by the same signs. But no such constancy can be expected in a people polished by arts, and classed by subordination, where one part of the community is sustained and accommodated by the labor of the other. Those who have much leisure to think, will always be enlarging the stock of ideas, and every increase of knowledge, whether real or fancied, will produce new words, or combinations of words. When the mind is unchained from necessity, it will range after convenience; when it is left at large in the fields of speculation, it will shift opinions; as any custom is disused, the words that expressed it must perish with it; as any opinion grows popular, it will innovate speech in the same proportion as it alters practice.

As by the cultivation of various sciences, a language is amplified, it will be more furnished with words deflected from their original sense; the geometrician will talk of a courtier's zenith, or the eccentric virtue of a wild hero, and the physician of sanguine expectations and phlegmatic delays.<sup>7</sup> Copiousness of speech will give opportunities to capricious choice, by which some words will be preferred, and others degraded; vicissitudes of fashion will enforce the use of new, or extend the signification of known terms. The tropes<sup>8</sup> of poetry will make hourly encroachments, and the metaphorical will become the current sense: pronunciation will be varied by levity or ignorance, and the pen must at length comply with the tongue; illiterate writers will at one time or other, by public infatuation, rise into renown, who, not knowing the original import of words, will use them with colloquial licentiousness, confound distinction, and forget propriety. As politeness increases, some expressions will be considered as too gross and vulgar for the delicate, others as too formal and ceremonious for the gay and airy; new phrases are therefore adopted, which must, for the same reasons, be in time dismissed. Swift, in his petty treatise on the English language,<sup>9</sup> allows that new words must sometimes be introduced, but proposes that none should be suffered to become obsolete. But what makes a word obsolete, more than general agreement to forbear it? and how shall it be continued, when it conveys an offensive idea, or recalled again into the mouths of mankind, when it has once by disuse become unfamiliar, and by unfamiliarity unpleasing.

There is another cause of alteration more prevalent than any other, which yet in the present state of the world cannot be obviated. A mixture of two languages will produce a third distinct from both, and they will always be mixed, where the chief part of education, and the most conspicuous accomplishment, is skill in ancient or in foreign tongues. He that has long cultivated another language, will find its words and combinations crowd upon his memory; and haste or negligence, refinement or affectation, will obtrude borrowed terms and exotic expressions.

The great pest of speech is frequency of translation. No book was ever turned from one language into another, without imparting something of its native idiom; this is the most mischievous and comprehensive innovation; single words may enter by thousands, and the fabric of the tongue continue the same, but new phraseology changes much at once; it alters not the single stones of the building, but the order<sup>1</sup> of the columns. If an academy should be established for the cultivation of our style, which I, who can never wish to see dependence multiplied, hope the spirit of English liberty will hinder or destroy, let them, instead of compiling grammars and dictionaries, endeavor with all their influence to stop the license of translators, whose idleness and ignorance, if it be suffered to proceed, will reduce us to babble a dialect of France.

If the changes that we fear be thus irresistible, what remains but to acquiesce with silence, as in the other insurmountable distresses of humanity? It remains that we retard what we cannot repel, that we palliate what we cannot cure. Life may be lengthened by care, though death cannot be ultimately defeated: tongues, like governments, have a natural tendency to degeneration; we have long preserved our constitution, let us make some struggles for our language.

In hope of giving longevity to that which its own nature forbids to be immortal, I have devoted this book, the labor of years, to the honor of my country, that we may no longer yield the palm of philology without a contest to the nations of the continent. The chief glory of every people arises from its authors: whether I shall add anything by my own writings to the reputation of English literature, must be left to time. Much of my life has been lost under the pressures of disease; much has been trifled away; and much has always been spent in provision for the day that was passing over me; but I shall not think my employment useless or ignoble, if by my assistance foreign nations, and distant ages, gain access to the propagators of knowledge, and understand the teachers of truth; if my labors afford light to the repositories of science, and add celebrity to Bacon, to Hooker, to Milton, and to Boyle.<sup>2</sup>

When I am animated by this wish, I look with pleasure on my book, however defective; and deliver it to the world with the spirit of a man that has endeavored well. That it will immediately become popular I have not promised to myself: a few wild blunders and risible absurdities, from which no work of such multiplicity was ever free, may for a time furnish folly with laughter, and harden ignorance in contempt; but useful diligence will at last prevail, and there never can be wanting some who distinguish desert;<sup>3</sup> who will consider that no dictionary of a living tongue ever can be perfect, since while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding, and some falling away; that a whole life cannot be spent upon syntax and etymology, and that even a whole life would not be sufficient; that he, whose design includes whatever language can express, must often speak of what he does not understand; that a writer will sometimes be hurried by eagerness to the end, and sometimes faint with weariness under a task, which Scaliger compares to the labors of the anvil and the mine;<sup>4</sup> that what is obvious is not always known, and what is known is not always present; that sudden fits of inadvertency will surprise vigilance, slight avocations<sup>5</sup> will reduce attention, and casual eclipses of the mind will darken learning; and that the writer shall often in vain trace his memory at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts tomorrow.

In this work, when it shall be found that much is omitted, let it not be forgotten that much likewise is performed; and though no book was ever spared out of tenderness to the author, and the world is little solicitous to know whence proceeded the faults of that which it condemns; yet it may gratify curiosity to inform it, that the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great;<sup>6</sup> not in the soft obscurities of retirement, or under the shelter of academic bowers, but amidst inconvenience and distraction, in sickness and in sorrow: and it may repress the triumph of malignant criticism to observe, that if our language is not here fully displayed, I have only failed in an attempt which no human powers have hitherto completed. If the lexicons of ancient tongues, now immutably fixed, and comprised in a few volumes, be yet, after the toil of successive ages, inadequate and delusive; if the aggregated knowledge and cooperating diligence of the Italian academicians did not secure them from the censure of Beni;<sup>7</sup> if the embodied critics of France, when fifty years had been spent upon their work, were obliged to change its economy,<sup>8</sup> and give their second edition another form, I may surely be contented without the praise of perfection, which, if I could obtain, in this gloom of solitude, what would it avail me? I have protracted my work till most of those whom I wished to please have sunk into the grave,<sup>9</sup> and success and miscarriage are empty sounds: I therefore dismiss it with frigid tranquility, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise.

[SOME DEFINITIONS: A SMALL ANTHOLOGY]<sup>1</sup>

To CI'VILIZE. v.a.<sup>2</sup>

To reclaim from savageness and brutality; to instruct in the arts of regular life.
We send the graces and the muses forth,
To civilize and to instruct the North.

Amongst those who are counted the civilized part of mankind, this original law of nature still takes place.

CO'LONY. n.s.<sup>5</sup>

1. A body of people drawn from the mother-country to inhabit some distant place.

Rooting out these two rebellious septs, he placed English colonies in their rooms.

Davie

2. The country planted; a plantation.

The rising city, which from far you see,
Is Carthage; and a Trojan colony.

Dry

CURIO'SITY. n.s.

1. Inquisitiveness; inclination to enquiry.

2. Nicety; delicacy.

When thou wast in thy gilt, and thy perfume, they mockt thee for too much curiosity; in thy rags thou knowest none, but art despised for the contrary.

Shakesp

3. Accuracy; exactness.

Our eyes and senses, however armed or assisted, are too gross to discern the curiosity of the workmanship of nature.

Ray on

4. An act of curiosity; nice experiment.

There hath been practiced also a curiosity, to set a tree upon the north-side of a wall, and, at a little height, to draw it through the wall, and spread it upon the south-side; conceiving that the root and lower part of the stock should enjoy the freshness of the shade, and the upper boughs and fruit, the comfort of the sun; but it sorted not.

Bacon's

5. An object of curiosity; rarity.

We took a ramble together to see the curiosities of this great town.

Addison's Freeholder, No. 47.<sup>2</sup>

ENTHU'SIASM. n.s.

1. A vain belief of private revelation; a vain confidence of divine favor or communication.

Enthusiasm is founded neither on reason nor divine revelation, but rises from the conceits of a warmed or overweening brain.

2. Heat of imagination; violence of passion; confidence of opinion.

3. Elevation of fancy; exaltation of ideas.

Imaging is, in itself, the very height and life of poetry, which, by a kind of enthusiasm, or extraordinary emotion of soul, makes it seem to us that we behold those things which the poet paints.

Dryden's

GE'NIUS. n.s.

1. The protecting or ruling power of men, places, or things.

And as I awake, sweet music breathe,
Sent by some spirit to mortals good,
Or th' unseen genius of the wood.

2. A man endowed with superior faculties.

There is no little writer of Pindaric who is not mentioned as a prodigious genius.

3. Mental power or faculties.

4. Disposition of nature by which any one is qualified for some peculiar employment.

5. Nature; disposition.

LEXICO'GRAPHER. n.s.

A writer of dictionaries; a harmless drudge, that busies himself in tracing the original, and detailing the signification of words.

MELANCHO'LY. n.s.

1. A disease, supposed to proceed from a redundance of black bile; but it is better known to arise from too heavy and too viscid blood: its cure is in evacuation, nervous medicines, and powerful stimuli.

2. A kind of madness, in which the mind is always fixed on one object.

3. A gloomy, pensive, discontented temper.

NA'TURE. n.s.

1. An imaginary being supposed to preside over the material and animal world.

Thou, nature, art my goddess; to thy law
My services are bound.

Shakespeare

2. The native state or properties of any thing, by which it is discriminated from others.

3. The constitution of an animated body.

4. Disposition of mind; temper.

5. The regular course of things.

6. The compass of natural existence.

If their dam may be judge, the young apes are the most beautiful things in nature.

7. Natural affection, or reverence; native sensations.

8. The state or operation of the material world.

9. Sort; species.

10. Sentiments or images adapted to nature, or conformable to truth and reality.

11. Physics; the science which teaches the qualities of things.

Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night,
God said, Let Newton be, and all was light.

PA'TRON. n.s.

1. One who countenances, supports or protects. Commonly a wretch who supports with insolence, and is paid with flattery.

PI'RATE. n.s.

1. A sea-robber.

Relate, if business or the thirst of gain
Engage your journey o'er the pathless main,
Where savage pirates seek through seas unknown
The lives of others, vent'rous of their own.

2. Any robber; particularly a bookseller who seizes the copies of other men.

SA'TIRE. n.s.

A poem in which wickedness or folly is censured. Proper satire is distinguished, by the generality of the reflections, from a lampoon which is aimed against a particular person; but they are too frequently confounded.

SA'VAGE. n.s.

A man untaught and uncivilized; a barbarian.

To deprive us of metals is to make us mere savages; to change our corn for the old Arcadian diet, our houses and cities for dens and caves, and our clothing for skins of beasts: 'tis to bereave us of all arts and sciences, nay, of revealed religion.

TA'LENT. n.s.

1. A talent signified so much weight, or a sum of money, the value differing according to the different ages and countries.

2. Faculty; power; gift of nature. A metaphor borrowed from the talents mentioned in the holy writ.

Persons who possess the true talent of raillery are like comets; they are seldom seen, and all at once admired and feared.

Fe

3. Quality; nature. An improper and mistaken use.

WIT. n.s.

1. The powers of the mind; the mental faculties; the intellects. This is the original signification.

2. Imagination; quickness of fancy.

3. Sentiments produced by quickness of fancy.

The definition of wit is only this; that it is a propriety of thoughts and words; or, in other terms, thoughts and words elegantly adapted to the subject.

4. A man of fancy.

To tell them wou'd a hundred tongues require;
Or one vain wit's, that might a hundred tire.

5. A man of genius.

6. Sense; judgment.

7. In the plural. Sound mind; intellect not crazed.

Sound sleep cometh of moderate eating; he riseth early, and his wits are with him: but the pain of watching, and choler, and pangs of the belly, are with an insatiable man.

Ei

8. Contrivance; stratagem; power of expedients.

The Preface to Shakespeare This is the finest piece of Shakespeare criticism in the eighteenth century; it culminates a critical tradition that began with John Dryden's remarks on Shakespeare and continued as the plays were edited by Nicholas Rowe, Alexander Pope, Lewis Theobald, and William Warburton. Johnson addresses the standard topics: Shakespeare is the poet of nature, not learning; the creator of characters who spring to life; and a writer whose works express the full range of human passions. But the Preface also takes a fresh look not only at the plays but at the first principles of criticism. Resisting "bardolatry"—uncritical worship of Shakespeare—Johnson points out his faults as well as his virtues and finds that his truth to life, or "just representations of general nature," surpasses that of all other modern writers.

From The Preface to Shakespeare

[SHAKESPEARE'S EXCELLENCE, GENERAL NATURE]

That praises are without reason lavished on the dead, and that the honors due only to excellence are paid to antiquity, is a complaint likely to be always continued by those who, being able to add nothing to truth, hope for eminence from the heresies of paradox; or those who, being forced by disappointment upon consolatory expedients, are willing to hope from posterity what the present age refuses, and flatter themselves that the regard which is yet denied by envy will be at last bestowed by time.

Antiquity, like every other quality that attracts the notice of mankind, has undoubtedly votaries that reverence it not from reason but from prejudice. Some seem to admire indiscriminately whatever has been long preserved, without considering that time has sometimes cooperated with chance; all perhaps are more willing to honor past than present excellence; and the mind contemplates genius through the shades of age, as the eye surveys the sun through artificial opacity. The great contention of criticism is to find the faults of the moderns and the beauties of the ancients. While an author is yet living we estimate his powers by his worst performance; and when he is dead we rate them by his best.

To works, however, of which the excellence is not absolute and definite, but gradual and comparative; to works not raised upon principles demonstrative and scientific, but appealing wholly to observation and experience, no other test can be applied than length of duration and continuance of esteem. What mankind have long possessed they have often examined and compared; and if they persist to value the possession, it is because frequent comparisons have confirmed opinion in its favor. As among the works of nature no man can properly call a river deep or a mountain high, without the knowledge of many mountains and many rivers; so in the productions of genius, nothing can be styled excellent till it has been compared with other works of the same kind. Demonstration<sup>1</sup> immediately displays its power and has nothing to hope or fear from the flux of years; but works tentative and experimental must be estimated by their proportion to the general and collective ability of man, as it is discovered in a long succession of endeavors. Of the first building that was raised, it might be with certainty determined that it was round or square, but whether it was spacious or lofty must have been referred to time. The Pythagorean scale of numbers<sup>2</sup> was at once discovered to be perfect; but the poems of Homer we yet know not to transcend the common limits of human intelligence, but by remarking that nation after nation, and century after century, has been able to do little more than transpose his incidents, new name his characters, and paraphrase his sentiments.

The reverence due to writings that have long subsisted arises, therefore, not from any credulous confidence in the superior wisdom of past ages, or gloomy persuasion of the degeneracy of mankind, but is the consequence of acknowledged and indubitable positions, that what has been longest known has been most considered, and what is most considered is best understood.

The poet of whose works I have undertaken the revision may now begin to assume the dignity of an ancient and claim the privilege of established fame and prescriptive veneration. He has long outlived his century, the term commonly fixed as the test of literary merit.<sup>3</sup> Whatever advantages he might once derive from personal allusions, local customs, or temporary opinions, have for many years been lost; and every topic of merriment or motive of sorrow which the modes of artificial life afforded him now only obscure the scenes which they once illuminated. The effects of favor and competition are at an end; the tradition of his friendships and his enmities has perished; his works support no opinion with arguments nor supply any faction with invectives; they can neither indulge vanity nor gratify malignity; but are read without any other reason than the desire of pleasure, and are therefore praised only as pleasure is obtained; yet, thus unassisted by interest or passion, they have passed through variations of taste and changes of manners, and, as they devolved from one generation to another, have received new honors at every transmission.

But because human judgment, though it be gradually gaining upon certainty, never becomes infallible, and approbation, though long continued, may yet be only the approbation of prejudice or fashion, it is proper to inquire by what peculiarities of excellence Shakespeare has gained and kept the favor of his countrymen.

Nothing can please many, and please long, but just representations of general nature. Particular manners can be known to few, and therefore few only can judge how nearly they are copied. The irregular combinations of fanciful invention may delight awhile by that novelty of which the common satiety of life sends us all in quest; but the pleasures of sudden wonder are soon exhausted, and the mind can only repose on the stability of truth.

Shakespeare is, above all writers, at least above all modern writers, the poet of nature, the poet that holds up to his readers a faithful mirror of manners and of life. His characters are not modified by the customs of particular places, unpracticed by the rest of the world; by the peculiarities of studies or professions, which can operate but upon small numbers; or by the accidents of transient fashions or temporary opinions: they are the genuine progeny of common humanity, such as the world will always supply and observation will always find. His persons act and speak by the influence of those general passions and principles by which all minds are agitated and the whole system of life is continued in motion. In the writings of other poets a character is too often an individual: in those of Shakespeare it is commonly a species.

It is from this wide extension of design that so much instruction is derived. It is this which fills the plays of Shakespeare with practical axioms and domestic wisdom. It was said of Euripides<sup>4</sup> that every verse was a precept; and it may be said of Shakespeare that from his works may be collected a system of civil and economical prudence. Yet his real power is not shown in the splendor of particular passages, but by the progress of his fable<sup>5</sup> and the tenor of his dialogue; and he that tries to recommend him by select quotations will succeed like the pedant in Hierocles<sup>6</sup> who, when he offered his house to sale, carried a brick in his pocket as a specimen.

It will not easily be imagined how much Shakespeare excels in accommodating his sentiments to real life but by comparing him with other authors. It was observed of the ancient schools of declamation that the more diligently they were frequented, the more was the student disqualified for the world, because he found nothing there which he should ever meet in any other place. The same remark may be applied to every stage but that of Shakespeare. The theater, when it is under any other direction, is peopled by such characters as were never seen, conversing in a language which was never heard, upon topics which will never arise in the commerce of mankind. But the dialogue of this author is often so evidently determined by the incident which produces it, and is pursued with so much ease and simplicity, that it seems scarcely to claim the merit of fiction, but to have been gleaned by diligent selection out of common conversation and common occurrences.

Upon every other stage the universal agent is love, by whose power all good and evil is distributed and every action quickened or retarded. To bring a lover, a lady, and a rival into the fable; to entangle them in contradictory obligations, perplex them with oppositions of interest, and harass them with violence of desires inconsistent with each other; to make them meet in rapture, and part in agony; to fill their mouths with hyperbolical joy and outrageous sorrow; to distress them as nothing human ever was distressed; to deliver them as nothing human ever was delivered, is the business of a modern dramatist. For this, probability is violated, life is misrepresented, and language is depraved. But love is only one of many passions; and as it has no great influence upon the sum of life, it has little operation in the dramas of a poet who caught his ideas from the living world and exhibited only what he saw before him. He knew that any other passion, as it was regular or exorbitant, was a cause of happiness or calamity.

Characters thus ample and general were not easily discriminated and preserved; yet perhaps no poet ever kept his personages more distinct from each other. I will not say with Pope that every speech may be assigned to the proper speaker,<sup>7</sup> because many speeches there are which have nothing characteristical; but perhaps though some may be equally adapted to every person, it will be difficult to find that any can be properly transferred from the present possessor to another claimant. The choice is right when there is reason for choice.

Other dramatists can only gain attention by hyperbolical or aggravated characters, by fabulous and unexampled excellence or depravity, as the writers of barbarous romances invigorated the reader by a giant and a dwarf; and he that should form his expectations of human affairs from the play or from the tale would be equally deceived. Shakespeare has no heroes; his scenes are occupied only by men, who act and speak as the reader thinks that he should himself have spoken or acted on the same occasion; even where the agency is supernatural, the dialogue is level with life. Other writers disguise the most natural passions and most frequent incidents so that he who contemplates them in the book will not know them in the world: Shakespeare approximates<sup>8</sup> the remote, and familiarizes the wonderful; the event which he represents will not happen, but, if it were possible, its effects would probably be such as he has assigned; and it may be said that he has not only shown human nature as it acts in real exigencies, but as it would be found in trials to which it cannot be exposed.

This therefore is the praise of Shakespeare, that his drama is the mirror of life; that he who has mazed his imagination in following the phantoms which other writers raise up before him, may here be cured of his delirious ecstasies by reading human sentiments in human language, by scenes from which a hermit may estimate the transactions of the world, and a confessor predict the progress of the passions.

[SHAKESPEARE'S FAULTS]

Shakespeare with his excellencies has likewise faults, and faults sufficient to obscure and overwhelm any other merit. I shall show them in the proportion in which they appear to me, without envious malignity or superstitious veneration. No question can be more innocently discussed than a dead poet's pretensions to renown; and little regard is due to that bigotry which sets candor<sup>9</sup> higher than truth.

His first defect is that to which may be imputed most of the evil in books or in men. He sacrifices virtue to convenience, and is so much more careful to please than to instruct that he seems to write without any moral purpose. From his writings indeed a system of social duty may be selected, for he that thinks reasonably must think morally, but his precepts and axioms drop casually from him; he makes no just distribution of good or evil, nor is always careful to show in the virtuous a disapprobation of the wicked; he carries his persons indifferently through right and wrong, and at the close dismisses them without further care, and leaves their examples to operate by chance. This fault the barbarity of his age cannot extenuate; for it is always a writer's duty to make the world better, and justice is a virtue independent on time or place.

The plots are often so loosely formed that a very slight consideration may improve them, and so carelessly pursued that he seems not always fully to comprehend his own design. He omits opportunities of instructing or delighting which the train of his story seems to force upon him, and apparently rejects those exhibitions which would be more affecting for the sake of those which are more easy.

It may be observed that in many of his plays the latter part is evidently neglected. When he found himself near the end of his work, and in view of his reward, he shortened the labor to snatch the profit. He therefore remits his efforts where he should most vigorously exert them, and his catastrophe is improbably produced or imperfectly represented.

He had no regard to distinction of time or place, but gives to one age or nation, without scruple, the customs, institutions, and opinions of another, at the expense not only of likelihood but of possibility. These faults Pope has endeavored, with more zeal than judgment, to transfer to his imagined interpolators. We need not wonder to find Hector quoting Aristotle, when we see the loves of Theseus and Hippolyta combined with the Gothic mythology of fairies.<sup>1</sup> Shakespeare, indeed, was not the only violator of chronology, for in the same age Sidney, who wanted not the advantages of learning, has, in his Arcadia, confounded the pastoral with the feudal times, the days of innocence, quiet, and security with those of turbulence, violence, and adventure.

In his comic scenes he is seldom very successful when he engages his characters in reciprocations of smartness and contests of sarcasm; their jests are commonly gross, and their pleasantry licentious; neither his gentlemen nor his ladies have much delicacy, nor are sufficiently distinguished from his clowns<sup>2</sup> by any appearance of refined manners. Whether he represented the real conversation of his time is not easy to determine: the reign of Elizabeth is commonly supposed to have been a time of stateliness, formality, and reserve; yet perhaps the relaxations of that severity were not very elegant. There must, however, have been always some modes of gaiety preferable to others, and a writer ought to choose the best.

In tragedy his performance seems constantly to be worse as his labor is more. The effusions of passion, which exigence forces out, are for the most part striking and energetic; but whenever he solicits his invention, or strains his faculties, the offspring of his throes is tumor,<sup>3</sup> meanness, tediousness, and obscurity.

In narration he affects a disproportionate pomp of diction and a wearisome train of circumlocution, and tells the incident imperfectly in many words which might have been more plainly delivered in few. Narration in dramatic poetry is naturally tedious, as it is unanimated and inactive, and obstructs the progress of the action; it should therefore always be rapid and enlivened by frequent interruption. Shakespeare found it an encumbrance, and instead of lightening it by brevity, endeavored to recommend it by dignity and splendor.

His declamations or set speeches are commonly cold and weak, for his power was the power of nature; when he endeavored, like other tragic writers, to catch opportunities of amplification and, instead of inquiring what the occasion demanded, to show how much his stores of knowledge could supply, he seldom escapes without the pity or resentment of his reader.

It is incident to him to be now and then entangled with an unwieldy sentiment which he cannot well express, and will not reject; he struggles with it awhile, and, if it continues stubborn, comprises it in words such as occur, and leaves it to be disentangled and evolved<sup>4</sup> by those who have more leisure to bestow upon it.

Not that always where the language is intricate the thought is subtle, or the image always great where the line is bulky; the equality of words to things is very often neglected, and trivial sentiments and vulgar<sup>5</sup> ideas disappoint the attention, to which they are recommended by sonorous epithets and swelling figures.

But the admirers of this great poet have most reason to complain when he approaches nearest to his highest excellence, and seems fully resolved to sink them in dejection and mollify them with tender emotions by the fall of greatness, the danger of innocence, or the crosses of love. What he does best, he soon ceases to do. He is not long soft and pathetic without some idle conceit or contemptible equivocation. He no sooner begins to move than he counteracts himself; and terror and pity, as they are rising in the mind, are checked and blasted by sudden frigidity.

A quibble<sup>6</sup> is to Shakespeare what luminous vapors are to the traveler: he follows it at all adventures; it is sure to lead him out of his way, and sure to engulf him in the mire. It has some malignant power over his mind, and its fascinations are irresistible. Whatever be the dignity or profundity of his disquisitions, whether he be enlarging knowledge or exalting affection, whether he be amusing<sup>7</sup> attention with incidents, or enchaining it in suspense, let but a quibble spring up before him, and he leaves his work unfinished. A quibble is the golden apple for which he will always turn aside from his career<sup>8</sup> or stoop from his elevation. A quibble, poor and barren as it is, gave him such delight that he was content to purchase it by the sacrifice of reason, propriety, and truth. A quibble was to him the fatal Cleopatra for which he lost the world, and was content to lose it.

It will be thought strange that in enumerating the defects of this writer, I have not yet mentioned his neglect of the unities; his violation of those laws which have been instituted and established by the joint authority of poets and critics.

For his other deviations from the art of writing, I resign him to critical justice without making any other demand in his favor than that which must be indulged to all human excellence: that his virtues be rated with his failings. But from the censure which this irregularity may bring upon him I shall, with due reverence to that learning which I must oppose, adventure to try how I can defend him.

His histories, being neither tragedies nor comedies, are not subject to any of their laws; nothing more is necessary to all the praise which they expect than that the changes of action be so prepared as to be understood; that the incidents be various and affecting, and the characters consistent, natural, and distinct. No other unity is intended, and therefore none is to be sought.

In his other works he has well enough preserved the unity of action. He has not, indeed, an intrigue regularly perplexed and regularly unraveled: he does not endeavor to hide his design only to discover it, for this is seldom the order of real events, and Shakespeare is the poet of nature: but his plan has commonly what Aristotle requires,<sup>9</sup> a beginning, a middle, and an end; one event is concatenated with another, and the conclusion follows by easy consequence. There are, perhaps, some incidents that might be spared, as in other poets there is much talk that only fills up time upon the stage; but the general system makes gradual advances, and the end of the play is the end of expectation.

JAMES BOSWELL

1740–1795

The discovery of a vast number of James Boswell's personal papers (believed until 1925 to have been destroyed by his literary executors) has made it possible to know the author of The Life of Samuel Johnson as well as we can know anybody from the past. His published letters and journals have made modern readers aware of the serious and absurd, the charming and repellent sides of his character. At twenty-two, when he met Johnson, he had already trained himself to listen, to observe, and to remember until he found time to write it all down. Only rarely did he take notes while a conversation was in progress, since to do so would of course have been a serious breach of social etiquette. His unusual memory and disciplined art enabled him to re-create and vividly preserve the many "scenes" that distinguish his journals as they do the Life.

Boswell was the eldest son and heir of Alexander Boswell of Auchinleck (pronounced Affléck) in Ayreshire, in Scotland, a judge who bore the courtesy title of Lord Auchinleck. As a member of an ancient family and heir to its large estate, Boswell was in the technical sense of the term a gentleman, with entrée into the best circles of Edinburgh and London. By temperament he was unstable, emotionally and sexually skittish. After attending the universities of Edinburgh and Glasgow and studying law in Holland, he made the grand tour of Europe; in Switzerland he met and succeeded in captivating the two foremost French men of letters, Jean-Jacques

Rousseau and Voltaire. He visited the beleaguered hero of Corsica, General Pasquale de Paoli, whose revolt against Genoa seemed to European liberals to embody all the civic and military virtues of Republican Rome. Upon returning to England, Boswell wrote An Account of Corsica (1768). It was promptly translated into Dutch, German, French, and Italian, and its young author found himself with a considerable European reputation.

By 1769, Boswell was established in what was to prove a successful law practice in Edinburgh and had married his cousin, Margaret Montgomerie. But he kept his ties to London and Johnson. In 1773, he fulfilled a plan first suggested by Johnson ten years earlier to tour the Scottish Highlands and Hebrides together, which resulted in a book by each. Almost every aspect of the adventure should have made it impossible. Johnson, nearing his sixty-fourth birthday and after years of sedentary city living, found himself astride a horse in wild country or in open boats in autumn weather. As a devout Anglican, he was an outspoken enemy of the Presbyterian Church. As a lover of London, he was a stranger to the primitive life of the Highlands. Moreover, for many years he had half-jestingly, half-seriously, made Scots the butt of his wit. But such were Boswell's social tact and Johnson's vigor and curiosity that the tour was a great success. Johnson's Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland (1775) is a thoughtful account of the way that people live in the Hebrides (though some Scots were offended). Boswell's Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides (1785), a preliminary study for the Life, is a lively and entertaining diary that amused Johnson himself.

In 1786, four years after Johnson's death, Boswell abandoned his Scottish practice; moved to London; was admitted to the English bar (but never actually practiced); and, often depressed and drunken, began the Life. Fortunately he had the help and encouragement of the distinguished literary scholar Edmond Malone, without whose guidance he might never have finished his task.

Boswell had an overwhelming amount of material to deal with: his own journals, all of Johnson's letters that he could find, Johnson's voluminous writings, and every scrap of information that his friends would furnish—all of which had to be collected, verified, and somehow reduced to unity. The Life is a record not of Johnson alone but of literary England during the last half of the century. But Boswell wrote with his eye on the object, and that object was Samuel Johnson, toward whom such eminent persons as Sir Joshua Reynolds, Edmund Burke, Oliver Goldsmith, Lord Chesterfield—even the king himself—always face. Individual episodes are designed to reveal the great protagonist in a variety of aspects, and the world that Boswell created and populated is sustained by the vitality of his hero.

Boswell's talent is not only narrative but also dramatic. A gifted mimic, he often writes like a theatrical improviser, creating scenes with living people and playing simultaneously the roles of contriver of the dialogue, director of the plot, actor in the drama, and applauding audience—for Boswell kept an eye on his own performance. The quintessence of Boswell as both a social genius and a literary artist is to be found in his description of his visit to Voltaire: "I placed myself by him. I touched the keys in unison with his imagination. I wish you had heard the music."

Although the Johnson of popular legend is largely Boswell's creation, there was much in his life about which Boswell had no firsthand knowledge. At their first meeting, Johnson was fifty-four, a widower, already established as "Dictionary" Johnson and the author of the Rambler, and pensioned by the Crown. Boswell knew nothing at firsthand of the long, hard years during which Johnson made his way painfully up from obscurity to fame. And Boswell, himself a glib and rather thoughtless opponent of the abolitionist movement (see p. 981), mostly suppressed or downplayed Johnson's ardent hatred of slavery. Hence the Life is a portrait of the sage as Boswell wanted him to be. Its chief glory is conversation: the talk of a man who has experienced broadly, read widely, and observed and reflected on his observations; whose ideas are constantly brought to the test of experience; and whose experience is habitually transmuted into ideas. The book is as large as life and as human as its central character.

[PLAN OF THE LIFE]

* * * Had Dr. Johnson written his own life, in conformity with the opinion which he has given, that every man's life may be best written by himself;<sup>1</sup> had he employed in the preservation of his own history, that clearness of narration and elegance of language in which he has embalmed so many eminent persons, the world would probably have had the most perfect example of biography that was ever exhibited. But although he at different times, in a desultory manner, committed to writing many particulars of the progress of his mind and fortunes, he never had persevering diligence enough to form them into a regular composition. Of these memorials a few have been preserved; but the greater part was consigned by him to the flames, a few days before his death.

As I had the honor and happiness of enjoying his friendship for upwards of twenty years; as I had the scheme of writing his life constantly in view; as he was well apprised of this circumstance, and from time to time obligingly satisfied my inquiries, by communicating to me the incidents of his early years; as I acquired a facility in recollecting, and was very assiduous in recording, his conversation, of which the extraordinary vigor and vivacity constituted one of the first features of his character; and as I have spared no pains in obtaining materials concerning him, from every quarter where I could discover that they were to be found, and have been favored with the most liberal communications by his friends; I flatter myself that few biographers have entered upon such a work as this with more advantages; independent of literary abilities, in which I am not vain enough to compare myself with some great names who have gone before me in this kind of writing. * * *

Instead of melting down my materials into one mass, and constantly speaking in my own person, by which I might have appeared to have more merit in the execution of the work, I have resolved to adopt and enlarge upon the excellent plan of Mr. Mason, in his Memoirs of Gray.<sup>2</sup> Wherever narrative is necessary to explain, connect, and supply, I furnish it to the best of my abilities; but in the chronological series of Johnson's life, which I trace as distinctly as I can, year by year, I produce, wherever it is in my power, his own minutes, letters, or conversation, being convinced that this mode is more lively, and will make my readers better acquainted with him than even most of those were who actually knew him, but could know him only partially; whereas there is here an accumulation of intelligence from various points, by which his character is more fully understood and illustrated.

Indeed I cannot conceive a more perfect mode of writing any man's life than not only relating all the most important events of it in their order, but interweaving what he privately wrote, and said, and thought; by which mankind are enabled as it were to see him live, and to "live o'er each scene"<sup>3</sup> with him, as he actually advanced through the several stages of his life. Had his other friends been as diligent and ardent as I was, he might have been almost entirely preserved. As it is, I will venture to say that he will be seen in this work more completely than any man who has ever yet lived.

And he will be seen as he really was; for I profess to write, not his panegyric, which must be all praise, but his Life; which, great and good as he was, must not be supposed to be entirely perfect. To be as he was, is indeed subject of panegyric enough to any man in this state of being; but in every picture there should be shade as well as light, and when I delineate him without reserve, I do what he himself recommended, both by his precept and his example.

* * *

Of one thing I am certain, that considering how highly the small portion which we have of the table-talk and other anecdotes of our celebrated writers is valued, and how earnestly it is regretted that we have not more, I am justified in preserving rather too many of Johnson's sayings, than too few; especially as from the diversity of dispositions it cannot be known with certainty beforehand, whether what may seem trifling to some, and perhaps to the collector himself, may not be most agreeable to many; and the greater number that an author can please in any degree, the more pleasure does there arise to a benevolent mind. * * *

[THE LETTER TO CHESTERFIELD]

[1754] Lord Chesterfield,<sup>4</sup> to whom Johnson had paid the high compliment of addressing to his Lordship the Plan of his Dictionary, had behaved to him in such a manner as to excite his contempt and indignation. The world has been for many years amused with a story confidently told, and as confidently repeated with additional circumstances, that a sudden disgust was taken by Johnson upon occasion of his having been one day kept long in waiting in his Lordship's antechamber, for which the reason assigned was that he had company with him; and that at last, when the door opened, out walked Colley Cibber,<sup>5</sup> and that Johnson was so violently provoked when he found for whom he had been so long excluded, that he went away in a passion, and never would return. I remember having mentioned this story to George Lord Lyttelton, who told me he was very intimate with Lord Chesterfield; and holding it as a well-known truth, defended Lord Chesterfield, by saying, that Cibber, who had been introduced familiarly by the back stairs, had probably not been there above ten minutes. It may seem strange even to entertain a doubt concerning a story so long and so widely current, and thus implicitly adopted, if not sanctioned, by the authority which I have mentioned; but Johnson himself assured me that there was not the least foundation for it. He told me that there never was any particular incident which produced a quarrel between Lord Chesterfield and him; but that his Lordship's continued neglect was the reason why he resolved to have no connection with him. When the Dictionary was upon the eve of publication, Lord Chesterfield, who, it is said, had flattered himself with expectations that Johnson would dedicate the work to him, attempted, in a courtly manner, to soothe, and insinuate himself with the sage, conscious, as it should seem, of the cold indifference with which he had treated its learned author; and further attempted to conciliate him, by writing two papers in The World, in recommendation of the work; and it must be confessed that they contain some studied compliments, so finely turned, that if there had been no previous offense, it is probable that

Johnson would have been highly delighted. Praise, in general, was pleasing to him; but by praise from a man of rank and elegant accomplishments, he was peculiarly gratified. * * *

This courtly device failed of its effect. Johnson, who thought that "all was false and hollow,"<sup>6</sup> despised the honeyed words, and was even indignant that Lord Chesterfield should, for a moment, imagine that he could be dupe of such an artifice. His expression to me concerning Lord Chesterfield, upon this occasion, was, "Sir, after making great professions, he had, for many years, taken no notice of me; but when my Dictionary was coming out, he fell a-scribbling in The World about it. Upon which, I wrote him a letter expressed in civil terms, but such as might show him that I did not mind what he said or wrote, and that I had done with him."

This is that celebrated letter of which so much has been said, and about which curiosity has been so long excited, without being gratified. I for many years solicited Johnson to favor me with a copy of it, that so excellent a composition might not be lost to posterity. He delayed from time to time to give it me; till at last in 1781, when we were on a visit at Mr. Dilly's,<sup>7</sup> at Southill in Bedfordshire, he was pleased to dictate it to me from memory. He afterwards found among his papers a copy of it, which he had dictated to Mr. Baretti,<sup>8</sup> with its title and corrections, in his own handwriting. This he gave to Mr. Langton; adding that if it were to come into print, he wished it to be from that copy. By Mr. Langton's kindness, I am enabled to enrich my work with a perfect transcript of what the world has so eagerly desired to see.

TO THE RIGHT HONORABLE THE EARL OF CHESTERFIELD

February 7, 1755

MY LORD,

I have been lately informed, by the proprietor of the World, that two papers, in which my Dictionary is recommended to the public, were written by your Lordship. To be so distinguished, is an honor, which, being very little accustomed to favors from the great, I know not well how to receive, or in what terms to acknowledge.

When, upon some slight encouragement, I first visited your Lordship, I was overpowered, like the rest of mankind, by the enchantment of your address; and could not forbear to wish that I might boast myself Le vainqueur du vainqueur de la terre<sup>9</sup>—that I might obtain that regard for which I saw the world contending; but I found my attendance so little encouraged that neither pride nor modesty would suffer me to continue it. When I had once addressed your Lordship in public, I had exhausted all the art of pleasing which a retired and uncourtly scholar can possess. I had done all that I could; and no man is well pleased to have his all neglected, be it ever so little.

Seven years, my Lord, have now passed since I waited in your outward rooms, or was repulsed from your door; during which time I have been pushing on my work through difficulties of which it is useless to complain, and have brought it, at last, to the verge of publication, without one act of assistance, one word of encouragement, or one smile of favor. Such treatment I did not expect, for I never had a patron before.

The shepherd in Virgil grew at last acquainted with Love, and found him a native of the rocks.<sup>1</sup>

Is not a patron, my Lord, one who looks with unconcern on a man struggling for life in the water, and, when he has reached ground, encumbers him with help? The notice which you have been pleased to take of my labors, had it been early, had been kind; but it has been delayed till I am indifferent, and cannot enjoy it; till I am solitary, and cannot impart it; till I am known, and do not want it. I hope it is no very cynical asperity not to confess obligations where no benefit has been received, or to be unwilling that the public should consider me as owing that to a patron which Providence has enabled me to do for myself.

Having carried on my work thus far with so little obligation to any favorer of learning, I shall not be disappointed though I should conclude it, if less be possible, with less; for I have been long awakened from that dream of hope in which I once boasted myself with so much exultation, my Lord, your Lordship's most humble, most obedient servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

"While this was the talk of the town," says Dr. Adams, in a letter to me, "I happened to visit Dr. Warburton,<sup>2</sup> who finding that I was acquainted with Johnson, desired me earnestly to carry his compliments to him, and to tell him that he honored him for his manly behavior in rejecting these condescensions of Lord Chesterfield, and for resenting the treatment he had received from him, with a proper spirit. Johnson was visibly pleased with this compliment, for he had always a high opinion of Warburton. Indeed, the force of mind which appeared in this letter was congenial with that which Warburton himself amply possessed."

There is a curious minute circumstance which struck me, in comparing the various editions of Johnson's imitations of Juvenal. In the tenth satire, one of the couplets upon the vanity of wishes even for literary distinction stood thus:

Yet think what ills the scholar's life assail,
Toil, envy, want, the garret, and the jail.

But after experiencing the uneasiness which Lord Chesterfield's fallacious patronage made him feel, he dismissed the word garret from the sad group, and in all the subsequent editions the line stands

Toil, envy, want, the patron, and the jail.

[1762] The accession of George the Third to the throne of these kingdoms<sup>3</sup> opened a new and brighter prospect to men of literary merit, who had been honored with no mark of royal favor in the preceding reign. His present Majesty's education in this country, as well as his taste and beneficence, prompted him to be the patron of science and the arts; and early this year Johnson, having been represented to him as a very learned and good man, without any certain provision, his Majesty was pleased to grant him a pension of three hundred pounds a year. The Earl of Bute,<sup>4</sup> who was then Prime Minister, had the honor to announce this instance of his Sovereign's bounty, concerning which many and various stories, all equally erroneous, have been propagated: maliciously representing it as a political bribe to Johnson, to desert his avowed principles, and become the tool of a government which he held to be founded in usurpation. I have taken care to have it in my power to refute them from the most authentic information. Lord Bute told me that Mr. Wedderburne, now Lord Loughborough, was the person who first mentioned this subject to him. Lord Loughborough told me that the pension was granted to Johnson solely as the reward of his literary merit, without any stipulation whatever, or even tacit understanding that he should write for administration. His Lordship added that he was confident the political tracts which Johnson afterwards did write, as they were entirely consonant with his own opinions, would have been written by him though no pension had been granted to him.<sup>5</sup>*

[A MEMORABLE YEAR: BOSWELL MEETS JOHNSON]

[1763] This is to me a memorable year; for in it I had the happiness to obtain the acquaintance of that extraordinary man whose memoirs I am now writing; an acquaintance which I shall ever esteem as one of the most fortunate circumstances in my life. * * *

Mr. Thomas Davies the actor, who then kept a bookseller's shop in Russel Street, Covent Garden, told me that Johnson was very much his friend, and came frequently to his house, where he more than once invited me to meet him; but by some unlucky accident or other he was prevented from coming to us. * * *

At last, on Monday the 16th of May, when I was sitting in Mr. Davies's back parlor, after having drunk tea with him and Mrs. Davies, Johnson unexpectedly came into the shop; and Mr. Davies having perceived him through the glass door in the room in which we were sitting, advancing towards us—he announced his awful approach to me, somewhat in the manner of an actor in the part of Horatio, when he addresses Hamlet on the appearance of his father's ghost, "Look, my Lord, it comes." I found that I had a very perfect idea of Johnson's figure, from the portrait of him painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds soon after he had published his Dictionary, in the attitude of sitting in his easy chair in deep meditation, which was the first picture his friend did for him, which Sir Joshua very kindly presented to me, and from which an engraving has been made for this work. Mr. Davies mentioned my name, and respectfully introduced me to him. I was much agitated; and recollecting his prejudice against the Scotch, of which I had heard much, I said to Davies, "Don't tell where I come from."—"From Scotland," cried Davies roguishly. "Mr. Johnson," said I, "I do indeed come from Scotland, but I cannot help it." I am willing to flatter myself that I meant this as light pleasantry to soothe and conciliate him, and not as an humiliating abasement at the expense of my country. But however that might be, this speech was somewhat unlucky; for with that quickness of wit for which he was so remarkable, he seized the expression "come from Scotland," which I used in the sense of being of that country; and, as if I had said that I had come away from it, or left it, retorted, "That, Sir, I find, is what a very great many of your countrymen cannot help." This stroke stunned me a good deal; and when we had sat down, I felt myself not a little embarrassed, and apprehensive of what might come next. He then addressed himself to Davies: "What do you think of Garrick? He has refused me an order for the play for Miss Williams,<sup>6</sup> because he knows the house will be full, and that an order would be worth three shillings." Eager to take any opening to get into conversation with him, I ventured to say, "O Sir, I cannot think Mr. Garrick would grudge such a trifle to you." "Sir," said he, with a stern look, "I have known David Garrick longer than you have done: and I know no right you have to talk to me on the subject." Perhaps I deserved this check; for it was rather presumptuous in me, an entire stranger, to express any doubt of the justice of his animadversion upon his old acquaintance and pupil. I now felt myself much mortified, and began to think that the hope which I had long indulged of obtaining his acquaintance was blasted. And, in truth, had not my ardor been uncommonly strong, and my resolution uncommonly persevering, so rough a reception might have deterred me forever from making any further attempts. Fortunately, however, I remained upon the field not wholly discomfited. * * *

I was highly pleased with the extraordinary vigor of his conversation, and regretted that I was drawn away from it by an engagement at another place. I had, for a part of the evening, been left alone with him, and had ventured to make an observation now and then, which he received very civilly; so that I was satisfied that though there was a roughness in his manner, there was no ill nature in his disposition. Davies followed me to the door, and when I complained to him a little of the hard blows which the great man had given me, he kindly took upon him to console me by saying, "Don't be uneasy. I can see he likes you very well."

A few days afterwards I called on Davies, and asked him if he thought I might take the liberty of waiting on Mr. Johnson at his chambers in the Temple. He said I certainly might, and that Mr.

Johnson would take it as a compliment. So upon Tuesday the 24th of May, after having been enlivened by the witty sallies of Messieurs Thornton, Wilkes, Churchill, and Lloyd,<sup>7</sup> with whom I had passed the morning, I boldly repaired to Johnson. His chambers were on the first floor of No. 1, Inner Temple Lane, and I entered them with an impression given me by the Reverend Dr. Blair,<sup>8</sup> of Edinburgh, who had been introduced to him not long before, and described his having "found the giant in his den"; an expression, which, when I came to be pretty well acquainted with Johnson, I repeated to him, and he was diverted at this picturesque account of himself. Dr. Blair had been presented to him by Dr. James Fordyce.<sup>9</sup> At this time the controversy concerning the pieces published by Mr. James Macpherson, as translations of Ossian, was at its height.<sup>1</sup> Johnson had all along denied their authenticity; and, what was still more provoking to their admirers, maintained that they had no merit. The subject having been introduced by Dr. Fordyce, Dr. Blair, relying on the internal evidence of their antiquity, asked Dr. Johnson whether he thought any man of a modern age could have written such poems? Johnson replied, "Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children." Johnson, at this time, did not know that Dr. Blair had just published a dissertation, not only defending their authenticity, but seriously ranking them with the poems of Homer and Virgil; and when he was afterwards informed of this circumstance, he expressed some displeasure at Dr. Fordyce's having suggested the topic, and said, "I am not sorry that they got thus much for their pains. Sir, it was like leading one to talk of a book when the author is concealed behind the door."

He received me very courteously; but, it must be confessed that his apartment, and furniture, and morning dress, were sufficiently uncouth. His brown suit of clothes looked very rusty; he had on a little old shriveled unpowdered wig, which was too small for his head; his shirt neck and knees of his breeches were loose; his black worsted stockings ill drawn up; and he had a pair of unbuckled shoes by way of slippers. But all these slovenly particularities were forgotten the moment that he began to talk. Some gentlemen, whom I do not recollect, were sitting with him; and when they went away, I also rose; but he said to me, "Nay, don't go." "Sir," said I, "I am afraid that I intrude upon you. It is benevolent to allow me to sit and hear you." He seemed pleased with this compliment, which I sincerely paid him, and answered, "Sir, I am obliged to any man who visits me." I have preserved the following short minute of what passed this day:

"Madness frequently discovers itself merely by unnecessary deviation from the usual modes of the world. My poor friend Smart showed the disturbance of his mind by falling upon his knees, and saying his prayers in the street, or in any other unusual place. Now although, rationally speaking, it is greater madness not to pray at all than to pray as Smart did, I am afraid there are so many who do not pray, that their understanding is not called in question."

Concerning this unfortunate poet, Christopher Smart, who was confined in a madhouse, he had, at another time, the following conversation with Dr. Burney:<sup>2</sup> BURNEY. "How does poor Smart do, Sir; is he likely to recover?" JOHNSON. "It seems as if his mind had ceased to struggle with the disease; for he grows fat upon it." BURNEY. "Perhaps, Sir, that may be from want of exercise." JOHNSON. "No, Sir; he has partly as much exercise as he used to have, for he digs in the garden. Indeed, before his confinement, he used for exercise to walk to the ale house; but he was carried back again. I did not think he ought to be shut up. His infirmities were not noxious to society. He insisted on people praying with him; and I'd as lief pray with Kit Smart as anyone else. Another charge was that he did not love clean linen; and I have no passion for it."—Johnson continued. "Mankind have a great aversion to intellectual labor; but even supposing knowledge to be easily attainable, more people would be content to be ignorant than would take even a little trouble to acquire it."

Talking of Garrick, he said, "He is the first man in the world for sprightly conversation."

When I rose a second time he again pressed me to stay, which I did. * * *

[OSSIAN]

MR. BOSWELL TO DR. JOHNSON

Edinburgh, Feb. 2, 1775.

* * * As to Macpherson, I am anxious to have from yourself a full and pointed account of what has passed between you and him. It is confidently told here that before your book<sup>3</sup> came out he sent to you, to let you know that he understood you meant to deny the authenticity of Ossian's poems; that the originals were in his possession; that you might have inspection of them, and might take the evidence of people skilled in the Erse language; and that he hoped, after this fair offer, you would not be so uncandid<sup>4</sup> as to assert that he had refused reasonable proof. That you paid no regard to his message, but published your strong attack upon him; and then he wrote a letter to you, in such terms as he thought suited to one who had not acted as a man of veracity. * * *

What words were used by Mr. Macpherson in his letter to the venerable sage, I have never heard; but they are generally said to have been of a nature very different from the language of literary contest. Dr. Johnson's answer appeared in the newspapers of the day, and has since been frequently republished; but not with perfect accuracy. I give it as dictated to me by himself, written down in his presence, and authenticated by a note in his own handwriting, "This, I think, is a true copy."

MR. JAMES MACPHERSON,

I received your foolish and impudent letter. Any violence offered me I shall do my best to repel; and what I cannot do for myself, the law shall do for me. I hope I shall never be deterred from detecting what I think a cheat, by the menaces of a ruffian.

What would you have me retract? I thought your book an imposture; I think it an imposture still. For this opinion I have given my reasons to the public, which I here dare you to refute. Your rage I defy. Your abilities, since your Homer, are not so formidable; and what I hear of your morals inclines me to pay regard not to what you shall say, but to what you shall prove. You may print this if you will.

SAM. JOHNSON.

Mr. Macpherson little knew the character of Dr. Johnson if he supposed that he could be easily intimidated; for no man was ever more remarkable for personal courage. He had, indeed, an awful dread of death, or rather, "of something after death";<sup>5</sup> and what rational man, who seriously thinks of quitting all that he has ever known, and going into a new and unknown state of being, can be without that dread? But his fear was from reflection; his courage natural. His fear, in that one instance, was the result of philosophical and religious consideration. He feared death, but he feared nothing else, not even what might occasion death. Many instances of his resolution may be mentioned. One day, at Mr. Beauclerk's house in the country, when two large dogs were fighting, he went up to them, and beat them till they separated; and at another time, when told of the danger there was that a gun might burst if charged with many balls, he put in six or seven, and fired it off against a wall. Mr. Langton told me that when they were swimming together near Oxford, he cautioned Dr. Johnson against a pool which was reckoned particularly dangerous; upon which Johnson directly swam into it. He told me himself that one night he was attacked in the street by four men, to whom he would not yield, but kept them all at bay, till the watch came up, and carried both him and them to the roundhouse.<sup>6</sup> In the playhouse at Lichfield, as Mr. Garrick informed me, Johnson having for a moment quitted a chair which was placed for him between the side-scenes, a gentleman took possession of it, and when Johnson on his return civilly demanded his seat, rudely refused to give it up; upon which Johnson laid hold of it, and tossed him and the chair into the pit. Foote, who so successfully revived the old comedy, by exhibiting living characters, had resolved to imitate Johnson on the stage, expecting great profits from his ridicule of so celebrated a man. Johnson being informed of his intention, and being at dinner at Mr. Thomas Davies's the bookseller, from whom I had the story, he asked Mr. Davies what was the common price of an oak stick; and being answered six-pence, "Why then, Sir," said he, "give me leave to send your servant to purchase me a shilling one. I'll have a double quantity; for I am told Foote means to take me off, as he calls it, and I am determined the fellow shall not do it with impunity." Davies took care to acquaint Foote of this, which effectually checked the wantonness of the mimic. Mr. Macpherson's menaces made Johnson provide himself with the same implement of defense; and had he been attacked, I have no doubt that, old as he was, he would have made his corporal prowess be felt as much as his intellectual. * * *

[JOHNSON FACES DEATH]

As Johnson had now very faint hopes of recovery, and as Mrs. Thrale was no longer devoted to him, it might have been supposed that he would naturally have chosen to remain in the comfortable house of his beloved wife's daughter,<sup>7</sup> and end his life where he began it. But there was in him an animated and lofty spirit, and however complicated diseases might depress ordinary mortals, all who saw him, beheld and acknowledged the invictum animum Catonis.<sup>8</sup> Such was his intellectual ardor even at this time that he said to one friend, "Sir, I look upon every day to be lost, in which I do not make a new acquaintance"; and to another, when talking of his illness, "I will be conquered; I will not capitulate." And such was his love of London, so high a relish had he of its magnificent extent, and variety of intellectual entertainment, that he languished when absent from it, his mind having become quite luxurious from the long habit of enjoying the metropolis; and, therefore, although at Lichfield, surrounded with friends, who loved and revered him, and for whom he had a very sincere affection, he still found that such conversation as London affords, could be found nowhere else. These feelings, joined, probably, to some flattering hopes of aid from the eminent physicians and surgeons in London, who kindly and generously attended him without accepting fees, made him resolve to return to the capital. * * * Death had always been to him an object of terror; so that, though by no means happy, he still clung to life with an eagerness at which many have wondered. At any time when he was ill, he was very much pleased to be told that he looked better. An ingenious member of the Eumelian Club<sup>9</sup> informs me that upon one occasion when he said to him that he saw health returning to his cheek, Johnson seized him by the hand and exclaimed, "Sir, you are one of the kindest friends I ever had." * * *

Dr. Heberden, Dr. Brocklesby, Dr. Warren, and Dr. Butter, physicians, generously attended him, without accepting any fees, as did Mr. Cruikshank, surgeon; and all that could be done from professional skill and ability was tried, to prolong a life so truly valuable. He himself, indeed, having, on account of his very bad constitution, been perpetually applying himself to medical inquiries, united his own efforts with those of the gentlemen who attended him; and imagining that the dropsical collection of water which oppressed him might be drawn off by making incisions in his body, he, with his usual resolute defiance of pain, cut deep, when he thought that his surgeon had done it too tenderly.

About eight or ten days before his death, when Dr. Brocklesby paid him his morning visit, he seemed very low and desponding, and said, "I have been as a dying man all night." He then emphatically broke out in the words of Shakespeare:

"Canst thou not minister to a mind diseased;
Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow,
Raze out the written troubles of the brain,
And with some sweet oblivious antidote
Cleanse the stuffed bosom of that perilous stuff
Which weighs upon the heart?"

To which Dr. Brocklesby readily answered, from the same great poet:

"—Therein the patient
Must minister to himself."<sup>1</sup>

Johnson expressed himself much satisfied with the application. * * *

Amidst the melancholy clouds which hung over the dying Johnson, his characteristical manner showed itself on different occasions.

When Dr. Warren, in the usual style, hoped that he was better; his answer was, "No, Sir; you cannot conceive with what acceleration I advance towards death."

A man whom he had never seen before was employed one night to sit up with him. Being asked next morning how he liked his attendant, his answer was, "Not at all, Sir: the fellow's an idiot; he is as awkward as a turnspit<sup>2</sup> when first put into the wheel, and as sleepy as a dormouse."

Mr. Windham<sup>3</sup> having placed a pillow conveniently to support him, he thanked him for his kindness, and said, "That will do—all that a pillow can do." * * *

Johnson, with that native fortitude, which, amidst all his bodily distress and mental sufferings, never forsook him, asked Dr. Brocklesby, as a man in whom he had confidence, to tell him plainly whether he could recover. "Give me," said he, "a direct answer." The Doctor having first asked him if he could bear the whole truth, which way soever it might lead, and being answered that he could, declared that, in his opinion, he could not recover without a miracle. "Then," said Johnson, "I will take no more physic, not even my opiates; for I have prayed that I may render up my soul to God unclouded." In this resolution he persevered, and, at the same time, used only the weakest kinds of sustenance. Being pressed by Mr. Windham to take somewhat more generous nourishment, lest too low a diet should have the very effect which he dreaded, by debilitating his mind, he said, "I will take anything but inebriating sustenance."

The Reverend Mr. Strahan,<sup>4</sup> who was the son of his friend, and had been always one of his great favorites, had, during his last illness, the satisfaction of contributing to soothe and comfort him. That gentleman's house, at Islington, of which he is Vicar, afforded Johnson, occasionally and easily, an agreeable change of place and fresh air; and he attended also upon him in town in the discharge of the sacred offices of his profession.

Mr. Strahan has given me the agreeable assurance that, after being in much agitation, Johnson became quite composed, and continued so till his death.

Dr. Brocklesby, who will not be suspected of fanaticism, obliged me with the following account:

"For some time before his death, all his fears were calmed and absorbed by the prevalence of his faith, and his trust in the merits and propitiation of Jesus Christ." * * *

Johnson having thus in his mind the true Christian scheme, at once rational and consolatory, uniting justice and mercy in the Divinity, with the improvement of human nature, previous to his receiving the Holy Sacrament in his apartment, composed and fervently uttered this prayer:

"Almighty and most merciful Father, I am now as to human eyes, it seems, about to commemorate, for the last time, the death of thy Son Jesus Christ, our Saviour and Redeemer. Grant, O Lord, that my whole hope and confidence may be in his merits, and thy mercy; enforce and accept my imperfect repentance; make this commemoration available to the confirmation of my faith, the establishment of my hope, and the enlargement of my charity; and make the death of thy Son Jesus Christ effectual to my redemption. Have mercy upon me, and pardon the multitude of my offenses. Bless my friends; have mercy upon all men. Support me, by thy Holy Spirit, in the days of weakness, and at the hour of death; and receive me, at my death, to everlasting happiness, for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen."

Having * * * made his will on the 8th and 9th of December, and settled all his worldly affairs, he languished till Monday, the 13th of that month, when he expired, about seven o'clock in the evening, with so little apparent pain that his attendants hardly perceived when his dissolution took place. * * *

THOMAS GRAY

1716–1771

The man who wrote the English poem most loved by those whom Samuel Johnson called “the common reader” was a scholarly recluse who lived the quiet life of a university professor in the stagnant atmosphere of mid-eighteenth-century Cambridge. Born in London, Thomas Gray was the only one of twelve children to survive, and his family life was desperately unhappy. At eight he left home for Eton, where he made intimate friends: Richard West, a fellow poet; Thomas Ashton; and future novelist Horace Walpole, the son of the prime minister. After four years at Cambridge, Gray left without a degree to take the grand tour of France and Italy as Walpole’s guest. The death of West in 1742 desolated Gray, and memories of West haunt much of his verse. He spent the rest of his life in Cambridge, pursuing his studies and writing wonderful letters as well as a handful of poems. Two high-flown Pindaric odes, “The Progress of Poesy” (1754) and “The Bard” (1757), display his learning and his love of nature and the sublime.

Most of Gray’s poems take part in a contemporary reaction against the wit and satiric elegance of Pope’s couplets; poets sought a new style, at once intimate and prophetic. Gray was not easily satisfied; he constantly revised his poems and published very little. Because he held that “the language of the age is never the language of poetry,” he often uses archaic words and a word order borrowed from Latin, where a verb can precede its subject (as in line 35 of the "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard": "Awaits alike the inevitable hour"). But the "Elegy" stands alone in his work. It balances Latinate phrases with living English speech, and the learning of a scholar with a common humanity that everyone can share. Johnson, who did not usually like Gray's poetry, acknowledged that the "Elegy" would live on:

The Churchyard abounds with images that find a mirror in every mind, and with sentiments to which every bosom returns an echo. The four stanzas beginning "Yet even these bones" are to me original: I have never seen the notions in any other place; yet he that reads them here, persuades himself that he has always felt them. Had Gray written often thus, it had been vain to blame, and useless to praise him.

Ode on the Death of a Favorite Cat<sup>1</sup>

Drowned in a Tub of Goldfishes

'Twas on a lofty vase's side,
Where China's gayest art had dyed
    The azure flowers that blow;<sup>o</sup>
Demurest of the tabby kind,
The pensive Selima reclined,
5       Gazed on the lake below.

Her conscious tail her joy declared;
The fair round face, the snowy beard,
    The velvet of her paws,
Her coat, that with the tortoise vies,
10       Her ears of jet, and emerald eyes,
She saw; and purred applause.

Still had she gazed; but 'midst the tide
Two angel forms were seen to glide,
    The genii of the stream:
15       Their scaly armor's Tyrian<sup>o</sup> hue
Through richest purple to the view
    Betrayed a golden gleam.

The hapless nymph with wonder saw:
A whisker first and then a claw,
20       With many an ardent wish,
She stretched in vain to reach the prize.
What female heart can gold despise?
    What cat's averse to fish?

25       Presumptuous maid! with looks intent

Again she stretched, again she bent,
 Nor knew the gulf between.
 (Malignant Fate sat by and smiled)
 The slippery verge her feet beguiled,
 She tumbled headlong in.
 30
 Eight times emerging from the flood
 She mewed to every watery god,
 Some speedy aid to send.
 No dolphin came, no nereid<sup>o</sup> stirred:
 35 Nor cruel Tom, nor Susan<sup>2</sup> heard.
 A favorite has no friend!
 From hence, ye beauties, undeceived,
 Know, one false step is ne'er retrieved,
 And be with caution bold.
 40 Not all that tempts your wandering eyes
 And heedless hearts is lawful prize;
 Nor all that glisters gold.

Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard

The curfew<sup>1</sup> tolls the knell of parting day,
The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,
The plowman homeward plods his weary way,
And leaves the world to darkness and to me.

5 Now fades the glimmering landscape on the sight,
And all the air a solemn stillness holds,
Save where the beetle wheels his droning flight,
And drowsy tinklings lull the distant folds;

10 Save that from yonder ivy-mantled tower
The moping owl does to the moon complain
Of such, as wandering near her secret bower,
Molest her ancient solitary reign.

15 Beneath those rugged elms, that yew tree's shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow cell forever laid,
The rude<sup>o</sup> forefathers of the hamlet sleep.

20 The breezy call of incense-breathing Morn,
The swallow twittering from the straw-built shed,
The cock's shrill clarion, or the echoing horn,<sup>o</sup>
No more shall rouse them from their lowly bed.

25 For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
Or busy housewife ply her evening care;
No children run to lisp<sup>o</sup> their sire's return,
Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.

Oft did the harvest to their sickle yield,
Their furrow oft the stubborn glebe<sup>o</sup> has broke;

How jocund did they drive their team afield!
How bowed the woods beneath their sturdy stroke!

Let not Ambition mock their useful toil,
Their homely joys, and destiny obscure;
30 Nor Grandeur hear with a disdainful smile
The short and simple annals of the poor.

The boast of heraldry,<sup>o</sup> the pomp of power,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
35 Awaits alike the inevitable hour.
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

Nor you, ye proud, impute to these the fault,
If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies<sup>2</sup> raise,
Where through the long-drawn aisle and fretted<sup>3</sup> vault
40 The pealing anthem swells the note of praise.

Can storied urn<sup>4</sup> or animated<sup>o</sup> bust
Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
Can Honor's voice provoke<sup>o</sup> the silent dust,
Or Flattery soothe the dull cold ear of Death?

Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid
45 Some heart once pregnant with celestial fire;
Hands that the rod of empire might have swayed,<sup>o</sup>
Or waked to ecstasy the living lyre.

But Knowledge to their eyes her ample page
Rich with the spoils of time did ne'er unroll;
50 Chill Penury repressed their noble rage,<sup>o</sup>
And froze the genial<sup>o</sup> current of the soul.

Full many a gem of purest ray serene,

55           The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear:
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
          And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

          Some village Hampden,<sup>5</sup> that with dauntless breast
          The little tyrant of his fields withstood;
Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest,
60           Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood.

          The applause of listening senates to command,
          The threats of pain and ruin to despise,
To scatter plenty o'er a smiling land,
          And read their history in a nation's eyes,

65           Their lot forbade: nor circumscribed alone
          Their growing virtues, but their crimes confined;
Forbade to wade through slaughter to a throne,
          And shut the gates of mercy on mankind,

          The struggling pangs of conscious truth to hide,
          To quench the blushes of ingenuous shame,
70           Or heap the shrine of Luxury and Pride
          With incense kindled at the Muse's flame.

          Far from the madding crowd's ignoble strife,
          Their sober wishes never learned to stray;
75           Along the cool sequestered vale of life
          They kept the noiseless tenor of their way.

          Yet even these bones from insult to protect
          Some frail memorial still erected nigh,
With uncouth rhymes and shapeless sculpture decked,<sup>6</sup>
80           Implores the passing tribute of a sigh.

Their name, their years, spelt by the unlettered
Muse,

The place of fame and elegy supply:
And many a holy text around she strews,
That teach the rustic moralist to die.

85 For who to dumb Forgetfulness a prey,
This pleasing anxious being e'er resigned,
Left the warm precincts of the cheerful day,
Nor cast one longing lingering look behind?

90 On some fond breast the parting soul relies,
Some pious drops the closing eye requires;
Even from the tomb the voice of Nature cries,
Even in our ashes live their wonted fires.

95 For thee, who mindful of the unhonored dead
Dost in these lines their artless tale relate;
If chance, o by lonely contemplation led,
Some kindred spirit shall inquire thy fate,

Haply some hoary-headed swain may say,
"Oft have we seen him at the peep of dawn
Brushing with hasty steps the dew away
100 To meet the sun upon the upland lawn.

"There at the foot of yonder nodding beech
That wreathes its old fantastic roots so high,
His listless length at noontide would he stretch,
And pore upon the brook that babbles by.

105 "Hard by yon wood, now smiling as in scorn,
Muttering his wayward fancies he would rove,
Now drooping, woeful wan, like one forlorn,
Or crazed with care, or crossed in hopeless love.

"One morn I missed him on the customed hill,

110       Along the heath and near his favorite tree;
Another came; nor yet beside the rill,
Nor up the lawn, nor at the wood was he;

"The next with dirges due in sad array
Slow through the churchway path we saw him borne.
115       Approach and read (for thou canst read) the lay, Graved on the stone beneath yon aged thorn."

The Epitaph

*Here rests his head upon the lap of Earth
A youth to Fortune and to Fame unknown.
Fair Science<sup>o</sup> frowned not on his humble birth,
And Melancholy marked him for her own.*
120
*Large was his bounty, and his soul sincere,
Heaven did a recompense as largely send:
He gave to Misery all he had, a tear,
He gained from Heaven ('twas all he wished) a friend.*

125       *No farther seek his merits to disclose,
Or draw his frailties from their dread abode
(There they alike in trembling hope repose),
The bosom of his Father and his God.*

Sonnet on the Death of Mr. Richard West<sup>1</sup>

In vain to me the smiling mornings shine,
And reddening Phoebus<sup>2</sup> lifts his golden fire:
The birds in vain their amorous descant<sup>3</sup> join;
Or cheerful fields resume their green attire:
5 These ears, alas! for other notes repine,
A different object do these eyes require.
My lonely anguish melts no heart but mine;
And in my breast the imperfect joys expire.
Yet morning smiles the busy race to cheer,
And new-born pleasure brings to happier men:
10 The fields to all their wonted<sup>o</sup> tribute bear:
To warm their little loves the birds complain:
I fruitless mourn to him, that cannot hear,
And weep the more, because I weep in vain.

- Note 1: This poem appears in Gray's commonplace book and was published only posthumously. West, Gray's school friend, died at twenty-five years old. Earlier, West had sent Gray a poem imagining the aftermath of his own death: "nature" will not "take notice," and "Bright as before the day-star will appear, / The fields as verdant, and the skies as clear." # The Bard<sup>1</sup>

A Pindaric Ode.<sup>2</sup>

1.1

"Ruin seize thee, ruthless King!<sup>3</sup>
Confusion on thy banners wait,
Though fanned by Conquest's crimson wing
They mock the air with idle state.
5 Helm,<sup>o</sup> nor hauberk's twisted mail,<sup>4</sup>
Nor even thy virtues, tyrant, shall avail
To save thy secret soul from nightly fears,
From Cambria's<sup>o</sup> curse, from Cambria's tears!"
Such were the sounds, that o'er the crested<sup>5</sup> pride
Of the first Edward scattered wild dismay,
10 As down the steep of Snowdon's<sup>6</sup> shaggy side
He wound with toilsome march his long array.
Stout Glo'ster stood aghast in speechless trance:
To arms! cried Mortimer, and couched<sup>7</sup> his quivering lance.

1.2

15 On a rock, whose haughty<sup>o</sup> brow
Frowns o'er old Conway's<sup>8</sup> foaming flood,
Robed in the sable garb of woe,
With haggard eyes the poet stood;
(Loose his beard, and hoary<sup>o</sup> hair<sup>9</sup> Streamed, like a meteor, to the troubled air)
20 And with a master's hand, and prophet's fire,

Struck the deep sorrows of his lyre.
"Hark, how each giant oak, and desert cave,
Sighs to the torrent's awful<sup>o</sup> voice beneath!
O'er thee, O King! their hundred arms they wave,
25 Revenge on thee in hoarser murmurs breathe;
Vocal no more, since Cambria's fatal day,
To high-born Hoel's harp, or soft Llewellyn's lay.<sup>1</sup>"

1.3

"Cold is Cadwallo's tongue,
That hushed the stormy main:<sup>o</sup>
30 Brave Urien sleeps upon his craggy bed:
Mountains, ye mourn in vain
Modred, whose magic song
Made huge Plinlimmon<sup>2</sup> bow his cloud-topped head.
On dreary Arvon's shore<sup>3</sup> they lie,
35 Smeared with gore, and ghastly pale:
Far, far aloof th' affrighted ravens sail;
The famished eagle<sup>4</sup> screams, and passes by.
Dear lost companions of my tuneful art,
Dear, as the light that visits these sad eyes,
40 Dear, as the ruddy drops that warm my heart,
Ye died amidst your dying country's cries—
No more I weep. They do not sleep.
On yonder cliffs, a grisly band,
I see them sit, they linger yet,
45 Avengers of their native land:
With me in dreadful harmony they join,
And weave with bloody hands the tissue<sup>5</sup> of thy line."

2.1

"Weave the warp, and weave the woof,<sup>6</sup>
The winding sheet<sup>7</sup> of Edward's race.

50 Give ample room, and verge enough
The characters of hell to trace.
Mark the year, and mark the night,
When Severn shall re-echo with affright
55 The shrieks of death, through Berkeley's roofs that ring,
Shrieks of an agonizing King!<sup>8</sup>
She-Wolf of France,<sup>9</sup> with unrelenting fangs,
That tear'st the bowels of thy mangled mate,
From thee be born, who o'er thy country hangs 60 The scourge of Heav'n.<sup>1</sup> What terrors round him wait!
Amazement in his van,<sup>o</sup> with Flight combined,
And Sorrow's faded form, and Solitude behind.' "

2.2

"Mighty victor, mighty lord,
Low on his funeral couch he lies!<sup>2</sup>
65 No pitying heart, no eye, afford
A tear to grace his obsequies.<sup>o</sup>
Is the sable warrior<sup>3</sup> fled?
Thy son is gone. He rests among the dead.
The swarm, that in thy noon-tide beam were born?
Gone to salute the rising morn.
70 Fair laughs the morn,<sup>4</sup> and soft the zephyr blows,
While proudly riding o'er the azure realm
In gallant trim the gilded vessel goes;
Youth on the prow, and Pleasure at the helm;
75 Regardless of the sweeping whirlwind's sway,
That, hushed in grim repose, expects his evening prey.' "

2.3

"Fill high the sparkling bowl,
 The rich repast prepare,
 Reft<sup>o</sup> of a crown, he yet may share the feast:<sup>5</sup>
 Close by the regal chair
 80 Fell<sup>o</sup> Thirst and Famine scowl
 A baleful smile upon their baffled guest.
 Heard ye the din of battle bray,
 Lance to lance, and horse to horse?<sup>6</sup>
 Long years of havoc urge their destined course, 85 And through the kindred squadrons mow their way.
 Ye towers of Julius,<sup>7</sup> London's lasting shame,
 With many a foul and midnight murder fed,
 Revere his consort's faith, his father's fame,
 And spare the meek usurper's<sup>8</sup> holy head.
 90 Above, below, the rose of snow,
 Twined with her blushing foe,<sup>9</sup> we spread:
 The bristled boar in infant gore<sup>1</sup>
 Wallows beneath the thorny shade.
 Now, brothers, bending o'er th' accurséd loom
 95 Stamp we our vengeance deep, and ratify his doom.'

3.1

"Edward, lo! to sudden fate
 (Weave we the woof. The thread is spun)
 Half of thy heart we consecrate.<sup>2</sup>
 (The web is wove. The work is done.)'
 100 Stay, oh stay!<sup>3</sup> nor thus forlorn
 Leave me unblessed, unpitied, here to mourn:
 In yon bright track, that fires the western skies,
 They melt, they vanish from my eyes.
 But oh! what solemn scenes on Snowdon's height
 105 Descending slow their glitt'ring skirts unroll?
 Visions of glory, spare my aching sight,

Ye unborn ages, crowd not on my soul!
No more our long-lost Arthur we bewail.<sup>4</sup>
All hail, ye genuine kings, Britannia's issue,<sup>5</sup> hail."

3.2

"Girt<sup>o</sup> with many a baron bold
Sublime their starry fronts they rear;
And gorgeous dames, and statesmen old
In bearded majesty, appear.
In the midst a form divine!
Her eye proclaims her of the Briton-line;
Her lion-port, her awe-commanding face,
Attempered sweet to virgin grace.<sup>6</sup>
What strings symphonious tremble in the air,
What strings of vocal transport round her play!
Hear from the grave, great Taliesin,<sup>7</sup> hear;
They breathe a soul to animate thy clay.
Bright Rapture calls, and soaring, as she sings,
Waves in the eye of Heav'n her many-colored wings."

3.3

"The verse adorn again
Fierce War, and faithful Love,<sup>8</sup>
And Truth severe, by fairy Fiction drest.
In buskined measures move
Pale Grief, and pleasing Pain,
With Horror, tyrant of the throbbing breast.<sup>9</sup>
A voice, as of the cherub-choir,
Gales from blooming Eden bear;<sup>1</sup>
And distant warblings lessen on my ear,
That lost in long futurity expire.<sup>2</sup>

Fond<sup>o</sup> impious man, think'st thou, yon sanguine<sup>o</sup> cloud,
Raised by thy breath, has quenched the orb of day?
Tomorrow he<sup>o</sup> repairs the golden flood,
And warms the nations with redoubled ray.
Enough for me: with joy I see
The different doom our Fates assign.<sup>3</sup>
140 Be thine despair, and scepter'd care,
To triumph, and to die, are mine."
He spoke, and headlong from the mountain's height
Deep in the roaring tide he plunged to endless night.

1757 Endnotes 1768

- Note 1: Gray prefaced the poem: "The following ode is founded on a tradition current in Wales, that Edward the First, when he completed the conquest of that country, ordered all the bards, that fell into his hands, to be put to death." English king Edward I (1239–1307) won a major victory to subjugate the Welsh in 1283; his decrees against bards were not so directly violent, but Gray uses this "tradition" to link prophetic poetry with a lost Celtic past (in contrast to both Englishness and modernity). Gray first published the poem in 1757 and in 1768 was convinced to help readers by adding learned explanatory notes, some of which are reproduced here. Return to reference 1
- Note 2: An irregular ode, often associated with intense emotion. Gray draws on period (mis-)understandings of the Greek poet Pindar's form, organizing his poem into clusters of three movements called strophe, antistrophe, epode. Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The voice of the last Welsh bard, cursing Edward I and his incoming English troops. Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The hauberk was a texture of steel ringlets, or rings interwoven, forming a coat of mail, that sat close to the body, and adapted itself to every motion [Gray's note].Return to reference 4

- Note 5: Ornamented (with plumes).Return to reference 5
- Note 6: Snowdon was a name given by the Saxons to that mountainous tract, which the Welsh themselves call Craigian-eryri: it included all the highlands of Caernarvonshire and Merionethshire, as far east as the river Conway [from Gray's note].Return to reference 6
- Note 7: "To fix the spear . . . in the posture of attack" (Johnson's Dictionary). "Glo[uce]ster" and "Mortimer": Gray's note explains, two English lords "whose lands lay on the borders of Wales," likely with "the King in this expedition."Return to reference 7

- Note 3: The shores of Caernarvonshire opposite to the isle of Anglesey [Gray's note]. Today this area is in Gwynedd county, Wales.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Citing works of geography and science, Gray notes, "eagles used annually to build their aerie among the rocks of Snowdon, which from thence (as some think) were named by the Welch Craigian-eryri, or the crags of the eagles. At this day (I am told) the highest point of Snowdon is called the eagle's nest."Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Fine woven cloth. The poem imagines prophecy as weaving, spinning future fates.Return to reference 5

- Note 6: The dead bards join their voices to the speaker's in a chorus, lines 49–100, that prophesies doom for Edward's descendants. "Warp" and "woof" are the threads that are woven together, interlocking, to make fabric.Return to reference 6
- Note 7: To wrap the dead.Return to reference 7
- Note 8: Edward the Second, cruelly butchered in Berkely-Castle [Gray's note]. King Edward's son was murdered at the castle near the Severn River in 1327.Return to reference 8
- Note 9: Isabel of France, Edward the Second's adulterous Queen [Gray's note]. The French-born Isabella (1295–1358) conspired to depose and (some thought) murder her husband.Return to reference 9
- Note 1: Triumphs of Edward the Third in France [Gray's note]. He becomes the English "scourge" of his mother's country.Return to reference 1

- Note 1: The silver boar was the badge of Richard the Third; whence he was usually known in his own time by the name of the Boar [Gray’s note]. Richard III (1452–1485) was said to have murdered the young princes, who threatened him.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Doom. Addressing Edward I directly, the bards foretell the death of his wife, Eleanor of Castile, in 1290 (“a few years after the conquest of Wales,” Gray’s note explains).Return to reference 2
- Note 3: After the chorus of dead bards concludes, the living bard begs their continued presence before offering his own prophecy.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: It was the common belief of the Welch nation, that King Arthur was still alive in Fairy-Land, and should return again to reign over Britain [Gray’s note].Return to reference 4

- Note 6: Queen Elizabeth I (1533–1603). Gray quotes a historical description of her as “lion-like.”Return to reference 6
- Note 7: Taliesin, chief of the bards, flourished in the VIth century [from Gray’s note]. Because Elizabeth secures peace without tyranny, poetry flourishes again.Return to reference 7

WILLIAM COLLINS

1721–1759

William Collins was born in Chichester and was educated at Winchester and Oxford. Coming up to London from the university, he tried to establish himself as an author, but he was given rather to planning than to writing books. He came to know Samuel Johnson, who later remembered him affectionately as a man of learning who “loved fairies, genii, giants, and monsters” and who “delighted to rove through the meanders of enchantment.” In 1746 Collins published his Odes on Several Descriptive and Allegorical Subjects, his part in an undertaking, with his friend Joseph Warton, to create a new poetry, more lyrical and fanciful than that of Alexander Pope’s generation. Collins’s Odes address personified abstractions (Fear, Pity, the Passions), which are imagined as vivid presences that overwhelm the poet as he calls them to life. In form, these poems represent a new version of the classical Great Ode, derived from the Greek poet Pindar (ca. 522–ca. 443 B.C.E.), which treats lofty themes in an elevated style; Collins returned to Pindar’s regularity of structure, after the relative freedom of most English odes written in preceding decades. But the originality of the Odes lies in their intensity of vision, which risks obscurity in quest of the sublime.

To his disappointment, contemporaries preferred his early Persian Eclogues to the more difficult Odes. Inheriting some money, the poet traveled for a while, but fits of depression gradually deepened into total debility. He spent his last years in Chichester, forgotten by all but a small circle of loyal friends. As the century progressed he gained in reputation. The Romantics admired his poems and felt akin to him. Coleridge said that "Ode on the Poetical Character" "has inspired and whirled me along with greater agitations of enthusiasm than any the most impassioned scene in Schiller or Shakespeare."

Ode to Evening<sup>1</sup>

If aught of oaten stop,<sup>2</sup> or pastoral song,
May hope, chaste Eve, to soothe thy modest ear,
Like thy own solemn springs,
Thy springs and dying gales,
5 O nymph reserved, while now the bright-haired sun
Sits in yon western tent, whose cloudy skirts,
With brede<sup>o</sup> ethereal wove,
O'erhang his wavy bed:
Now air is hushed, save where the weak-eyed bat,
10 With short shrill shriek flits by on leathern wing,
Or where the beetle winds
His small but sullen horn,
As oft he rises 'midst the twilight path,
Against the pilgrim borne in heedless hum:
Now teach me, maid composed,
15 To breathe some softened strain,
Whose numbers,<sup>o</sup> stealing through thy darkening
vale,
May not unseemly with its stillness suit,
As, musing slow, I hail
Thy genial<sup>o</sup> loved return!
20 For when thy folding-star<sup>3</sup> arising shows
His paly circlet, at his warning lamp
The fragrant Hours, and elves
Who slept in flowers the day,
And many a nymph who wreaths her brows with 25 sedge,
And sheds the freshening dew, and, lovelier still,
The pensive Pleasures sweet,
Prepare thy shadowy car.

Then lead, calm vot'ress, where some sheety lake
 Cheers the lone heath, or some time-hallowed pile 30 Or upland fallows gray
 Reflect its last cool gleam.
 But when chill blustering winds, or driving rain,
 Forbid my willing feet, be mine the hut
 That from the mountain's side
 35 Views wilds, and swelling floods,
 And hamlets brown, and dim-discovered spires,
 And hears their simple bell, and marks o'er all Thy dewy fingers draw
 The gradual dusky veil.
 40 While Spring shall pour his showers, as oft he wont,
 And bathe thy breathing tresses, meekest Eve;
 While Summer loves to sport
 Beneath thy lingering light;
 While sallow Autumn fills thy lap with leaves;
 45 Or Winter, yelling through the troublous air,
 Affrights thy shrinking train,
 And rudely rends thy robes;
 So long, sure-found beneath the sylvan shed,
 Shall Fancy, Friendship, Science, rose-lipped Health,
 50 Thy gentlest influence own,
 And hymn thy favorite name!

CHRISTOPHER SMART

1722–1771

In 1756 Christopher Smart, who had won prizes at Pembroke College, Cambridge, as a scholar and poet and was known in London as a wit and bon vivant, was seized by religious mania: “a preternatural excitement to prayer,” according to Hester Thrale, “which he held it as a duty not to control or repress.” If Smart had been content to pray in private, his life might have ended as happily as it began, but he insisted on kneeling down in the streets, in parks, and in assembly rooms. He became a public nuisance, and the public took its revenge. For most of the next seven years Smart was confined, first in St. Luke’s hospital, then in a private asylum. There, severed from his wife, his children, and his friends, he began to write a bold new sort of poetry: vivid, concise, abrupt, syntactically daring. Few of his contemporaries noticed it. After Smart’s release from the institution (1763) he fell into debt—he had always been profligate—and his masterpiece, A Song to David (1763), was almost completely ignored. He died, forgotten, in a debtor’s prison. But in the nineteenth century his reputation revived, and with the publication of Jubilate Agno in 1939 his poems became newly famous.

Jubilate Agno (Rejoice in the Lamb), written a few lines at a time during Smart’s confinement, is (1) a record of his daily life and thoughts; (2) the notebook of a scholar, crammed with puns and obscure learning, which sets out elaborate correspondences between the world of the Bible and modern England; and (3) a personal testament or book of worship, antiphonally arranged in lines beginning alternately with Let and For, which seeks to join the material and spiritual universes in one unending prayer. It has also come to be recognized, since first published in 1939 by W. F. Stead, as a poem—a poem unique in English for its ecstatic sense of the presence of the divine spirit. The most famous passage describes Smart's cat, Jeffery, his only companion during the years of confinement: "For I am possessed of a cat, surpassing in beauty, from whom I take occasion to bless Almighty God." At once a real cat, lovingly observed in all its frisks, and visible evidence of the providential plan, Jeffery celebrates the Maker, as all things do, in his very being.

[MY CAT JEOFFRY]

For I will consider my Cat Jeoffry.
For he is the servant of the Living God duly and daily serving him.
For at the first glance of the glory of God in the East<sup>o</sup> he worships in his way.
For is this done by wreathing his body seven times round with elegant quickness.
5 For then he leaps up to catch the musk, w<sup>ch</sup> is the blessing of God upon his prayer.
For he rolls upon prank<sup>o</sup> to work it in.
For having done duty and received blessing he begins to consider himself.
For this he performs in ten degrees.
For first he looks upon his fore-paws to see if they are clean.
10 For secondly he kicks up behind to clear away there.
For thirdly he works it upon stretch with the forepaws extended.
For fourthly he sharpens his paws by wood.
For fifthly he washes himself.
For Sixthly he rolls upon wash.
For Seventhly he fleas himself, that he may not be 15 interrupted upon the beat.
For Eighthly he rubs himself against a post.
For Ninthly he looks up for his instructions.
For Tenthly he goes in quest of food.
For having consider'd God and himself he will consider his neighbor.

20 For if he meets another cat he will kiss her in kindness.
For when he takes his prey he plays with it to give it a chance.
For one mouse in seven escapes by his dallying.
For when his day's work is done his business more properly begins.
For he keeps the Lord's watch in the night against the adversary.
25 For he counteracts the powers of darkness by his electrical skin & glaring eyes.
For he counteracts the Devil, who is death, by brisking about the life.
For in his morning orisons he loves the sun and the sun loves him.
For he is of the tribe of Tiger.
For the Cherub Cat is a term of the Angel Tiger.<sup>1</sup> 30 For he has the subtlety and hissing of a serpent, which in goodness he suppresses.
For he will not do destruction if he is well-fed,
neither will he spit without provocation.
For he purrs in thankfulness, when God tells him he's a good Cat.
For he is an instrument for the children to learn benevolence upon.
For every house is incomplete without him & a blessing is lacking in the spirit.
35 For the Lord commanded Moses concerning the cats at the departure of the Children of Israel from Egypt.<sup>2</sup>
For every family had one cat at least in the bag.
For the English Cats are the best in Europe.
For he is the cleanest in the use of his fore-paws of any quadrupede.

For the dexterity of his defence is an instance of the love of God to him exceedingly.
40 For he is the quickest to his mark of any creature.
For he is tenacious of his point.
For he is a mixture of gravity and waggery.
For he knows that God is his Saviour.
For there is nothing sweeter than his peace when at rest.
45 For there is nothing brisker than his life when in motion.
For he is of the Lord's poor and so indeed is he called by benevolence perpetually—Poor Jeoffry!
poor Jeoffry! the rat has bit thy throat.
For I bless the name of the Lord Jesus that Jeoffry is better.
For the divine spirit comes about his body to sustain it in compleat cat.
For his tongue is exceeding pure so that it has in purity what it wants in music.
50 For he is docile and can learn certain things.
For he can set up with gravity which is patience upon approbation.
For he can fetch and carry, which is patience in employment.
For he can jump over a stick which is patience upon proof positive.
For he can spraggle upon waggle<sup>3</sup> at the word of command.
55 For he can jump from an eminence into his master's bosom.
For he can catch the cork and toss it again.
For he is hated by the hypocrite and miser.
For the former is afraid of detection.
For the latter refuses the charge.

For he camels his back to bear the first notion of business.
For he is good to think on, if a man would express himself neatly.
For he made a great figure in Egypt for his signal services.
For he killed the Icneumon-rat very pernicious by land.<sup>4</sup>
For his ears are so acute that they sting again.
For from this proceeds the passing<sup>o</sup> quickness of his 65 attention.
For by stroking of him I have found out electricity.
For I perceived God's light about him both wax and fire.
For the Electrical fire is the spiritual substance, which God sends from heaven to sustain the bodies both of man and beast.
For God has blessed him in the variety of his movements.
70 For, though he cannot fly, he is an excellent clamberer.
For his motions upon the face of the earth are more than any other quadrupede.
For he can tread to all the measures upon the music.
For he can swim for life.
For he can creep.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH

ca. 1730–1774

Oliver Goldsmith was born in Ireland, the son of an Anglican clergyman whose geniality he inherited and whose improvidence he imitated. Disfigured by smallpox, he grew up homely, ungainly, apparently stupid, and certainly idle. Nonetheless, he was sent to Trinity College, Dublin, as a sizar—that is, a student who did menial jobs for well-to-do undergraduates—and took his B.A. in 1749. After studying medicine at the University of Edinburgh he wandered for a while on the Continent, visiting Holland, France, Italy, and Switzerland. He returned to England in 1756 with a mysteriously acquired M.D. and tried in vain to support himself as a physician among the poor in the London borough of Southwark. Eventually he drifted into the profession of hack writer for Ralph Griffiths, the proprietor of the Monthly Review, and later worked for and with the benevolent publisher John Newbery. His first success, An Inquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe (1759), attributes the decline of the fine arts in mid-eighteenth-century Europe to the lack of enlightened patronage and to the malign influence of criticism and scholarship. Soon he became a famous author and an intimate of the brilliant circle around Samuel Johnson. Although his writings brought in a great deal of money, extravagance and generosity kept him always in debt. He died owing the prodigious sum (for a man whose only source of income was writing) of £2000.

The variety and excellence of Goldsmith's work are astonishing. His easy and pleasant prose style and shrewd observations of character and scene enliven his essays, especially those in the series The Citizen of the World (1762; see p. 335), and his popular novel The Vicar of Wakefield (1766). Two plays, The Good-Natured Man (1768) and She Stoops to Conquer (1773), achieve a sort of hearty and mirthful comedy—unspoiled by the fashionable sentimentality of the moment—that is unique in the century. His two major poems, The Traveler, or A Prospect of Society (1764) and The Deserted Village, are distinguished for the unforced grace of their couplets and for an air of simplicity that is far from simple to achieve.

The Deserted Village<sup>1</sup>

Sweet Auburn! loveliest village of the plain,
Where health and plenty cheered the laboring swain,
Where smiling spring its earliest visit paid,
And parting summer's lingering blooms delayed:
5 Dear lovely bowers of innocence and ease,
Seats of my youth, when every sport could please,
How often have I loitered o'er thy green,
Where humble happiness endeared each scene;
How often have I paused on every charm,
10 The sheltered cot,<sup>o</sup> the cultivated farm,
The never-failing brook, the busy mill,
The decent church that topped the neighboring hill,
The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,
For talking age and whispering lovers made;
How often have I blessed the coming day,<sup>o</sup>
15 When toil remitting lent its turn to play,
And all the village train, from labor free,
Led up their sports beneath the spreading tree,
While many a pastime circled in the shade,
The young contending as the old surveyed;
20 And many a gambol frolicked o'er the ground,
And sleights of art and feats of strength went round;
And still as each repeated pleasure tired,
Succeeding sports the mirthful band inspired;
The dancing pair that simply sought renown,
25 By holding out to tire each other down;
The swain mistrustless of his smuttred face,
While secret laughter tittered round the place;
The bashful virgin's sidelong looks of love,
The matron's glance that would those looks reprove:
30

These were thy charms, sweet village! sports like these,
With sweet succession, taught even toil to please;
These round thy bowers their cheerful influence shed,
These were thy charms—But all these charms are fled.

35

Sweet smiling village, loveliest of the lawn,
Thy sports are fled, and all thy charms withdrawn;
Amidst thy bowers the tyrant's hand is seen,
And desolation saddens all thy green:
One only master grasps the whole domain,

Thomas Gainsborough, The Cottage Door, ca. 1778. Gainsborough painted several versions of this idealized view of home, motherhood, and childhood as experienced by peasants in rural Britain.

---

40 And half a tillage stints thy smiling plain;
No more thy glassy brook reflects the day,
But choked with sedges, works its weedy way;
Along thy glades, a solitary guest,
The hollow-sounding bittern guards its nest;
45 Amidst thy desert walks the lapwing flies,
And tires their echoes with unvaried cries.
Sunk are thy bowers, in shapeless ruin all,
And the long grass o'ertops the moldering wall;
And trembling, shrinking from the spoiler's hand,
50 Far, far away thy children leave the land.
    Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
Princes and lords may flourish, or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
55 But a bold peasantry, their country's pride.
When once destroyed, can never be supplied.
    A time there was, ere England's griefs began,
When every rood<sup>o</sup> of ground maintained its man;
For him light labor spread her wholesome store,
Just gave what life required, but gave no more:
60 His best companions, innocence and health;
And his best riches, ignorance of wealth.
    But times are altered; Trade's unfeeling train
Usurp the land and dispossess the swain;
Along the lawn, where scattered hamlets rose,
65 Unwieldy wealth, and cumbrous<sup>o</sup> pomp repose;
And every want to opulence allied,
And every pang that folly pays to pride.
These gentle hours that plenty bade to bloom,
Those calm desires that asked but little room,
70 Those healthful sports that graced the peaceful scene,

Lived in each look, and brightened all the green;
These far departing seek a kinder shore,
And rural mirth and manners are no more.

75 Sweet Auburn! parent of the blissful hour,
Thy glades forlorn confess the tyrant's power.
Here, as I take my solitary rounds,
Amidst thy tangling walks, and ruined grounds,
And, many a year elapsed, return to view
80 Where once the cottage stood, the hawthorn grew,
Remembrance wakes with all her busy train,
Swells at my breast, and turns the past to pain.

In all my wanderings round this world of care,
In all my griefs—and God has given my share—
85 I still had hopes my latest hours to crown,
Amidst these humble bowers to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting by repose.
I still had hopes, for pride attends us still,
Amidst the swains to show my book-learned skill,
90 Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
And, as an hare whom hounds and horns pursue,
Pants to the place from whence at first she flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
95 Here to return—and die at home at last.

O blest retirement, friend to life's decline,
Retreats from care that never must be mine,
How happy he who crowns in shades like these,
A youth of labor with an age of ease;
100 Who quits a world where strong temptations try,
And, since 'tis hard to combat, learns to fly!
For him no wretches, born to work and weep,
Explore the mine, or tempt the dangerous deep;
No surly porter stands in guilty state
105 To spurn imploring famine from the gate;
But on he moves to meet his latter end,

Angels around befriending virtue's friend;
Bends to the grave with unperceived decay,
While Resignation gently slopes the way;
110 And, all his prospects brightening to the last,
His Heaven commences ere the world be passed!
Sweet was the sound when oft at evening's close,
Up yonder hill the village murmur rose;
There, as I passed with careless steps and slow,
115 The mingling notes came softened from below;
The swain responsive as the milkmaid sung,
The sober herd that lowed to meet their young,
The noisy geese that gabbled o'er the pool,
The playful children just let loose from school;
120 The watchdog's voice that bayed the whispering wind,
And the loud laugh that spoke the vacant<sup>o</sup> mind;
These all in sweet confusion sought the shade,
And filled each pause the nightingale had made.
But now the sounds of population fail,
125 No cheerful murmurs fluctuate in the gale,
No busy steps the grass-grown footway tread,
For all the bloomy flush of life is fled.
All but yon widowed, solitary thing
That feebly bends beside the plashy<sup>o</sup> spring;
130 She, wretched matron, forced, in age, for bread,
To strip the brook with mantling cresses spread,
To pick her wintry faggot from the thorn,
To seek her nightly shed, and weep till morn;
She only left of all the harmless train,
135 The sad historian of the pensive<sup>o</sup> plain.
Near yonder copse, where once the garden smiled,
And still where many a garden flower grows wild,
There, where a few torn shrubs the place disclose,
The village preacher's modest mansion rose.
140 A man he was, to all the country dear,
And passing rich with forty pounds a year;

Remote from towns he ran his godly race,
Nor e'er had changed, nor wished to change his place;
145 Unpracticed he to fawn, or seek for power,
By doctrines fashioned to the varying hour;
Far other aims his heart had learned to prize,
More skilled to raise the wretched than to rise.
His house was known to all the vagrant train,
He chid their wanderings, but relieved their pain;
150 The long-remembered beggar was his guest,
Whose beard descending swept his aged breast;
The ruined spendthrift, now no longer proud,
Claimed kindred there, and had his claims allowed;
The broken soldier, kindly bade to stay,
155 Sate by his fire, and talked the night away;
Wept o'er his wounds, or tales of sorrow done, Shouldered his crutch, and showed how fields were won.
Pleased with his guests, the good man learned to glow,
And quite forgot their vices in their woe;
160 Careless their merits, or their faults to scan,
His pity gave ere charity began.
Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
And even his failings leaned to Virtue's side;
But in his duty prompt at every call,
165 He watched and wept, he prayed and felt, for all.
And, as a bird each fond endearment tries,
To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies,
He tried each art, reprov'd each dull delay,
Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.
170 Beside the bed where parting life was laid,
And sorrow, guilt, and pain, by turns dismayed,
The reverend champion stood. At his control,
Despair and anguish fled the struggling soul;
Comfort came down the trembling wretch to raise,

And his last faltering accents whispered praise.
175       At church, with meek and unaffected grace,
His looks adorned the venerable place;
Truth from his lips prevailed with double sway,
And fools, who came to scoff, remained to pray.
180       The service past, around the pious man,
With steady zeal each honest rustic ran;
Even children followed with endearing wile,
And plucked his gown, to share the good man's smile.
His ready smile a parent's warmth expressed,
185       Their welfare pleased him, and their cares distressed;
To them his heart, his love, his griefs were given,
But all his serious thoughts had rest in Heaven.
As some tall cliff that lifts its awful form,
Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm,
190       Though round its breast the rolling clouds are spread,
Eternal sunshine settles on its head.
      Beside yon straggling fence that skirts the way,
With blossomed furze unprofitably gay,
There, in his noisy mansion, skilled to rule,
195       The village master taught his little school;
A man severe he was, and stern to view,
I knew him well, and every truant knew;
Well had the boding tremblers learned to trace
The day's disasters in his morning face;
200       Full well they laughed with counterfeited glee,
At all his jokes, for many a joke had he;
Full well the busy whisper circling round,
Conveyed the dismal tidings when he frowned;
Yet he was kind, or if severe in aught,
205       The love he bore to learning was in fault;<sup>2</sup>
The village all declared how much he knew;
'Twas certain he could write, and cipher too;
Lands he could measure, terms and tides<sup>3</sup> presage,
And even the story ran that he could gauge.<sup>4</sup>
210       In arguing too, the parson owned his skill,

For even though vanquished, he could argue still;
While words of learned length, and thundering sound,
Amazed the gazing rustics ranged around;
And still they gazed, and still the wonder grew,
215 That one small head could carry all he knew.

But past is all his fame. The very spot
Where many a time he triumphed, is forgot.
Near yonder thorn, that lifts its head on high,
Where once the signpost caught the passing eye, 220 Low lies that house where nut-brown draughts inspired,

Where graybeard Mirth and smiling Toil retired,
Where village statesmen talked with looks profound,
And news much older than their ale went round.

Imagination fondly stoops to trace
225 The parlor splendors of that festive place:
The whitewashed wall, the nicely sanded floor,
The varnished clock that clicked behind the door;
The chest contrived a double debt to pay,
A bed by night, a chest of drawers by day;
230 The pictures placed for ornament and use,
The twelve good rules, the royal game of goose;<sup>5</sup>
The hearth, except when winter chilled the day,
With aspen boughs, and flowers, and fennel gay,
While broken teacups, wisely kept for show,
235 Ranged o'er the chimney, glistened in a row.

Vain transitory splendors! Could not all
Reprieve the tottering mansion from its fall!
Obscure it sinks, nor shall it more impart
An hour's importance to the poor man's heart;
240 Thither no more the peasant shall repair
To sweet oblivion of his daily care;
No more the farmer's news, the barber's tale,
No more the woodman's ballad shall prevail;
No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear,
245 Relax his ponderous strength, and lean to hear;

The host himself no longer shall be found
Careful to see the mantling bliss<sup>6</sup> go round;
Nor the coy maid, half willing to be pressed,
Shall kiss the cup to pass it to the rest.

250       Yes! let the rich deride, the proud disdain,
These simple blessings of the lowly train,
To me more dear, congenial to my heart,
One native charm, than all the gloss of art;
255       Spontaneous joys, where nature has its play,
The soul adopts, and owns their first-born sway;
Lightly they frolic o'er the vacant mind,
Unenvied, unmolested, unconfined.

But the long pomp, the midnight masquerade,
With all the freaks of wanton wealth arrayed,
260       In these, ere triflers half their wish obtain,
The toiling pleasure sickens into pain;
And, even while fashion's brightest arts decoy,
The heart distrusting asks, if this be joy.

265       Ye friends to truth, ye statesmen, who survey
The rich man's joys increase, the poor's decay,
'Tis yours to judge how wide the limits stand
Between a splendid and an happy land.

Proud swells the tide with loads of freighted ore,
And shouting Folly hails them from her shore;
270       Hoards, even beyond the miser's wish abound,
And rich men flock from all the world around.

Yet count our gains. This wealth is but a name
That leaves our useful products still the same.

275       Not so the loss. The man of wealth and pride
Takes up a space that many poor supplied;
Space for his lake, his park's extended bounds,
Space for his horses, equipage, and hounds;
The robe that wraps his limbs in silken sloth
Has robbed the neighboring fields of half their 280       growth;

His seat, where solitary sports are seen,

Indignant spurns the cottage from the green;
Around the world each needful product flies,
For all the luxuries the world supplies.
While thus the land adorned for pleasure all 285 In barren splendor feebly waits the fall.
    As some fair female unadorned and plain,
Secure to please while youth confirms her reign,
Slights every borrowed charm that dress supplies,
Nor shares with art the triumph of her eyes:
290 But when those charms are past, for charms are frail,
When time advances, and when lovers fail,
She then shines forth, solicitous to bless,
In all the glaring impotence of dress:
Thus fares the land, by luxury betrayed;
295 In nature's simplest charms at first arrayed;
But verging to decline, its splendors rise,
Its vistas strike, its palaces surprise;
While scourged by famine from the smiling land,
The mournful peasant leads his humble band;
300 And while he sinks without one arm to save,
The country blooms—a garden, and a grave.
    Where then, ah where, shall Poverty reside,
To 'scape the pressure of contiguous Pride?
If to some common's fenceless limits strayed,
305 He drives his flock to pick the scanty blade,
Those fenceless fields the sons of wealth divide,
And even the bare-worn common is denied.
    If to the city sped—What waits him there?
To see profusion that he must not share;
310 To see ten thousand baneful arts combined
To pamper luxury, and thin mankind;
To see those joys the sons of pleasure know,
Extorted from his fellow creature's woe.
Here, while the courtier glitters in brocade,
315 There the pale artist<sup>o</sup> plies the sickly trade;
Here, while the proud their long-drawn pomps display,

There the black gibbet glooms beside the way.
The dome where Pleasure holds her midnight reign,
Here, richly decked, admits the gorgeous train;
320 Tumultuous grandeur crowds the blazing square,
The rattling chariots clash, the torches glare.
Sure scenes like these no troubles e'er annoy!
Sure these denote one universal joy!
Are these thy serious thoughts?—Ah, turn thine eyes
325 Where the poor houseless shivering female lies.
She once, perhaps, in village plenty blest,
Has wept at tales of innocence distressed;
Her modest looks the cottage might adorn,
Sweet as the primrose peeps beneath the thorn;
330 Now lost to all; her friends, her virtue fled,
Near her betrayer's door she lays her head,
And pinched with cold, and shrinking from the shower,
With heavy heart deplores that luckless hour,
When idly first, ambitious of the town,
335 She left her wheel<sup>o</sup> and robes of country brown.
Do thine, sweet Auburn, thine, the loveliest train,
Do thy fair tribes participate her pain?
Even now, perhaps, by cold and hunger led,
At proud men's doors they ask a little bread!
340 Ah, no. To distant climes, a dreary scene,
Where half the convex world intrudes between,
Through torrid tracts with fainting steps they go,
Where wild Altama<sup>z</sup> murmurs to their woe.
Far different there from all that charmed before,
345 The various terrors of that horrid shore;
Those blazing suns that dart a downward ray,
And fiercely shed intolerable day;
Those matted woods where birds forget to sing,
But silent bats in drowsy clusters cling;
350 Those poisonous fields with rank luxuriance crowned,
Where the dark scorpion gathers death around;

Where at each step the stranger fears to wake
The rattling terrors of the vengeful snake;
Where crouching tigers<sup>8</sup> wait their hapless prey, 355 And savage men, more murderous still than they;
While oft in whirls the mad tornado flies,
Mingling the ravaged landscape with the skies.
Far different these from every former scene,
The cooling brook, the grassy-vested green,
360 The breezy covert of the warbling grove,
That only sheltered thefts of harmless love.
    Good Heaven! what sorrows gloomed that parting day,
That called them from their native walks away;
When the poor exiles, every pleasure past,
365 Hung round their bowers, and fondly looked their last,
And took a long farewell, and wished in vain
For seats like these beyond the western main;
And shuddering still to face the distant deep,
Returned and wept, and still returned to weep.
370 The good old sire, the first prepared to go
To new-found worlds, and wept for other's woe.
But for himself, in conscious virtue brave,
He only wished for worlds beyond the grave.
His lovely daughter, lovelier in her tears,
375 The fond companion of his helpless years,
Silent went next, neglectful of her charms,
And left a lover's for a father's arms.
With louder plaints the mother spoke her woes,
And blessed the cot where every pleasure rose;
380 And kissed her thoughtless babes with many a tear,
And clasped them close in sorrow doubly dear;
Whilst her fond husband strove to lend relief
In all the silent manliness of grief.
    O luxury! Thou cursed by Heaven's decree,
385 How ill exchanged are things like these for thee!
How do thy portions, with insidious joy,

Diffuse their pleasures only to destroy!
Kingdoms, by thee, to sickly greatness grown,
Boast of a florid vigor not their own.
390 At every draught more large and large they grow,
A bloated mass of rank unwieldy woe;
Till sapped their strength, and every part unsound,
Down, down they sink, and spread a ruin round.
Even now the devastation is begun,
395 And half the business of destruction done;
Even now, methinks, as pondering here I stand,
I see the rural Virtues leave the land.
Down where yon anchoring vessel spreads the sail,
That idly waiting flaps with every gale,
400 Downward they move, a melancholy band,
Pass from the shore, and darken all the strand.
Contented Toil, and hospitable Care,
And kind connubial Tenderness are there;
And Piety, with wishes placed above,
405 And steady Loyalty, and faithful Love:
And thou, sweet Poetry, thou loveliest maid,
Still o first to fly where sensual joys invade;
Unfit in these degenerate times of shame,
To catch the heart, or strike for honest fame;
410 Dear charming Nymph, neglected and decried,
My shame in crowds, my solitary pride;
Thou source of all my bliss, and all my woe,
That found'st me poor at first, and keep'st me so;
Thou guide by which the nobler arts excel,
415 Thou nurse of every virtue, fare thee well.
Farewell, and O! where'er thy voice be tried
On Torno's cliffs, or Pambamarca's side,<sup>9</sup>
Whether where equinoctial fervors glow,
Or winter wraps the polar world in snow,
420 Still let thy voice, prevailing over time,
Redress the rigors of the inclement clime;
Aid slighted truth, with thy persuasive strain

Teach erring man to spurn the rage of gain;
Teach him that states of native strength possessed,
425 Though very poor, may still be very blest;
That Trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay,
As ocean sweeps the labored mole<sup>1</sup> away;
While self-dependent power can time defy,
430 As rocks resist the billows and the sky.<sup>2</sup>

- Note 1:
The Deserted Village is an idealization of English rural life mingled with poignant memories of the poet's own youth in Lissoy, Ireland. Goldsmith was seriously concerned about the effects of the agricultural revolution then in progress, which was being hastened by Enclosure Acts. Either for the sake of more profitable farming or to create vast private parks and landscape gardens, arable land was being "enclosed"—that is, taken out the hands of small proprietors—thus displacing yeoman farmers who, like their ancestors, had lived for generations in small villages, grazing their cattle on common land and raising food on small holdings. The only alternative available to many such people was to seek employment in the city or to migrate to America. In the poem, Goldsmith opposes "luxury" (the increase of wealth, the growth of cities, and the costly country estates of great noblemen and wealthy merchants) to "rural virtue" (the old agrarian economy that supported a sturdy population of independent peasants). His poem is thus at once a nostalgic lament for a doomed way of life and a denunciation of what he regarded as the corrupting, destructive force of new wealth.

JAMES MACPHERSON (Ossian)

1736–1796

Ossian was a Gaelic bard from the third century—or was he?

In 1760, the young Scottish tutor James Macpherson published Fragments of Ancient Poetry, Collected in the Highlands of Scotland and Translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language. The book declared these fragments to be “genuine remains of ancient Scottish poetry” and associated them with the legendary hero and bard Ossian. The literati of the Scottish Enlightenment loved the idea of an ancient Scottish epic poem to rival Homer’s Iliad or Odyssey, and Macpherson was encouraged to go to the Highlands to collect more verse to translate—a task that involved searching for extant texts but also listening to old men’s stories and ballads. The results of this work were two epic poems, Fingal (1762) and Temora (1763), later published together as The Works of Ossian, Son of Fingal. Translated by James Macpherson (1765).

The Ossianic poems were a sensational success. Their reception was informed by lively interest in the period in relationships between Scotland and England but also between the oral and the written, the past and the present. As the influential Scottish literary critic (and Ossian fan) Hugh Blair (1718–1800) put it, the poems feature “the fire and enthusiasm” characteristic of ancient times but also a “tenderness” that resonated with eighteenth-century audiences—this poetry truly “deserves to be styled,” Blair asserted, “The Poetry of the Heart.” It seemed to many to capture something primal, heroic, and sublime about the Scottish Highlands—a place whose culture and way of life had seemed threatened since the British victory over Highland clans at the Battle of Culloden in 1746.

Questions about the poems' authenticity, however, soon arose. Had Macpherson really translated these from collected materials, or were the poems the figments of Macpherson's imagination? Dr. Samuel Johnson famously called the poetry "a cheat" and "an imposture" (see p. 892), and Macpherson could not produce any manuscripts that the Ossian poems exactly translated. The truth was that the Ossianic poems were neither "genuine" literal translations nor complete fakes. Ossian figures in Gaelic oral tradition and early written texts in both Scotland and Ireland, and Macpherson did eagerly collect and work from very old Gaelic ballads, both written and oral. But he also fundamentally reimagined these poems and stories to suit the tastes of his eighteenth-century readers—his poems were more like adaptations than translations.

As the controversy raged on, attempts to figure out precisely what Macpherson had done with his sources stimulated a new fascination about the art that did survive from the Scottish past (and the Irish and Welsh pasts—the figure of the bard catalyzed nationalist feeling across the British Isles). And the Ossian poems continued to be printed and read widely—in Britain but also in France, Italy, and Germany. Early Romantic writers would be inspired by the wild sublimity and tragic melancholy of Ossian's world. The poems also involved a kind of formal experimentation that seemed intriguing: the "translations" lacked rhyme, line, and meter but still seemed undeniably poetic. Both of the fragments featured here are about doomed warriors, and both feature the voice of an ancient bard. Contemporaries' fascination with such bardic mouthpieces for a heroic, lost past had everything to do with their sense of their own modernity.

Fragment 7<sup>1</sup>

Why openest thou afresh the spring of my grief, O son of Alpin, inquiring how Oscan fell? My eyes are blind with tears; but memory beams on my heart. How can I relate the mournful death of the head of the people! Prince of the warriors, Oscan, my son, shall I see thee no more!

He fell as the moon in a storm; as the sun from the midst of his course, when clouds rise from the waste of the waves, when the blackness of the storm enwraps the rocks of Ardannider. I, like an ancient oak on Morven,<sup>2</sup> I molder alone in my place. The blast<sup>3</sup> hath lopped my branches away; and I tremble at the wings of the north. Prince of the warriors, Oscan, my son! shall I see thee no more!

Dermid and Oscan were one: They reaped the battle together. Their friendship was strong as their steel; and death walked between them to the field. They came on the foe like two rocks falling from the brows of Ardven. Their swords were stained with the blood of the valiant: warriors fainted at their names. Who was a match for Oscan, but Dermid? and who for Dermid, but Oscan!

They killed mighty Dargo in the field; Dargo before invincible. His daughter was fair as the morn; mild as the beam of night. Her eyes, like two stars in a shower: her breath, the gale of spring: her breasts, as the new-fallen snow floating on the moving heath. The warriors saw her, and loved; their souls were fixed on the maid. Each loved her, as his fame; each must possess her or die. But her soul was fixed on Oscan; my son was the youth of her love. She forgot the blood of her father; and loved the hand that slew<sup>4</sup> him.

Son of Oscan, said Dermid, I love; O Oscan, I love this maid. But her soul cleaveth unto<sup>5</sup> thee; and nothing can heal Dermid. Here, pierce this bosom, Oscan; relieve me, my friend, with thy sword.

My sword, son of Mornny, shall never be stained with the blood of Dermid.

Who then is worthy to slay me, O Oscan son of Oscan? Let not my life pass away unknown. Let none but Oscan slay me. Send me with honor to the grave, and let my death be renowned.

Dermid, make use of thy sword; son of Morny, wield thy steel.
Would that I fell with thee! that my death came from the hand of Dermid!

They fought by the brook of the mountain; by the streams of Branno. Blood tinged the silvery stream, and crudled<sup>6</sup> round the mossy stones. Dermid the graceful fell; fell, and smiled in death.

And fallest thou, son of Morny; fallest, thou by Oscan's hand!
Dermid invincible in war, thus do I see thee fall!—He<sup>7</sup> went, and returned to the maid whom he loved; returned, but she perceived his grief.

Why that gloom, son of Oscan? What shades thy mighty soul?

Though once renowned for the bow, O maid, I have lost my fame. Fixed on a tree by the brook of the hill, is the shield of Gormur the brave, whom in battle I slew. I have wasted the day in vain, nor could my arrow pierce it.

Let me try, son of Oscan, the skill of Dargo's daughter. My hands were taught the bow: my father delighted in my skill.

She went. He stood behind the shield. Her arrow flew and pierced his breast.<sup>8</sup>

Blessed be that hand of snow; and blessed thy bow of yew! I fall resolved on death: and who but the daughter of Dargo was worthy to slay me? Lay me in the earth, my fair one; lay me by the side of Dermid.

Oscan! I have the blood, the soul of the mighty Dargo. Well pleased I can meet death. My sorrow I can end thus.—She pierced her white bosom with steel. She fell; she trembled; and died.

By the brook of the hill their graves are laid; a birch's unequal shade covers their tomb. Often on their green earthen tombs the branchy<sup>9</sup> sons of the mountain feed, when midday is all in flames, and silence is over all the hills.

Fragment 12<sup>1</sup>

Ryno:

The wind and the rain are over: calm is the noon of day. The clouds are divided in heaven. Over the green hills flies the inconstant sun. Red through the stony vale comes down the stream of the hill. Sweet are thy murmurs, O stream! But more sweet is the voice I hear. It is the voice of Alpin, the son of the song, mourning for the dead. Bent is his head of age, and red his tearful eye. Alpin, thou son of the song, why alone on the silent hill? Why complainest thou, as a blast in the wood; as a wave on the lonely shore?

Alpin:

My tears, O Ryno! are for the dead; my voice, for the inhabitants of the grave. Tall thou art on the hill; fair among the sons of the plain. But thou shalt fall like Morar;<sup>2</sup> and the mourner shalt sit on thy tomb. The hills shall know thee no more; thy bow shall lie in the hall, unstrung.

Thou wert swift, O Morar! as a roe on the hill; terrible as a meteor of fire. Thy wrath was as the storm of December. Thy sword in battle, as lightning in the field. Thy voice was like a stream after rain; like thunder on distant hills. Many fell by thy arm; they were consumed in the flames of thy wrath.

But when thou returnedst from war, how peaceful was thy brow! Thy face was like the sun after rain; like the moon in the silence of night; calm as the breast of the lake when the loud wind is laid.

Narrow is thy dwelling now; dark the place of thine abode. With three steps I compass thy grave, O thou who wast so great before! Four stones with their heads of moss are the only memorial of thee. A tree with scarce a leaf, long grass which whistles in the wind, mark to the hunter's eye the grave of the mighty Morar. Morar! Thou art low indeed. Thou hast no mother to mourn thee; no maid with her tears of love. Dead is she that brought thee forth. Fallen is the daughter of Morglan.<sup>3</sup>

Who on his staff is this? Who is this, whose head is white with age, whose eyes are red with tears, who quakes at every step?—It is thy father, O Morar! The father of none but thee. He heard of thy fame in battle; he heard of foes dispersed. He heard of Morar's fame; why did he not hear of his wound? Weep, thou father of Morar! Weep; but thy son heareth thee not. Deep is the sleep of the dead; low their pillow of dust. No more shall he hear thy voice; no more shall he awake at thy call. When shall it be morn in the grave, to bid the slumberer awake?

Farewell, thou bravest of men! Thou conqueror in the field! But the field shall see thee no more; nor the dark wood be lightened with the splendor of thy steel. Thou hast left no son. But the song shall preserve thy name. Future times shall hear of thee; they shall hear of the fallen Morar.

Britain and Transatlantic Slavery

British pirates and traders had engaged, mostly sporadically, in the European trade in enslaved Africans from the mid-sixteenth century onward, but 1660, the year the monarchy was restored to England, was a major turning point. That year saw the founding of the Company of Royal Adventurers Trading into Africa, which was reorganized into the Royal African Company in 1672. It was in this period that enslavement became a mass enterprise in the British economy: the notorious Triangle Trade was established. Ships from London, Liverpool, and Bristol in England, and eventually Glasgow in Scotland, brought manufactured goods such as liquor, textiles, weapons, and gunpowder to the western coast of sub-Saharan Africa, along the Bight of Benin in the Gulf of Guinea. They traded these goods with African elites for enslaved Africans, often those captured in wars between African nations and ethnic groups, fomented by the Europeans themselves to promote the trade. Then began the terrible journey across the Atlantic, known as the Middle Passage: European enslavers forced multitudes of Africans into foully unclean, grotesquely overcrowded ships; approximately 15 percent of them did not survive the journey to the ships' destinations in the Caribbean and mainland North America. Jamaica, which the British seized from the Spanish in 1655, came to be the British Empire's most lucrative and brutal sugar colony: more enslaved people were taken to that relatively small island than to all of mainland North America. British sugar islands in the Caribbean also included Barbados, St. Kitts, Montserrat, Antigua, Grenada—the list goes on. Those who disembarked faced what contemporaries called "seasoning," the adjustment to living and working conditions on plantations—a period of high mortality rates due to disease, malnutrition, mistreatment, the severity of the labor, and suicide.

After this initial period, conditions for enslaved people remained relentlessly harsh, and enslaved women faced the terrible additional threat of sexual violence. Meanwhile the ships that brought Africans to the western colonies would return to Britain with the raw or partly processed products of enslaved labor—especially sugar, but also tobacco, cocoa, coffee, ginger, and cotton—and the cycle would begin again.

The Royal African Company was a royal monopoly: its first governor was the brother of King Charles II, James, Duke of York, who would become King James II in 1685. The Company also supplied the government with precious metals, coining a famous denomination of British currency, the guinea, named for the gold that composed it, sourced from West Africa: originally worth 20 to 25 shillings, it bore symbols associated with the RAC's enslaving activities, including, in different mintages, the elephant, the elephant and castle, and the face of James II. The British engagement with the trade in enslaved Africans would increase to newly high levels during the reign of the next king, William III, with the Trade with Africa Act of 1698. Ending the Company's monopoly, the act allowed all British merchants to engage in the trade if they paid a 10 percent duty to maintain the RAC's infrastructure of enslavement—settlements on the coast of Africa variously called forts, factories, and castles. Subsequently, as part of the Treaty of Utrecht of 1713 that ended the War of the Spanish Succession, Britain would gain another component of the trade: the monopoly, called the asiento de negros, to supply the Spanish Empire with enslaved Africans for thirty years, in ships principally bound for Cuba, and for Central and South America. The South Sea Company, which held the asiento, collapsed spectacularly in 1720 but continued to trade in enslaved people for years afterward, though the asiento was frequently interrupted when Britain went to war with Spain. The Royal African Company itself, which regained its monopoly over the British part of the trade in 1714 only to lose it permanently in 1726, finally disappeared in 1750, but was replaced by another British trading consortium, the African Company of Merchants, in 1752. Numerous British business arrangements succeeded, failed, and reorganized, and companies boomed and went bust during the long engagement of Britain in the transatlantic trade. Through it all, the numbers of Africans taken by British enslavers relentlessly accumulated.

According to the website slavevoyages.org, the six peak decades of Britain's total trafficking occurred after 1750, right up to the year of its abolition, 1807, with numbers of people abducted from Africa ranging from 255,346 in 1751–60 to a high of 385,928 in 1791–1800. All told, British enslavers took an estimated 3,259,439 people; of these, 2,733,323 disembarked, enslaved, in the Western Hemisphere.

William Blake, Europe Supported by Africa & America, 1796. Blake follows the allegorical tradition of representing the continents as beautiful women. The armbands on Africa and America signify their enslavement, but their strength supports Europe, and unlike hers, their eyes meet the viewer's. From John Stedman, Narrative of a Five Years Expedition against the Revolted Negroes of Surinam . . . from the Year 1772, to 1777 (1796).

Despite its steady growth over some 150 years, the British system of enslavement met considerable and consistent resistance, especially from the Black people taken in the trade. Uprisings aboard enslavers' ships were common and widely feared by British traders (see William Snelgrave's account of these fears below). And on the colonial plantations themselves, a sequence of rebellions throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries (and beyond) seriously challenged Britain's colonial power in the Caribbean. British colonists and writers often linked such rebellions with a particular group of Africans, associated with the Akan ethnic group, whom they called "Coromantee," named after a British fort near the African town of Kormantse in what is now Ghana. Aphra Behn's Oroonoko, with a hero said to be from "Coramantien," offers a fictionalized account of one such rebellion in mid-seventeenth-century South America (see p. 152). Among the most extensive of actual "Coromantee" revolts was Tacky's Rebellion, or Tacky's War, named after its leader (also called Takyi), which began in 1760 on Jamaica and lasted months, with repercussions carrying on for years, providing inspiration to enslaved people throughout the Caribbean and beyond. Other, more quiet forms of resistance by enslaved people, including work slowdowns and acts of sabotage, significantly reduced the profitability of the enslavers' system.

Portrait of Dido Belle and Lady Elizabeth Murray, ca. 1778, by David Martin. Dido Belle, left, was born enslaved in the West Indies around 1761 to an enslaved woman, Maria Belle. Dido's father, Sir John Lindsay, brought her and her mother to England around 1765, where Dido was baptized. She was taken into the household of Lindsay's uncle, William Murray, Earl of Mansfield, and raised as a free English gentlewoman, with another niece of Lord Mansfield's, Lady Elizabeth Murray (right). Lord Mansfield's famous ruling in the Somerset case in 1772 (see below) seemed to many to declare slavery illegal in England—a decision, some suggested, that was influenced by his family relationship to Dido Belle.

Principled calls in public discourse for abolition resisted slavery at another level. Such challenges were at first isolated and unorganized, but they grew in urgency and scale, in mainland North America and Britain. In the late seventeenth century, members of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, began to preach against enslavement, denouncing it as un-Christian; this developing tradition resulted in the important antislavery texts and abolitionist activism of Philadelphia Quaker Anthony Benezet (see below). Other White abolitionists raised their voices through the middle decades of the century: in Britain, the most famous among them was Granville Sharp (1735–1813). Black activists, including Olaudah Equiano (see p. 1081) and Ottobah Cugoana (see below), helped lead the British abolitionist movement, which began to gain ground after the Somerset decision in 1772, a court case supported by Sharp that seemed to declare that slavery on English soil had no basis in law (see below). Abolitionism finally began to achieve more widespread popular support by the 1780s: it became a celebrated cause among both the fervent and the fashionable in Britain. British parliamentary leaders of the movement to end the transatlantic trade, including William Wilberforce, put the first abolition bill to a vote in 1789, which was defeated by proslavery interests. In North America, the stirrings of abolition began somewhat earlier; Black leaders such as Prince Hall of Boston helped link emancipation of the enslaved to the ideals of the new nation declared in 1776 (see below). By the time the United States Constitution was ratified in 1789, several Northern states had outlawed enslavement, either outright or on schemes of gradual emancipation, and more would soon do so. But the new Constitution created a national structure in which “free” states were bound not only to accommodate but also to help maintain slavery in areas where it continued. Britain banned the transatlantic trade in 1807; the United States would also do so in 1808 (though the trade internal to the United States would go on). In 1833, slavery itself would be finally abolished in nearly all of Britain’s overseas colonies. The campaign against slavery was a long, grinding, passionate one, full of high ideals—though a long (sometimes contested) tradition of historiography has argued that it finally succeeded only when enslavement’s profitability had begun to fail.

Various genres of literature in the eighteenth century addressed enslavement and the traffic in enslaved Africans by blending fact and fiction, idealism and realism, acceptance and critique. Literary historians have been struck by the very large proportion of poems in English about slavery that took a stand against it, from the late seventeenth century onward, and especially after the middle of the eighteenth. But exceptions, such as James Boswell's unambiguously titled "No Abolition of Slavery" (see below), exist; poems such as The Sugar-Cane by James Grainger (see below) seem both to deplore and to materially support enslavers' practices; and even ardently antislavery poems employ racializing and other culturally biased rhetoric that demands critical scrutiny. Fiction and drama also treated slavery in complex ways, in passing or at length, but the literary genre that offers perhaps the fullest depiction of it is memoir. Ottobah Cugoano and especially Olaudah Equiano present firsthand views of what being enslaved was like; from the opposite perspective, William Snelgrave offers insight into what he, as an enslaver, thought he was doing. The genres presented here that are not usually considered "literary" today—the petition, the polemic, the philosophical treatise—use carefully crafted, inventive rhetoric to work through arguments about slavery's meanings and costs.

The cluster below offers only a small fraction of writing about slavery published in English in the eighteenth century. A considerable number of pamphlets and essays attempted to justify it, or at least downplay its horrors and extol its economic benefits. The system of enslavement enriched estates across Britain and wielded enormous power in the nation's affairs—in government, business, and the media—and this cannot be understood without a critical encounter with the ideological apparatus that upheld it, represented here by selections from Snelgrave, Grainger, Boswell, and, most graphically, a page from the Jamaica Mercury, a newspaper, with advertisements showing how thoroughly slavery was woven into the total economy. The cluster also provides an opportunity to listen to a range of Black voices, from Cugoano to Jupiter Hammon, on the issue of slavery. Black people taken by force into British dominions were using the English language in the period in vast numbers, but writing and publishing remained almost completely closed to them. Some colonial regimes made English literacy for Black people a crime, and publishers in Britain and elsewhere had little inclination to bring their writing into print. Several Black authors nonetheless arose in these utterly unfavorable circumstances to protest injustices faced by their people, analyze the dynamics of enslavement and other forms of racist oppression, and contribute profoundly to abolitionist causes. They offered much more as well: the literary works of Francis Williams (ca. 1700–1770), Phillis Wheatley (see p. 985), Ignatius Sancho (see p. 1019), and others range generously across their authors' intellectual, religious, and aesthetic interests.

The language of enslavement, race, and ethnicity in the eighteenth century differs significantly from current usage. In the following cluster, both White and Black writers commonly use the word "slaves" to refer to those taken in the trade; scholars now refer to "enslaved people" to avoid defining the identity or existence of human beings with a status imposed by force on them by someone else. For similar reasons, scholars now avoid saying that one person was "owned by" or was the "property of" another (and by extension that a person was "sold to" or "bought by" someone else), or that a person was another's "master" or "owner." The word negro, sometimes capitalized, was commonly used in the period by Black and White writers as a "correct," respectful, or at least neutral term to refer to people with sub-Saharan African heritage; the word has fallen out of use now because it is seen as antiquated, and some now consider it a slur. Interestingly, among the Black writers included in this volume, only the most militant of them, Ottobah Cugoana, seems to avoid the term, and usually uses "Black" or "African" in his book instead, though it is not easy to conclude exactly what that means. (Of course, like any other polite or correct word, the term negro may be employed in the period in dismissive or disparaging ways, and all its occurrences are open to interpretation.) Throughout this volume, the headnotes, footnotes, and other editorial apparatus adhere to current standards of usage, which aim to ensure that our language does not endorse the dehumanizing premises that allowed this trade to flourish. The language of authors of the Restoration period and the eighteenth century included here is always their own.

JOHN LOCKE

The Two Treatises of Government (1689–90) by John Locke (1632–1704) have served as a blueprint for what has been called modern liberalism: the doctrine that all people are naturally free and must obey only those laws that they themselves or their elected representatives have contrived and ratified. Locke's Treatises promote a view of government radically at odds with, and designed to rebut, the theory of absolute monarchy propounded by Sir Robert Filmer (1588–1653), whose Patriarcha (1680, probably completed by the late 1630s) claimed that subjects owe unquestioning submission to kings, who ultimately derive their authority from God. It is unclear how powerfully Locke's Treatises influenced political radicalism in the decades immediately after his death—his An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1689–90; see p. 117) exerted a far more overt, palpable influence on philosophy—but by the time of the founding of the United States in 1776, Locke had become an important theorist of liberty for those promoting representative government.

The centrality of the concept of slavery for such discussions is illustrated by the excerpts from the Two Treatises below. Locke's definition of slavery—to be subject to “the unconstant, uncertain, unknown arbitrary will of another man”—is deliberately broad. It refers to various systems of slavery throughout history, in Europe, Africa, and Asia, as well as the chattel slavery introduced by Europeans in their colonies in the Western Hemisphere. But for Locke, slavery also applies to a nation's political subjugation to a tyrant, and could describe what the French endured under Louis XIV, or what the English would face under an absolute Stuart monarch. When Britons declare in coming decades that they refuse to be “slaves,” they often have this political meaning in mind; but an awareness of the chattel slavery practiced in British sugar colonies also surely lurked behind such declamations. In Locke's time, these actualities were becoming more directly evident, as the Royal African Company (founded 1672) increasingly profited by abducting Africans and taking them to a life of forced labor in the Americas. Scholars have long noted that Locke himself held stock in the Company and other ventures that profited from enslavement, and that he helped draft the Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina (1669), a legal framework for nearly all territory between Virginia and Florida that granted each plantation owner “absolute power and authority over his negro slaves.” Several interpretations have been advanced as to how Locke could both detest and seem to condone enslavement. In Chapter 1 of the first Treatise below, he finds slavery incompatible with “the generous temper and courage of our nation” (a common idea in Britain): perhaps he thought it was acceptable for people of other nations, or “races,” to be enslaved. The selection from the second Treatise repeats the ancient idea that combatants captured in a just war were enslavable: it is possible he tried to see people forcibly removed from Africa by Britons as such captives. More broadly, this fissure in Locke’s thinking has been seen as inherent to liberal capitalism, wherein the freedom to make a profit and own property overrides the freedoms of those whom the profiteer-owner exploits.

Some recent scholarship, however, has stressed the fierce antagonism between Locke and the Stuart monarchy which controlled the Royal African Company. Charles II and especially his brother, the Duke of York, later James II, fervently believed in the absolute authority held by some human beings over others and in hereditary rule and servitude. The latter belief was directly relevant to a system developing the idea that enslaved status is heritable. On this interpretation, Locke drafted the Fundamental Constitutions less as an ideologue than as legal secretary for the lords proprietors of the colony. He sold his stock in the RAC soon after he had received it as payment, and he applauded efforts to beat back the institution of slavery in Britain’s colonies. The disgust for slavery in the selections below may thus reflect a development in his thinking: perhaps all forms of slavery, including chattel slavery in British colonies, had come to seem reprehensible to him. In any case, the selections indicate how fully theories of liberty in the period relied on understandings of slavery, and suggest a range of ways in which the two concepts would be entangled as liberty-loving Britain engaged more and more robustly in the trade in human beings in the decades after Locke.

From Two Treatises of Government

From *Treatise 1: Of Government

Chapter I [Introduction]

1. Slavery is so vile and miserable an estate<sup>1</sup> of man, and so directly opposite to the generous temper and courage of our nation, that 'tis hardly to be conceived that an Englishman, much less a gentleman, should plead for it. And truly I should have taken Sir Robert Filmer's Patriarcha, as any other treatise which would persuade all men that they are slaves, and ought to be so, for such another exercise of wit as was his who writ the encomium of Nero;<sup>2</sup> rather than for a serious discourse meant in earnest, had not the gravity of the title and epistle, the picture in the front of the book,<sup>3</sup> and the applause that followed it, required me to believe that the author and publisher were both in earnest. I therefore took it into my hands with all the expectation, and read it through with all the attention, due to a treatise that made such a noise at its coming abroad, and cannot but confess myself mightily surprised that in a book, which was to provide chains for all mankind, I should find nothing but a rope of sand;<sup>4</sup> useful perhaps to such whose skill and business it is to raise a dust, and would blind the people the better to mislead them; but in truth not of any force to draw those into bondage who have their eyes open, and so much sense about them as to consider that chains are but an ill wearing,<sup>5</sup> how much care soever hath been taken to file and polish them.

2. If anyone think I take too much liberty in speaking so freely of a man who is the great champion of absolute power and the idol of those who worship it, I beseech him to make this small allowance for once, to one who, even after the reading of Sir Robert's book, cannot but think himself, as the laws allow him, a freeman. And I know no fault it is to do so, unless any one better skilled in the fate of it than I, should have it revealed to him that this treatise, which has lain dormant so long,<sup>6</sup> was, when it appeared in the world, to carry, by strength of its arguments, all liberty out of it; and that, from thenceforth, our author's short model was to be the pattern in the mount,<sup>7</sup> and the perfect standard of politics for the future. His system lies in a little compass, it is no more but this,

“That all government is absolute monarchy.”

And the ground he builds on is this,

“That no man is born free.”

3. In this last age a generation of men has sprung up amongst us that would flatter princes with an opinion that they have a divine right to absolute power, let the laws by which they are constituted and are to govern, and the conditions under which they enter upon their authority, be what they will, and their engagements to observe them ever so well ratified by solemn oaths and promises. To make way for this doctrine, they have denied mankind a right to natural freedom; whereby they have not only, as much as in them lies, exposed all subjects to the utmost misery of tyranny and oppression, but have also unsettled the titles and shaken the thrones of princes (for they too, by these men’s system, except only one, are all born slaves, and by divine right are subjects to Adam’s right heir);<sup>8</sup> as if they had designed to make war upon all government, and subvert the very foundations of human society, to serve their present turn.

From *Treatise 2: Of Civil Government

Chapter IV. Of Slavery

22. The natural liberty of man is to be free from any superior power on earth, and not to be under the will or legislative authority of man, but to have only the law of nature for his rule. The liberty of man in society is to be under no other legislative power, but that established, by consent, in the commonwealth; nor under the dominion of any will, or restraint of any law, but what that legislative shall enact, according to the trust put in it. Freedom then is not what sir Robert Filmer tells us, O. A. 55, "a liberty for every one to do what he lists, to live as he pleases, and not to be tied by any laws";<sup>9</sup> but freedom of men under government is to have a standing rule to live by, common to every one of that society, and made by the legislative power erected in it; a liberty to follow my own will in all things, where the rule prescribes not; and not to be subject to the inconstant, uncertain, unknown, arbitrary will of another man: as freedom of nature is to be under no other restraint but the law of nature.

23. This freedom from absolute, arbitrary power is so necessary to and closely joined with a man's preservation that he cannot part with it but by what forfeits his preservation and life together. For a man, not having the power of his own life, cannot by compact or his own consent enslave himself to any one, nor put himself under the absolute, arbitrary power of another, to take away his life, when he pleases.<sup>1</sup> Nobody can give more power than he has himself; and he that cannot take away his own life, cannot give another power over it. Indeed having by his fault forfeited his own life, by some act that deserves death; he, to whom he has forfeited it, may (when he has him in his power) delay to take it, and make use of him to his own service, and he does him no injury by it. For, whenever he finds the hardship of his slavery outweigh the value of his life, 'tis in his power, by resisting the will of his master, to draw on himself the death he desires.

24. This is the perfect condition of slavery, which is nothing else, but the state of war continued, between a lawful conqueror and a captive.<sup>2</sup> For, if once compact enter between them,<sup>3</sup> and make an agreement for a limited power on the one side, and obedience on the other, the state of war and slavery ceases, as long as the compact endures. For, as has been said, no man can, by agreement, pass over to another that which he hath not in himself, a power over his own life.

I confess, we find among the Jews, as well as other nations, that men did sell themselves; but 'tis plain, this was only to drudgery, not to slavery. For it is evident the person sold was not under an absolute, arbitrary, despotical power. For the master could not have power to kill him, at any time, whom at a certain time, he was obliged to let go free out of his service; and the master of such a servant was so far from having an arbitrary power over his life, that he could not, at pleasure, so much as maim him, but the loss of an eye, or tooth, set him free, Exod. xxi.<sup>4</sup>

WILLIAM SNELGRAVE

By the time he published A New Account of Some Parts of Guinea, and the Slave Trade (1734), the English sea captain William Snelgrave (1681–1743) had participated in the trafficking of enslaved Africans for some thirty years. Like other accounts of travel and true adventures in the period, his work is intended to give British readers a sense of what was going on along the edges of a growing empire that was making their home country rich. Packed with commentary and incidents, such as a history of the conflict between the African kingdoms of Whidaw (Xwéda) and Dahomey, and the story of Snelgrave's own kidnapping by pirates off the coast of Africa, the book also describes his role, and understanding of himself, as an enslaver. He says in his preface that he included this description to answer a friend "who had objected against the lawfulness of that trade." While his attempt to justify it is not very long or elaborate—he says he "will not here undertake to refute" all the objections to European practices of enslavement—he nonetheless presents some common rationalizations and a striking picture of a mind working to reconcile itself to trafficking in "these poor people," as he repeatedly calls those he holds in bondage aboard his ship. The account also indirectly suggests the nature and relative force of objections to the trade at Snelgrave's historical moment, decades before an extensive abolitionist movement had grown in North America and Britain toward the end of the century. Snelgrave insists that he treats those he has enslaved with kindness, which he says is both morally right and profitable: relatively humane treatment helps prevent uprisings of captured Africans aboard ship. But by laying stress on how frequently such uprisings occur, and on his own exceptional humanity, he implies that a general cruelty tends to dominate the trade. For a critical response to Snelgrave's characterizations of enslaving practices, see Anthony Benezet (below); and for direct, unvarnished views of the experience of enslavement from those who endured it themselves, see firsthand accounts by Olaudah Equiano (p. 1081) and Ottobah Cugoano (below).

Guinea, and the Slave Trade<sup>1</sup>

From *Chapter 2

Before I give a particular relation of the several mutinies among the Negro slaves, whereof I have been a witness, and which is to be the chief subject of this present book,<sup>2</sup> it will be very proper to prefix a short account of the manner how the Negroes become slaves; what numbers of them are yearly exported from Guinea;<sup>3</sup> and then offer a few words in justification of that trade.

As for the manner how those people become slaves; it may be reduced under these several heads.

I. It has been the custom among the Negroes, time out of mind, and is so to this day, for them to make slaves of all the captives they take in war. Now, before they had an opportunity of selling them to the white people,<sup>4</sup> they were often obliged to kill great multitudes, and when they had taken more than they could well employ in their own plantations, for fear they should rebel, and endanger their masters' safety.

2dly. Most crimes amongst them are punished by mulcts and fines; and if the offender has not wherewithal to pay the fine, he is sold for a slave; this is the practice of the inland people, as well as those on the seaside.

3dly. Debtors who refuse to pay their debts, or are insolvent, are likewise liable to be made slaves; but their friends may redeem them: and if they not able or willing to do it, then they are generally sold for the benefit of their creditors. But few of these come into the hands of the Europeans, being kept by their countrymen for their own use.

4thly. I have been told that it is common for some inland people to sell their children for slaves, though they are under no necessity for so doing; which I am inclined to believe. But I never observed that the people near the sea coast practice this, unless compelled thereto by extreme want and famine, as the people of Whidaw<sup>5</sup> have lately been.

Now by these means it is that so many of the Negroes become slaves, and specifically by being taken captive in war. Of these the number is so great that I may safely affirm without any exaggeration that the Europeans of all nations that trade to the coast of Guinea have in some years exported at least seventy thousand. And though this may no doubt be thought at first hearing a prodigious number; yet when 'tis considered how great the extent of this coast is, namely from Cape Verde to Angola, which is about four thousand miles in length; and that polygamy is allowed in general amongst them, by which means the countries are full of people, I hope it will not be thought improbable that so many are yearly exported from thence.

Several objections have often been raised against the lawfulness of this trade, which I shall not here undertake to refute. I shall only observe in general, that though to traffic in human creatures may at first sight appear barbarous, inhuman, and unnatural; yet the traders herein have as much to plead in their own excuse as can be said for some other branches of trade, namely, the advantage of it: and that not in regard of the merchants, but also of the slaves themselves,<sup>6</sup> as will plainly appear from these following reasons.

First, it is evident, that abundance of captives taken in war would be inhumanly destroyed, was there not an opportunity of disposing of them to the Europeans. So that at least many lives are saved; and great numbers of useful persons kept in being.

Secondly, when they are carried to the plantations, they generally live much better there, than they ever did in their own country; for as the planters pay a great price for them, 'tis in their interest to take care of them.<sup>7</sup>

Thirdly, by this means the English plantations have been so much improved, that 'tis almost incredible, what great advantages have accrued to the nation thereby; especially to the Sugar Islands,<sup>8</sup> which lying in a climate near as hot as the coast of Guinea, the Negroes are fitter to cultivate the lands there, than white people.

Then as to the criminals amongst the Negroes, they are by this means effectually transported, never to return again; a benefit which we very much want here.<sup>9</sup>

In a word, from this trade proceed benefits far outweighing all either real or pretended mischiefs and inconveniences. And, let the worst that can be said of it, it will be found, like all other earthly advantages, tempered with a mixture of good and evil.

I come now to give an account of the mutinies that have happened on board the ships where I have been.

These mutinies are generally occasioned by the sailors' ill usage of these poor people, when on board the ships wherein they are transported to our plantations. Wherever therefore I have commanded, it has been my principal care to have the Negroes on board my ship kindly used; and I have always strictly charged my white people to treat them with humanity and tenderness; in which I have usually found my account,<sup>1</sup> both in keeping them from mutinying, and preserving them in health.

And whereas it may seem strange, to those that are unacquainted with the method of managing them, how we can carry so many hundreds together in a small ship, and keep them in order, I shall just mention what is generally practiced. When we purchase grown people, I acquaint them by the interpreter that, now they are become my property, I think fit to let them know what they are bought for, that they may be easy in their minds (for these poor people are generally under terrible apprehensions upon their being bought by white men, many being afraid that we design to eat them; which, I have been told, is a story much credited by the inland Negroes).<sup>2</sup> So after informing them, that they are bought to till the ground in our country, with several other matters, I then acquaint them how they are to behave themselves on board towards the white men; that if any one abuses them, they are to complain to the linguist,<sup>3</sup> who is to inform me of it, and I will do them justice; but if they make a disturbance, or offer to strike a white man, they must expect to be severely punished.

When we purchase the Negroes, we couple the sturdy men together with irons; but we suffer the women and children to go freely about; and soon after we have sailed from the coast, we undo all the men's irons.<sup>4</sup>

They are fed twice a day, and are allowed in fair weather to come on deck at seven a clock in the morning, and to remain there, if they think proper, till sun setting. Every Monday morning they are served with pipes and tobacco, which they are very fond of. The men Negroes lodge separate from the women and children: and the places where they all lie are cleaned every day, some white men being appointed to see them do it.

* * *

I have been several voyages when there has been no attempt made by our Negroes to mutiny; which, I believe, was owing chiefly to their being kindly used, and to my officers' care in keeping a good watch. But sometimes we meet with stout stubborn people amongst them, who are never to be made easy; and these are generally some of the Cormantines, a nation of the Gold Coast.<sup>5</sup> I went in the year 1721, in the Henry of London, a voyage to that part of the coast, and bought a good many of these people. We were obliged to secure them very well in irons, and watch them narrowly: Yet they nevertheless mutinied, though they had little prospect of succeeding. I lay at that time near a place called Mumfort<sup>6</sup> on the Gold Coast, having near five hundred Negroes on board, three hundred of which were men. Our ship's company consisted of fifty white people, all in health. And I had very good officers; so that I was very easy in all respects.

This mutiny began at midnight (the moon then shining very bright) in this manner. Two men that stood sentry at the forehatch way, where the men slaves came up to the house of office,<sup>7</sup> permitted four to go to that place; but neglected to lay the gratings again, as they should have done: whereupon four more Negroes came on deck, which had got their irons off, and the four in the house of office having done the same, all the eight fell on the two sentries, who immediately called out for help. The Negroes endeavored to get their cutlasses from them, but the lineyards (that is the lines by which the handles of the cutlasses were fastened to the men's wrists) were so twisted in the scuffle that they could not get them off before we came to their assistance. The Negroes perceiving several white men coming towards them, with arms in their hands, quitted the sentries, and jumped over the ship's side into the sea.

I being by this time come forward on the deck, my first care was to secure the gratings, to prevent any more Negroes from coming up; and then I ordered people to get into the boat,<sup>8</sup> and save those that had jumped overboard, which they luckily did: for they found them all clinging to the cables the ship was moored by.

After we had secured these people, I called the linguists, and ordered them to bid the men Negroes between decks<sup>9</sup> be quiet (for there was a great noise amongst them). On their being silent, I asked what had induced them to mutiny? They answered, I was a great rogue to buy them, in order to carry them away from their own country; and that they were resolved to regain their liberty if possible. I replied that they had forfeited their freedom before I bought them, either by crimes, or by being taken in war, according to the custom of their country; and they being now my property, I was resolved to let them feel my resentment, if they abused my kindness; asking at the same time whether they had been ill used by the white men, or had wanted for anything the ship afforded. To this they replied, they had nothing to complain of. Then I observed to them that if they should gain their point<sup>1</sup> and escape to shore, it would be no advantage to them, because their countrymen would catch them, and sell them to other ships. This served my purpose, and they seemed to be convinced of their fault, begging I would forgive them, and promising for the future to be obedient and never mutiny again if I would not punish them this time. This I readily granted, and so they went to sleep. When daylight came we called the men Negroes up on deck, and examining their irons, found them all secure. So this affair happily ended, which I was very glad of; for these people are the stoutest and most sensible Negroes on the coast; neither are they so weak<sup>2</sup> as to imagine as others do, that we buy them to eat them, being satisfied we carry them to work in our plantations, as they do in their own country.

However, a few days after this, we discovered they were plotting again, and preparing to mutiny. For some of the ringleaders proposed to one of our linguists, if he could procure them an ax, they would cut the cables the ship rid by<sup>3</sup> in the night; and so on her driving (as they imagined) ashore, they should get out of our hands, and then would become his servants as long as they lived.

For the better understanding of this I must observe here that these linguists are natives and freemen of the country, whom we hire on account of their speaking good English, during the time we remain trading on the coast; and they are likewise brokers between us and the Black merchants.

This linguist was so honest as to acquaint me with what had been proposed to him, and advised me to keep a strict watch over the slaves; for though he had represented to them the same as I had done on their mutinying before, that they would all be caught again, and sold to other ships, in case they could carry their point, and get on shore, yet it had no effect upon them.

This gave me a good deal of uneasiness. For I knew several voyages had proved unsuccessful by mutinies, as they occasioned either the total loss of the ships and the white men's lives; or at least by rendering it absolutely necessary to kill or wound a great number of the slaves, in order to prevent a total destruction. Moreover, I knew many of these Cormantine Negroes despised punishment, and even death itself; it having often happened at Barbados and other islands, that on their being any ways hardly dealt with to break them of their stubbornness in refusing to work, twenty or more have hanged themselves at a time in a plantation.

ANTHONY BENEZET

Born in France to Protestant parents, the educator, pacifist, abolitionist, and author Anthony Benezet (1713–1784) lived as a boy in London among members of the Society of Friends, or Quakers, and when his family emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1731, he developed ties with the Friends in Philadelphia, and built his career there. He founded a free school for Black people in Philadelphia in 1770, and in 1775, the Society for the Relief of Free Negroes Unlawfully Held in Bondage (later known as the Pennsylvania Abolition Society), but his work as an activist began years earlier. Benezet's abolitionism grew from a long tradition of Quaker leadership in objecting to the trade in enslaved people, going back to the late seventeenth century, when a protest against it was launched in 1688 in Germantown, Pennsylvania. By Benezet's time, Quaker rules restricted members from participating in the trade, a position he helped publicize in 1759 with his Observations on the Inslaving, Importing, and Purchasing of Negroes . . . from the Yearly-Meeting of the People Called Quakers. He next published A Caution and Warning to Great Britain and Her Colonies, in a Short Representation of the Calamitous State of the Enslaved Negroes in the British Dominions (1766), which he subsequently revised and expanded, and finally produced Some Historical Account of Guinea (1772), which repeats and expands passages of his earlier work yet further. In many ways, thanks to figures like Benezet, the abolitionist movement was underway in North America earlier than it was in Britain, where it gathered momentum in the 1780s.

Like Benezet's texts leading up to it, Some Historical Account of Guinea builds its case against enslavement by quoting arguments by other writers at length, and appending extensive selections from other polemics. It also describes the rich customs and cultures of numerous African societies to refute arguments made by enslavers (such as William Snelgrave; see above) that Africans are better off enslaved on colonial sugar plantations. Benezet takes special care to analyze the way in which the trade operates in its entirety, not stopping with the observation that enslaved people taken by Europeans are often prisoners captured in African wars. He emphasizes how European traders encourage African elites to start conflicts and conduct raids into their enemies' territories for the sole purpose of supplying the trade. The presence and incentives of European traffickers have thus corrupted the nations of Africa. Finally, Benezet insists, to a degree unusual even among White abolitionists of his time, that Africans are endowed with talents and intelligence equal to those of people of European or any other descent, and that any appearances to the contrary derive from the dehumanizing effects of enslavement. This antiracist conviction had a profound moral influence on future abolitionists such as Thomas Clarkson (1760–1846), who considered Benezet a “venerable man” whose authority and experience as an educator amply testify to the fact that Black people “were as capable of the highest intellectual attainments” as any other human beings. In the excerpts below from Some Account of Guinea, Benezet passionately conjoins a statistical account of the enormity of suffering caused by enslavement with a dramatic awareness of that suffering's embodiment in the experience of individual Africans.

Introduction

The slavery of the Negroes having of late drawn the attention of many serious-minded people, several tracts have been published setting forth its inconsistency with every Christian and moral virtue, which it is hoped will have weight with the judicious, especially at a time when the liberties of mankind are become so much the subject of general attention. For the satisfaction of the serious enquirer who may not have the opportunity of seeing those tracts, and such others who are sincerely desirous that the iniquity of this practice may become effectually apparent to those in whose power it may be to put a stop to any farther progress therein, it is proposed hereby to republish the most material parts of said tracts;<sup>1</sup> and in order to enable the reader to form a true judgment of this matter, which, though so very important, is generally disregarded, or so artfully misrepresented by those whose interest leads them to vindicate it, as to bias the opinions of people otherwise upright; some account will be here given of the different parts of Africa, from which the Negroes are brought to America; with an impartial relation from what motives the Europeans were first induced to undertake and have since continued this iniquitous traffic.<sup>2</sup> And here it will not be improper to premise, that though wars, arising from the common depravity of human nature, have happened as well among the Negroes as other nations, and the weak sometimes been made captives to the strong; yet nothing appears, in the various relations of the intercourse and trade for a long time carried on by the Europeans on that coast, which would induce us to believe, that there is any real foundation for that argument so commonly advanced in vindication of that trade, viz. that the slavery of the Negroes took its rise from a desire in the purchasers to save the lives of such of them as were taken captives in war, who would otherwise have been sacrificed to the implacable revenge of their conquerors.<sup>3</sup> A plea which, when compared with the history of those times, will appear to be destitute of truth; and to have been advanced, and urged, principally by such as were concerned in reaping the gain of this infamous traffic, as a palliation of that against which their own reason and conscience must have raised fearful objections.

- Note 1: At the end of his book, Benezet gathers arguments against slavery by several writers, including the English abolitionist Granville Sharp (1735–1813), Scottish jurist George Wallace (1727–1805), Irish-Scottish philosopher Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746), English Baptist minister James Foster (1697–1753), the American physician and (later) Virginia delegate to the Continental Congress Arthur Lee (1740–1792, not identified by name by Benezet), and the bishop of Gloucester, William Warburton (1698–1779). ## Chapter 13

When the vessels arrive at their destined port in the colonies,<sup>4</sup> the poor Negroes are to be disposed of to the planters; and here they are again exposed naked, without any distinction of sexes, to the brutal examination of their purchasers; and this, it may well be judged, is, to many, another occasion of deep distress. Add to this, that near connections must now again be separated, to go with their several purchasers; this must be deeply affecting to all, but such whose hearts are seared by the love of gain. Mothers are seen hanging over their daughters, bedewing their naked breasts with tears, and daughters clinging to their parents, not knowing what new stage of distress must follow their separation, or whether they shall ever meet again. And here what sympathy, what commiseration, do they meet with? Why, indeed, if they will not separate as readily as their owners think proper, the whipper is called for, and the lash exercised upon their naked bodies, till obliged to part. Can any human heart which is not become callous by the practice of such cruelties be unconcerned, even at the relation of such grievous affliction, to which this oppressed part of our species are subjected.

In a book printed in Liverpool called The Liverpool Memorandum, which contains, amongst other things, an account of the trade of that port, there is an exact list of the vessels employed in the Guinea trade, and of the number of slaves imported in each vessel; by which it appears that in the year 1753,<sup>5</sup> the number imported to America by one hundred and one vessels belonging to that port amounted to upwards of thirty thousand; and from the number of vessels employed by the African Company in London and Bristol,<sup>6</sup> we may, with some degree of certainty, conclude, there are one hundred thousand Negroes purchased and brought on board our ships yearly from the coast of Africa. This is confirmed in Anderson's history of trade and commerce, lately printed; where it is said, "That England supplies her American colonies with Negro slaves, amounting in number to above one hundred thousand every year."<sup>7</sup> When the vessels are full freighted with slaves, they sail for our plantations in America, and may be two or three months in the voyage; during which time, from the filth and stench that is among them, distempers frequently break out, which carry off commonly a fifth, a fourth, yea sometimes a third or more of them: so that taking all the slaves together that are brought on board our ships yearly, one may reasonably suppose that at least ten thousand of them die on the voyage. And in a printed account of the state of the Negroes in our plantations, it is supposed that a fourth part, more or less, die at the different islands, in what is called the seasoning.<sup>8</sup> Hence it may be presumed that at a moderate computation of the slaves who are purchased by our African merchants in a year, near thirty thousand die upon the voyage, and in the seasoning. Add to this the prodigious number who are killed in the incursions and intestine wars,<sup>9</sup> by which the Negroes procure the number of slaves wanted to load the vessels. How dreadful then is this slave trade, whereby so many thousands of our fellow creatures, free by nature, endued with the same rational faculties, and called to be heirs of the same salvation with us, lose their lives, and are, truly and properly speaking, murdered every year! For it is not necessary, in order to convict a man of murder, to make it appear that he had an intention to commit murder; whoever does by unjust force or violence deprive another of his liberty, and, while he hath him in his power, continues so to oppress him by cruel treatment, as eventually to occasion his death, is actually guilty of murder. It is enough to make a thoughtful person tremble to think what a load of guilt lies upon our nation on this account; and that the blood of thousands of poor innocent creatures, murdered every year in the prosecution of this wicked trade, cries aloud to Heaven for vengeance. Were we to hear or read of a nation that destroyed every year, in some other way, as many human creatures as perish in this trade, we should certainly consider them as a very bloody, barbarous people; if it be alleged that the legislature hath encouraged and still does encourage this trade, it is answered, that no legislature on earth can alter the nature of things so as to make that to be right which is contrary to the law of God

(the supreme Legislator and Governor of the world) and opposeth the promulgation of the Gospel of peace on earth, and good will to man.<sup>1</sup> Injustice may be methodized and established by law, but still it will be injustice, as much as it was before; though its being so established may render men more insensible of the guilt, and more bold and secure in the perpetration of it.

Chapter 14

Doubts may arise in the minds of some whether the foregoing accounts relating to the natural capacity and good disposition of the inhabitants of Guinea,<sup>2</sup> and of the violent manner in which they are said to be torn from their native land, are to be depended upon; as those Negroes who are brought to us are not heard to complain, and do but seldom manifest such a docility and quickness of parts, as is agreeable thereto.<sup>3</sup> But those who make these objections are desired to note the many discouragements the poor Africans labor under when brought from their native land. Let them consider that those afflicted strangers, though in an enlightened Christian country, have yet but little opportunity or encouragement to exert and improve their natural talents. They are constantly employed in servile labor; and the abject condition in which we see them naturally raises an idea of a superiority in ourselves; whence we are apt to look upon them as an ignorant and contemptible part of mankind. Add to this, that they meet with very little encouragement of freely conversing with such of the whites as might impart instruction to them. It is a fondness for wealth, for authority, or honor, which prompts most men in their endeavors to excel; but these motives can have little influence upon the minds of the Negroes, few of them having any reasonable prospect of any other than a state of slavery; so that, though their natural capacities were ever so good, they have neither inducement or opportunity to exert them to advantage. This naturally tends to depress their minds and sink their spirits into habits of idleness and sloth, which they would in all likelihood have been free from had they stood upon an equal footing with the white people. They are suffered,<sup>4</sup> with impunity, to cohabit together, without being married; and to part when solemnly engaged to one another as man and wife, notwithstanding the moral and religious laws of the land strictly prohibiting such practices. This naturally tends to beget apprehensions in the most thoughtful of those people, that we look upon them as a lower race, not worthy of the same care, nor liable to the same rewards and punishments as ourselves. Nevertheless it may with truth be said, that both amongst those who have obtained their freedom, and those who remain in servitude, some have manifested a strong sagacity and an exemplary uprightness of heart. If this hath not been generally the case with them, is it a matter of surprise? Have we not reason to make the same complaint of many white servants when discharged from our service, though many of them have had much greater opportunities of knowledge and improvement than the blacks; who, even when free, labor under the same difficulties as before: having but little access to and intercourse with the most reputable white people, they remain confined within their former limits of conversation. And if they seldom complain of the unjust and cruel usage they have received, in being forced from their native country, &c. it is not to be wondered at; it being a considerable time after their arrival amongst us, before they can speak our language; and, by the time they are able to express themselves, they have great reason to believe that little or no notice would be taken of their complaints: yet let any person enquire of those who were capable of reflection, before they were brought from their native land, and he will hear such affecting relations, as, if not lost to the common feelings of humanity, will sensibly affect his heart. The case of a poor Negro, not long since brought from Guinea, is a recent instance of this kind. From his first arrival, he appeared thoughtful and dejected, frequently dropping tears when taking notice of his master's children, the cause of which was not known till he was able to speak English, when the account he gave of himself was that he had a wife and children in his own country; that some of these being sick and thirsty, he went in the night time, to fetch water at a spring, where he was violently seized and carried away by persons who lay in wait to catch men, from whence he was transported to America. The remembrance of his family, friends, and other connections, left behind, which he never expected to see any more, were the principal cause of his dejection and grief. Many cases, equally affecting, might be here mentioned; but one more instance, which fell under the notice of a person of credit,<sup>5</sup> will suffice. One of these wretched creatures, then about 50 years of age, informed him, that being violently torn from a wife and several children in Guinea, he was sold in Jamaica, where never expecting to see his native land or family any more, he joined himself to a Negro woman, by whom he had two children: after some years, it suiting the interest of his owner to remove him, he was separated from his second wife and children, and brought to South Carolina, where, expecting to spend the remainder of his days, he engaged with a third wife, by whom he had another child; but here the same consequence of one man being subject to the will and pleasure of another man occurring, he was separated from this last wife and child, and brought into this country,<sup>6</sup> where he remained a slave. Can any whose mind is not rendered quite obdurate by the love of wealth hear these relations without being deeply touched with sympathy and sorrow? And doubtless the case of many, very many of these afflicted people, upon enquiry, would be found to be attended with circumstances equally tragical and aggravating. And if we enquire of those Negroes who were brought away from their native country when children, we shall find most of them to have been stolen away, when abroad from their parents, on the roads, in the woods, or watching their corn fields. Now you that have studied the book of conscience, and you that are learned in the law, what will you say to such deplorable cases? When, and how, have these oppressed people forfeited their liberty? Does not justice loudly call for its being restored to them? Have they not the same right to demand it as any of us should have, if we had been violently snatched by pirates from our native land? Is it not the duty of every dispenser of justice, who is not forgetful of his own humanity, to remember that these are men, and to declare them free? Where instances of such cruelty frequently occur, and are neither enquired into, nor redressed, by those whose duty it is to seek judgment, and relieve the oppressed, Isaiah i. 17. what can be expected, but that the groans and cries of these sufferers will reach Heaven; and what shall we do when God riseth up? and when he visiteth, what will ye answer him? Did not he that made them, make us; and did not one fashion us in the womb? Job xxxi. 14.

CONFRONTING THE LAW

The 1770s saw a number of important cases and petitions challenging the legal status of slavery as an institution in Britain, its colonies, and, after 1776, the newly formed United States of America. The legal arena allowed enslaved and free Black people a significant opportunity to raise their voices and directly challenge the laws and nations that oppressed them. In Britain, the famous and far-reaching Somerset decision came early in the decade. James Somerset (born ca. 1741) was a Black man brought to England from Boston by his enslaver Charles Stewart in 1769. Baptized in England early in 1771, Somerset escaped from Stewart there but was recaptured later in the year and held in bondage on board a ship in the Thames bound for Jamaica. Somerset's three British godparents, sympathetic to the cause of abolition, challenged Somerset's abduction in the English Court of King's Bench, enlisting the help of the most famous British abolitionist of the day, Granville Sharp (1735–1815). The judge, William Murray, Lord Mansfield (1705–1793), finally ruled in 1772 to set Somerset free. Abolitionists and supporters of Somerset celebrated the decision in London as a major blow against slavery that effectively determined that it could not exist in England. But Mansfield's ruling was deliberately narrow. Some legal scholars think that its principal intent was simply to prevent "masters" (as the ruling calls them) from forcibly removing anyone they controlled—whether servants or enslaved people—from England. Also, Mansfield acknowledges that "positive law" could institute slavery, as it had indeed done in Virginia, Jamaica, and other British colonies. Still, some historians have suggested that the ruling panicked proslavery North Americans who thought it could lead to abolition throughout British dominions, and so led them to support the coming American War of Independence. Other historians have pointed out that Crown-appointed governors consistently vetoed efforts by some American colonial legislatures, inspired by the Somerset ruling, to end or curtail slavery themselves. In any case, slavery would remain legal in British colonies some six decades after the ruling, not ending in most parts of the empire until 1833.

Among those inspired by the Somerset decision were the Black authors of a sequence of five antislavery petitions to the legislature of the province, then the state, of Massachusetts through the 1770s. The first of these, below, was submitted on January 6, 1773 and signed simply by “Felix”—a Latin name meaning happy, or fortunate—a writer who is otherwise unknown. (Some speculate that its author may be Felix Holbrook, an activist who was among the Black cosigners of another petition for the same cause a few months later.) He adopts a supplicatory tone in his address to Crown-appointed governor Thomas Hutchinson and the Massachusetts General Court, but he plainly and dramatically describes the dehumanizing condition of enslavement and asserts the dignity and natural rights of Black people. A subsequent petition, below, adopts an altogether more confrontational tone. It was presented by Prince Hall (ca. 1735/7–1807) and seven other Black Americans just months after the Declaration of Independence had created a new nation. The petition has been seen as the first time the Declaration’s ideals of liberty and natural rights were expanded beyond the context of Americans’ struggle against the British Empire. Hall and his copetitioners invoke these ideals instead to expose grave injustices within the new United States itself. They insist that, by permitting slavery, the new nation exists in gross disharmony with its own founding principles. A free man by 1770, Hall was a leader of his community in Boston and wrote numerous subsequent petitions, articles, and speeches supportive of Black people and protective of their rights. These petitions by Black authors did not lead to any legislative successes. But they doubtless influenced the Massachusetts State Constitution (ratified 1780), which declared that “all men are born free and equal”—language that would directly allow a constitutional ruling in 1783 that made slavery illegal in the state. The final legal document below indicates that even within Britain, enslavement subsisted after the Somerset case. The great man of letters Samuel Johnson wrote this brief in 1777 on behalf of Joseph Knight, a Black man enslaved in Scotland who sought to leave the man who held him. Johnson's brief echoes Locke's account of slavery, extends the logic of Mansfield's Somerset ruling by calling the laws supporting slavery in Jamaica "merely positive," and, like Prince Hall, disputes the acceptability of slavery in general by invoking "the rights of mankind" and insisting that all people are "by nature free."

WILLIAM MURRAY, LORD MANSFIELD

The Somerset Ruling<sup>1</sup>

Trinity Term, June 22, 1772

Lord Mansfield—On the part of Somerset, the case which we gave notice should be decided this day, the court now proceeds to give its opinion. I shall recite the return to the writ of habeas corpus, as the ground of our determination; omitting only words of form.<sup>2</sup> The captain of the ship on board of which the Negro was taken makes his return to the writ in terms signifying that there have been, and still are, slaves to a great number in Africa; and that the trade in them is authorized by the laws and opinions<sup>3</sup> of Virginia and Jamaica; that they are goods and chattels; and, as such, saleable and sold. That James Somerset is a Negro of Africa, and long before the return of the king's writ was brought to be sold, and was sold to Charles Stewart, Esq. then in Jamaica, and has not been manumitted<sup>4</sup> since; that Mr. Stewart, having occasion to transact business, came over hither, with an intention to return; and brought Somerset to attend and abide with him, and to carry him back as soon as the business should be transacted. That such intention has been, and still continues; and that the Negro did remain till the time of his departure in the service of his master Mr. Stewart, and quitted it without his consent; and thereupon, before the return of the king's writ, the said Charles Stewart did commit the slave on board the Anne and Mary,<sup>5</sup> to safe custody, to be kept till he should set sail, and then to be taken with him to Jamaica, and there sold as a slave. And this is the cause why he, Captain Knowles, who was then and now is, commander of the above vessel, then and now lying in the river of Thames, did the said Negro, committed to his custody, detain; and on which he now renders him to the orders of the court.

We pay all due attention to the opinion of Sir Philip Yorke, and Lord Chief Justice Talbot,<sup>6</sup> whereby they pledged themselves to the British planters, for all the legal consequences of slaves coming over to this kingdom or being baptized, recognized by Lord Hardwicke, sitting as Chancellor on the 19th of October, 1749, that trover would lie;<sup>7</sup> that a notion had prevailed, if a Negro came over, or became a Christian, he was emancipated, but no ground in law:<sup>8</sup> that he and Lord Talbot, when Attorney- and Solicitor-General,<sup>9</sup> were of opinion, that no such claim for freedom was valid; that though the Statute of Tenures had abolished villeins<sup>1</sup> regardant to a manor, yet he did not conceive but that a man might still become a villein in gross,<sup>2</sup> by confessing himself such in open court. We are so well agreed that we think there is no occasion of having it argued (as I had intimated an intention at first) before all the judges, as is usual, for obvious reasons, on a return to a habeas corpus;<sup>3</sup> the only question before us is, whether the cause on the return is sufficient? If it is, the Negro must be remanded; if it is not, he must be discharged. Accordingly, the return states, that the slave departed and refused to serve; whereupon he was kept to be sold abroad. So high an act of dominion must be recognized by the law of the country where it is used. The power of a master over his slave has been extremely different in different countries. The state of slavery is of such a nature, that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons, moral or political, but only by positive law, which preserves its force long after the reasons, occasion, and time itself from whence it was created, is erased from memory. It is so odious, that nothing can be suffered to support it, but positive law.<sup>4</sup> Whatever inconveniences, therefore, may follow from the decision, I cannot say this case is allowed or approved by the law of England;<sup>5</sup> and therefore the black must be discharged.

Though the Yorke-Talbot opinion was not legally binding and cited no legal precedents or rationale, it was widely accepted, especially by enslavers.Return to reference 6

- Note 1: Under British medieval law, villeins were serfs bound for life to work at a manor: though they had more rights than enslaved people, they lay under heavy legal restrictions, could not move from the land where they were bound to work, and often inherited their status from their parents. “Statute of Tenures”: another name for the Tenure Abolition Act of 1660, which changed the nature of titles to land.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Unlike a villein bound to a manor, a villein in gross was bound to a particular lord; Mansfield compares this to the relationship of Somerset to Stewart and points out that the Tenure Abolition Act did not affect the legal standing of such a relationship.Return to reference 2
- Note 3: Mansfield says he accepts the soundness of all this legal reasoning, so there is no reason to argue in court about Stewart and Knowles’s return to the court’s writ; the only question that remains is whether the return’s reasoning is strong enough to justify slavery in Britain.Return to reference 3
- Note 4: Mansfield’s ruling suggests that tradition alone, the assumptions of common law, or mere legal opinions such as that of Yorke and Talbot are not enough to justify the institution of slavery in a country. He indicates that in places where positive laws concerning slavery do exist, such as Virginia and Jamaica, it has a sufficient legal basis.Return to reference 4
- Note 5: Mansfield’s reference to the law of England seemed to leave the question of slavery open in other parts of Britain, though later in the decade the Joseph Knight case in Scotland (see Samuel Johnson, below) referred to the Somerset decision as a precedent.Return to reference 5

Province of the Massachusetts Bay to His Excellency Thomas Hutchinson, Esq; Governor; to the Honorable His Majesty's Council, and to the Honorable House of Representatives<sup>2</sup> in General Court assembled at Boston, the 6th Day of January, 1773. The humble petition of many slaves, living in the town of Boston, and other towns in the Province is this, namely that your Excellency and Honors, and the honorable [. . .] Representatives, would be pleased to take their unhappy state and condition under your wise and just consideration.

We desire to bless God, who loves mankind, who sent his son to die for their salvation, and who is no respecter of persons;<sup>3</sup> that he hath lately put it into the hearts of multitudes on both sides of the water, to bear our burthens, some of whom are men of great note and influence; who have pleaded our cause with arguments which we hope will have their weight with this honorable court.<sup>4</sup>

We presume not to dictate to your excellency and honors, being willing to rest our cause on your humanity and justice; yet would beg leave to say a word or two on the subject. Although some of the Negroes are vicious (who doubtless may be punished and restrained by the same laws which are in force against other of the king's subjects) there are many others of a quite different character, and who, if made free, would soon be able as well as willing to bear a part in the public charges; many of them of good natural parts,<sup>5</sup> are discreet, sober, honest, and industrious; and may it not be said of many, that they are virtuous and religious, although their condition is in itself so unfriendly to religion, and every moral virtue except patience. How many of that number have there been, and now are in this province, who have had every day of their lives embittered with this most intolerable reflection, that, let their behavior be what it will, neither they, nor their children to all generations, shall ever be able to do, or to possess and enjoy anything, no, not even life itself, but in a manner as the beasts that perish.<sup>6</sup>

We have no property! We have no wives! No children! We have no city! No country!<sup>7</sup> But we have a Father in heaven, and we are determined, as far as his grace shall enable us, and as far as our degraded contemptuous life will admit, to keep all his commandments: Especially will we be obedient to our masters, so long as God in his sovereign Providence shall suffer us to be holden in bondage.

It would be impudent, if not presumptuous in us, to suggest to your excellency and honors any law or laws proper to be made, in relation to our unhappy state, which, although our greatest unhappiness, is not our fault; and this gives us great encouragement to pray and hope for such relief as is consistent with your wisdom, justice, and goodness.

We think ourselves very happy that we may thus address the great and general court of this province, which great and good court is to us the best judge, under God, of what is wise, just, and good.

We humbly beg leave to add but this one thing more: we pray for such relief only, which by no possibility can ever be productive of the least wrong or injury to our masters; but to us will be as life from the dead.

Signed,
FELIX

PRINCE HALL<sup>1</sup>

[A Petition to the State of Massachusetts]

To the Honorable Counsel & House of Representatives for the State of Massachusetts Bay<sup>2</sup> in General Court assembled, January 13, 1777:

The petition of a great number of Blacks detained in a state of slavery in the bowels of a free and Christian country humbly sheweth that your petitioners apprehend that they have, in common with all other men, a natural and unalienable right to that freedom which the Great Parent of the Universe hath bestowed equally on all mankind, and which they have never forfeited by any compact or agreement<sup>3</sup> whatever—but they were unjustly dragged by the hand of cruel power from their dearest friends, and some of them even torn from the embraces of their tender parents—from a populous, pleasant, and plentiful country; and, in violation of laws of nature and of nations, and in defiance of all the tender feelings of humanity, brought here either to be sold like beast[s] of burthen, and like them condemned to slavery for life—among a people professing the religion of Jesus, a people not insensible of the secrets of rationable being, nor without spirit to resent the unjust endeavors of others to reduce them to a state of bondage and subjection.<sup>4</sup> Your honors need not to be informed that a life of slavery like that of your petitioners, deprived of every social privilege, of everything requisite to render life tolerable, is far worse than nonexistence.

In imitation of the laudable example of the good people of these States, your petitioners have long and patiently waited the event of petition after petition,<sup>5</sup> by them presented to the legislative body of this state, and cannot but with grief reflect that their success hath been but too similar.<sup>6</sup> They cannot but express their astonishment that it has never been considered that every principle from which America has acted in the course of their unhappy difficulties with Great Britain pleads stronger than a thousand arguments in favor of your petitioners. They therefore humbly beseech your honors to give this petition its due weight and consideration, and cause an act of the legislature to be passed whereby they may be restored to the enjoyments of that which is the natural right of all men—and their children, who were born in this land of liberty, may not be held as slaves after they arrive at the age of twenty-one years. So may the inhabitants of these states be no longer chargeable with the inconsistency of acting themselves the part which they condemn and oppose in others. Be prospered in their present glorious struggle for liberty<sup>2</sup> and have those blessings to them, &c.

After a bad year, General George Washington had just won the Battle of Trenton (December 1776), which boosted morale; later in 1777, in October, the Continental Army would gain a yet more significant victory at Saratoga.Return to reference 7

SAMUEL JOHNSON

[A Brief in Support of Joseph Knight]<sup>1</sup>

It must be agreed that in most ages many countries have had part of their inhabitants in a state of slavery; yet it may be doubted whether slavery can ever be supposed the natural condition of man. It is impossible not to conceive that men in their original state were equal; and very difficult to imagine how one would be subjected to another but by violent compulsion. An individual may, indeed, forfeit his liberty by a crime; but he cannot by that crime forfeit the liberty of his children. What is true of a criminal seems true likewise of a captive. A man may accept life from a conquering enemy on condition of perpetual servitude; but it is very doubtful whether he can entail that servitude on his descendants; for no man can stipulate without commission for another. The condition which he himself accepts, his son or grandson perhaps would have rejected. If we should admit, what perhaps may with more reason be denied, that there are certain relations between man and man which may make slavery necessary and just, yet it can never be proved that he who is now suing for his freedom ever stood in any of those relations. He is certainly subject by no law, but that of violence, to his present master;<sup>2</sup> who pretends no claim to his obedience, but that he bought him from a merchant of slaves, whose right to sell him never was examined. It is said that according to the constitutions of Jamaica he was legally enslaved; these constitutions are merely positive;<sup>3</sup> and apparently injurious to the rights of mankind, because whoever is exposed to sale is condemned to slavery without appeal; by whatever fraud or violence he might have been originally brought into the merchant's power. In our own time princes have been sold, by wretches to whose care they were entrusted, that they might have an European education; but when once they were brought to a market in the plantations, little would avail either their dignity or their wrongs.<sup>4</sup> The laws of Jamaica afford a Negro no redress. His color is considered as a sufficient testimony against him. It is to be lamented that moral right should ever give way to political convenience. But if temptations of interest are sometimes too strong for human virtue, let us at least retain a virtue where there is no temptation to quit it. In the present case there is apparent right on one side, and no convenience on the other. Inhabitants of this island can neither gain riches nor power by taking away the liberty of any part of the human species. The sum of the argument is this:—No man is by nature the property of another: The defendant is, therefore, by nature free: The rights of nature must be some way forfeited before they can be justly taken away: That the defendant has by any act forfeited the rights of nature we require to be proved; and if no proof of such forfeiture can be given, we doubt not but the justice of the court will declare him free.

- Note 1:
Johnson, a fierce opponent of slavery, dictated this brief to his biographer James Boswell, who worked on Knight's legal team, and who himself initially espoused but later opposed the abolitionist cause (see p. 981). The brief supports the appeal of Joseph Knight (born ca. 1753), a Black man who lived enslaved in Scotland. After reading of the Somerset decision (see above), he asserted his freedom. In 1778, a Scottish court finally found in favor of Knight, with one of the judges, Alexander Boswell, Lord Auchinleck (James Boswell's father), declaring slavery "unchristian," and Knight "our brother."
Return to reference 1
- Note 2: Knight was born in West Africa, taken by enslavers to Jamaica, and transferred, after payment, to a Captain Knight. He was then taken, after payment, by John Wedderburn of Scotland, around 1766, who returned to Scotland with Knight around 1768.Return to reference 2

- Note 3: Compare Lord Mansfield in the Somerset decision, who declares that only “positive law”—not common-law traditions but laws on the books—could institute an enslaving system. Here Johnson calls such laws “merely positive,” or artificial and arbitrarily imposed, as contrasted with the laws of nature.Return to reference 3
- Note 4:
Johnson alludes to William Ansah Sessarakoo (ca. 1736–1770), an African prince born near Annamaboe (now Anomabu), West Africa, who was betrayed into enslavement in Barbados in 1744 by a British sea captain who had promised to bring him to London to be educated. Learning of the betrayal, the Royal African Company freed him. The British press widely reported an incident in 1749 in which Sessarakoo and an African companion attended a performance of Thomas Southerne’s play Oroonoko, a Tragedy (adapted from Aphra Behn’s novella), and left at the end of the fourth act in tears.

OTTOBAH CUGOANO

In 1787, Ottobah Cugoano (ca. 1757–after 1791) published the Thoughts and Sentiments on the Evil and Wicked Traffic of the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species, one of the most searing, uncompromising indictments of slavery of his time. It appeared two years before another important abolitionist work by his friend and fellow Black activist, The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano (1789; see p. 1081). Cugoano's book is an impassioned philosophical, political, and religious polemic against the traffic in human beings, introduced by a brief description of his life in and abduction from West Africa. He relates that he spent "nine or ten months in the slave gang in Grenada, and about one year at different places in the West-Indies" before being brought to England at the end of 1772, where he learned to read and write and was baptized in 1773, under the name John Stuart, at age sixteen. After that, he was freed from enslavement and is known to have worked as a paid servant to the painters Robert and Maria Cosway, a position that opened the door to his correspondence with a number of important people, including George III himself, Edmund Burke, and the abolitionist Granville Sharp. In London he also met Equiano and other Black campaigners against slavery, and with them formed the Sons of Africa, a group of radicals, now recognized as the first Black political organization in Britain, who wrote letters to London newspapers advocating abolition of the transatlantic trade and of slavery itself. Two years after his Thoughts and Sentiments appeared, he published a shortened version of it in 1791, then disappeared from the historical record.

Unlike Equiano's Interesting Narrative, which gains readers' sympathies by portraying its author as a gentle person brutalized by enslavers' inhumanity, Cugoano sustains a contemptuous outrage at the criminality of human trafficking. He attacks specific pamphlets that sought to justify slavery and enjoys the idea of seeing enslavers “roasted, saddled, and bridled” like pigs and horses, a form of well-deserved or “condign punishment,” in which the victimizer becomes the victim. Like Equiano, Phillis Wheatley, Jupiter Hammon, and many other people who had experienced enslavement, Cugoano warmly embraces the religion of the Europeans. But in his hands, Christianity becomes a weapon of denunciation, a way to expose not only the barbarity of those actually perpetrating the trade but also the complacent hypocrisy of ordinary Britons who allow it to continue. Along the way, he relates “the history of those dreadfully perfidious methods of forming settlements and acquiring riches and territory” by Europeans in the Americas at fatal cost to Indigenous peoples, and compares and contrasts the suffering endured by the poor in European countries and that of enslaved people. By emphasizing the guilt accrued by Europeans on both sides of the Atlantic for their “horrible injustice and barbarous cruelty” in the name of their Christianity, Cugoano achieves a militancy unique among early Black abolitionists.

[CRIMES OF THE TRADE; CUGOANO'S EARLY LIFE]

No necessity, or any situation of men, however poor, pitiful and wretched they may be, can warrant them to rob others, or oblige them to become thieves, because they are poor, miserable and wretched. But the robbers of men,<sup>1</sup> the kidnappers, ensnarers, and slave-holders who take away the common rights and privileges of others to support and enrich themselves, are universally those pitiful and detestable wretches; for the ensnaring of others, and taking away their liberty by slavery and oppression, is the worst kind of robbery, as most opposite to every precept and injunction of the Divine Law, and contrary to that command which enjoins that all men should love their neighbors as themselves, and that they should do unto others, as they would that men should do to them.<sup>2</sup> As to any other laws that slave-holders may make among themselves, as respecting slaves, they can be of no better kind, nor give them any better character, than what is implied in the common report—that there may be some honesty among thieves. This may seem a harsh comparison, but the parallel is so coincident that, I must say, I can find no other way of expressing my thoughts and sentiments, without making use of some harsh words and comparisons against the carriers on of such abandoned wickedness. But, in this little undertaking, I must humbly hope the impartial reader will excuse such defects as may arise from want<sup>3</sup> of better education; and as to the resentment of those who can lay their cruel lash upon the backs of thousands, for a thousand times less crimes than writing against their enormous wickedness and brutal avarice, [such] is what I may be sure to meet with.

However, it cannot but be very discouraging to a man of my complexion in such an attempt as this, to meet with the evil aspersions of some men, who say that an African is not entitled to any competent degree of knowledge, or capable of imbibing any sentiments of probity; and that nature designed him for some inferior link in the chain, fitted only to be a slave. But when I meet with those who make no scruple to deal with the human species, as with the beasts of the earth, I must think them not only brutish, but wicked and base; and that their aspersions are insidious and false. And if such men can boast of greater degrees of knowledge than any African is entitled to, I shall let them enjoy all the advantages of it unenvied, as I fear it consists only in a greater share of infidelity, and that of a blacker kind than only skin deep. And if their complexion be not what I may suppose, it is at least the nearest in resemblance to an infernal hue. A good man will neither speak nor do as a bad man will; but if a man is bad, it makes no difference whether he be a black or a white devil.

By some of such complexion, as whether black or white it matters not,<sup>4</sup> I was early snatched away from my native country, with about eighteen or twenty more boys and girls, as we were playing in a field. We lived but a few days' journey from the coast where we were kidnapped, and as we were decoyed and drove along, we were soon conducted to a factory,<sup>5</sup> and from thence, in the fashionable way of traffic, consigned to Grenada.<sup>6</sup> Perhaps it may not be amiss to give a few remarks, as some account of myself, in this transposition of captivity.

I was born in the city of Agimaque, on the coast of Fantyn; my father was a companion to the chief in that part of the country of Fantee,<sup>7</sup> and when the old king died I was left in his house with his family; soon after I was sent for by his nephew, Ambro Accasa, who succeeded the old king in the chieftdom of that part of Fantee known by the name of Agimaque and Assinee.<sup>8</sup> I lived with his children, enjoying peace and tranquility, about twenty moons, which, according to their way of reckoning time, is two years. I was sent for to visit an uncle who lived at a considerable distance from

Agimaque. The first day after we set out we arrived at Assinee, and the third day at my uncle's habitation, where I lived about three months, and was then thinking of returning to my father and young companion at Agimaque; but by this time I had got well acquainted with some of the children of my uncle's hundreds of relations, and we were some days too venturesome in going into the woods to gather fruit and catch birds, and such amusements as pleased us. One day I refused to go with the rest, being rather apprehensive that something might happen to us; till one of my play-fellows said to me, "because you belong to the great men, you are afraid to venture your carcass, or else of the bounsam," which is the devil. This enraged me so much that I set a resolution to join the rest, and we went into the woods as usual; but we had not been above two hours before our troubles began, when several great ruffians came upon us suddenly, and said we had committed a fault against their lord, and we must go and answer for it ourselves before him.<sup>9</sup>

Some of us attempted in vain to run away, but pistols and cutlasses were soon introduced, threatening that if we offered to stir, we should all lie dead on the spot. One of them pretended to be more friendly than the rest, and said that he would speak to their lord to get us clear, and desired that we should follow him; we were then immediately divided into different parties, and drove after him. We were soon led out of the way which we knew, and towards the evening, as we came in sight of a town, they told us that this great man of theirs lived there, but pretended it was too late to go and see him that night. Next morning there came three other men, whose language differed from ours, and spoke to some of those who watched us all the night, but he that pretended to be our friend<sup>1</sup> with the great man, and some others, were gone away. We asked our keepers what these men had been saying to them, and they answered that they had been asking them and us together to go and feast with them that day, and that we must put off seeing the great man till after; little thinking that our doom was so nigh, or that these villains meant to feast on us as their prey. We went with them again about half a day's journey, and came to a great multitude of people, having different music playing; and all the day after we got there, we were very merry with the music, dancing, and singing. Towards the evening, we were again persuaded that we could not get back to where the great man lived till next day; and when bedtime came, we were separated into different houses with different people. When the next morning came, I asked for the men that brought me there, and for the rest of my companions; and I was told that they were gone to the seaside to bring home some rum, guns, and powder,<sup>2</sup> and that some of my companions were gone with them, and that some were gone to the fields to do something or other. This gave me strong suspicion that there was some treachery in the case, and I began to think that my hopes of returning home again were all over. I soon became very uneasy, not knowing what to do, and refused to eat or drink for whole days together, till the man of the house told me that he would do all in his power to get me back to my uncle; then I eat a little fruit with him, and had some thoughts that I should be sought after, as I would be then missing at home about five or six days. I enquired every day if the men had come back, and for the rest of my companions, but could get no answer of any satisfaction. I was kept about six days at this man's house, and in the evening there was another man came and talked with him a good while, and I heard the one say to the other he must go, and the other said the sooner the better; that man came out and told me that he knew my relations at Agimaque, and that we must set out tomorrow morning, and he would convey me there. Accordingly we set out next day, and travelled till dark, when we came to a place where we had some supper and slept. He carried a large bag with some gold dust, which he said he had to buy some goods at the seaside to take with him to Agimaque. Next day we travelled on, and in the evening came to a town, where I saw several white people, which made me afraid that they would eat me, according to our notion as children in the inland parts of the country.<sup>3</sup> This made me rest very uneasy all the night, and next morning I had some victuals brought, desiring me to eat and make haste, as my guide and kidnapper told me that he had to go to the castle<sup>4</sup> with some company that were going there, as he had told me before, to get some goods. After I was ordered out, the horrors I soon saw and felt cannot be well described; I saw many of my miserable countrymen chained two and two, some hand-cuffed, and some with their hands tied behind. We were conducted along by a guard, and when we arrived at the castle, I asked my guide what I was brought there for, he told me to learn the ways of the browfow, that is the white-faced people. I saw him take a gun, a piece of cloth, and some lead for me, and then he told me that he must now leave me there, and went off. This made me cry bitterly, but I was soon conducted to a prison, for three days, where I heard the groans and cries of many, and saw some of my fellow captives. But when a vessel arrived to conduct us away to the ship, it was a most horrible scene; there was nothing to be heard but rattling of chains, smacking of whips, and the groans and cries of our fellow men. Some would not stir from the ground, when they were lashed and beat in the most horrible manner. I have forgot the name of this infernal fort; but we were taken in the ship that came for us to another that was ready to sail from Cape Coast.<sup>5</sup> When we were put into the ship, we saw several Black merchants coming on board, but we were all drove into our holes, and not suffered to speak to any of them. In this situation we continued several days in sight of our native land; but I could find no good person to give any information of my situation to Accasa at Agimaque. And when we found ourselves at last taken away, death was more preferable than life, and a plan was concerted amongst us, that we might burn and blow up the ship, and to perish all together in the flames; but we were betrayed by one of our own countrywomen, who slept with some of the head men of the ship, for it was common for the dirty filthy sailors to take the African women and lie upon their bodies; but the men were chained and pent up in holes. It was the women and boys which were to burn the ship, with the approbation and groans of the rest; though that was prevented, the discovery was likewise a cruel bloody scene.

But it would be needless to give a description of all the horrible scenes which we saw, and the base treatment which we met with in this dreadful captive situation, as the similar cases of thousands, which suffer by this infernal traffic, are well known. Let it suffice to say that I was thus lost to my dear indulgent parents and relations, and they to me. All my help was cries and tears, and these could not avail; nor suffered long, till one succeeding woe, and dread, swelled up another. Brought from a state of innocence and freedom, and, in a barbarous and cruel manner, conveyed to a state of horror and slavery: this abandoned situation may be easier conceived than described. From the time that I was kidnapped and conducted to a factory, and from thence in the brutish, base, but fashionable way of traffic, consigned to Grenada, the grievous thoughts which I then felt, still pant in my heart; though my fears and tears have long since subsided. And yet it is still grievous to think that thousands more have suffered in similar and greater distress, under the hands of barbarous robbers, and merciless taskmasters; and that many even now are suffering in all the extreme bitterness of grief and woe, that no language can describe. The cries of some, and the sight of their misery, may be seen and heard afar; but the deep-sounding groans of thousands, and the great sadness of their misery and woe, under the heavy load of oppressions and calamities inflicted upon them, are such as can only be distinctly known to the ears of Jehovah Sabaoth.<sup>6</sup>

This Lord of Hosts, in his great Providence, and in great mercy to me, made a way for my deliverance from Grenada.—Being in this dreadful captivity and horrible slavery, without any hope of deliverance, for about eight or nine months, beholding the most dreadful scenes of misery and cruelty, and seeing my miserable companions often cruelly lashed, and as it were cut to pieces, for the most trifling faults; this made me often tremble and weep, but I escaped better than many of them. For eating a piece of sugarcane, some were cruelly lashed, or struck over the face to knock their teeth out. Some of the stouter ones, I suppose often reprov'd, and grown hardened and stupid with many cruel beatings and lashings, or perhaps faint and pressed with hunger and hard labor, were often committing trespasses of this kind, and when detected, they met with exemplary punishment.<sup>7</sup> Some told me they had their teeth pulled out to deter others, and to prevent them from eating any cane in future. Thus seeing my miserable companions and countrymen in this pitiful, distressed, and horrible situation, with all the brutish baseness and barbarity attending it, could not but fill my little mind<sup>8</sup> with horror and indignation. But I must own, to the shame of my own countrymen, that I was first kidnapped and betrayed by some of my own complexion, who were the first cause of my exile and slavery; but if there were no buyers there would be no sellers. So far as I can remember, some of the Africans in my country keep slaves, which they take in war, or for debt; but those which they keep are well fed, and good care taken of them, and treated well; and, as to their clothing, they differ according to the custom of the country. But I may safely say that all the poverty and misery that any of the inhabitants of Africa meet with among themselves is far inferior to those inhospitable regions of misery which they meet with in the West Indies, where their hard-hearted overseers have neither regard to the laws of God, nor the life of their fellow men.<sup>9</sup>

Thanks be to God, I was delivered from Grenada, and that horrid brutal slavery.—A gentleman coming to England, took me for his servant,<sup>1</sup> and brought me away, where I soon found my situation become more agreeable. After coming to England, and seeing others write and read, I had a strong desire to learn, and getting what assistance I could, I applied myself to learn reading and writing, which soon became my recreation, pleasure, and delight; and when my master perceived that I could write some, he sent me to a proper school for that purpose to learn. Since, I have endeavored to improve my mind in reading, and have sought to get all the intelligence I could, in my situation of life, towards the state of my brethren and countrymen in complexion, and of the miserable situation of those who are barbarously sold into captivity, and unlawfully held in slavery.

But, among other observations, one great duty I owe to Almighty God (the thankful acknowledgement I would not omit for any consideration) that, although I have been brought away from my native country, in that torrent of robbery and wickedness, thanks be to God for his good providence<sup>2</sup> towards me; I have both obtained liberty, and acquired the great advantages of some little learning, in being able to read and write, and what is still infinitely of greater advantage I trust, to know something of HIM who is that God whose providence rules over all, and who is the only Potent One that rules in the nations over the children of men. It is unto Him, who is the Prince of the Kings of the earth, that I would give all thanks. And, in some manner, I may say with Joseph, as he did with respect to the evil intention of his brethren, when they sold him into Egypt,<sup>3</sup> that whatever evil intentions and bad motives those insidious robbers had in carrying me away from my native country and friends, I trust, was what the Lord intended for my good. In this respect, I am highly indebted to many of the good people of England for learning and principles unknown to the people of my native country. But above all, what have I obtained from the Lord God of Hosts, the God of the Christians! in that divine revelation of the only true God, and the Savior of men, what a treasure of wisdom and blessings are involved? How wonderful is the divine goodness displayed in those invaluable books the Old and New Testaments, that inestimable compilation of books, the Bible? And O what a treasure to have, and one of the greatest advantages to be able to read therein, and a divine blessing to understand!

[ON BRITAIN'S COLLECTIVE GUILT]

But while ever such a horrible business as the slavery and oppression of the Africans is carried on, there is not one man in all Great Britain and her colonies, that knoweth anything of it, can be innocent and safe, unless he speedily riseth up with abhorrence of it in his own judgment, and, to avert evil, declare himself against it, and all such notorious wickedness. But should the contrary be adhered to, as it has been in the most shameful manner, by men of eminence and power; according to their eminence in station, the nobles and senators,<sup>4</sup> and every man in office and authority, must incur a double load of guilt, and not only that burden of guilt in the oppression of the African strangers, but also in that of an impending danger and ruin to their country; and such a double load of iniquity must rest upon those guilty heads who withhold their testimony against the crying sin of tolerating slavery. The inhabitants in general who can approve of such inhuman barbarities must themselves be a species of unjust barbarians and inhuman men. But the clergy of all denominations, whom we would consider as the devout messengers of righteousness, peace, and good-will to all men, if we find any of them ranked with infidels and barbarians, we must consider them as particularly responsible, and, in some measure, guilty of the crimes of other wicked men in the highest degree. For it is their duty to warn every man and to teach every man to know their errors; and if they do not, the crimes of those under their particular charge must rest upon themselves, and upon some of them, in such a case as this, that of the whole nation in general; and those (whatever their respective situation may be) who forbid others to assist them, must not be very sensible of their own duty, and the great extensiveness and importance of their own charge. And as it is their great duty to teach men righteousness and piety; this ought to be considered as sufficiently obvious unto them, and to all men, that nothing can be more contrary unto it, than the evil and very nature of enslaving men, and making merchandise of them like the brute creation.

For it is evident that no custom established among men was ever more impious; since it is contrary to reason, justice, nature, the principles of law and government, and the whole doctrine, in short, of natural religion,<sup>5</sup> and the revealed voice of God. And therefore, that it is both evident and expedient, that there is an absolute necessity to abolish the slave trade, and the West India slavery; and that to be in power, and to neglect even a day in endeavoring to put a stop to such monstrous iniquity and abandoned wickedness (as the tenure of every man's life, as well as the time of his being in office and power, is very uncertain) must necessarily endanger a man's own eternal welfare, be he ever so great in temporal dignity.<sup>6</sup>

The higher that any man is exalted in power and dignity, his danger is the more eminent, though he may not live to see the evil that may eventually be contributed to his country, because of his disobedience to the law and commandments of God. All men in authority, and kings in general, who are exalted to the most conspicuous offices of superiority, while they take upon themselves to be the administrators of righteousness and justice to others, they become equally responsible for admitting or suffering others under their authority to do wrong. Wherefore the highest offices of authority among men are not so desirable as some may be apt to conceive; it was so considered by the virtuous Queen Anne, when she was called to the royal dignity, as she declared to the council of the nation, that it was a heavy weight and burden brought upon her. For kings are the ministers of God to do justice, and not to bear the sword in vain, but to revenge wrath upon them that do evil. But if they do not in such a case as this, the cruel oppressions of thousands, and the blood of the murdered Africans who are slain by the sword of cruel avarice, must rest upon their own guilty heads in as eventually and plain a sense as it was David that murdered Uriah;<sup>7</sup> and therefore they ought to let no companies of insidious merchants, or any guileful insinuations of wicked men, prevail upon them to establish laws of iniquity, and to carry on a trade of oppression and injustice; but they ought to consider such as the worst of foes and rebels, and greater enemies than any that can rise up against their temporal dignity. From all such enemies, good Lord, deliver them! for it is even better to lose a temporal kingdom, than only to endanger the happiness and enjoyment of an eternal one.

Nothing else can be conceived but that the power of infernal wickedness has so reigned and pervaded over the enlightened nations as to infatuate and lead on the great men, and the kings of Europe, to promote and establish such a horrible traffic of wickedness as the African slave trade and the West India slavery, and thereby to bring themselves under the guilty responsibility of such awful iniquity. The kings and governors of the nations in general have power to prevent their subjects and people from enslaving and oppressing others, if they will; but if they do not endeavor to do it, even if they could not effect that good purpose, they must then be responsible for their crimes; how much more, if they make no endeavors towards it, even when they can, and where no opposition, however plausible their pretenses might be, would dare to oppose them. Wherefore, if kings or nations or any men that dealeth unjustly with their fellow-creatures, to ensnare them, to enslave them, and to oppress them, or suffer others to do so, when they have it in their power to prevent it, and yet they do not, can it ever be thought that God will be well pleased with them? For can those which have no mercy on their fellow creatures expect to find mercy from the gracious Father of Men? Or will it not rather be said unto them, as it is declared, that he who leadeth into captivity, shall be carried captive, and be bound in the cords of his own iniquity: Though hand join in hand the wicked shall not go unpunished; for sin and wickedness is the destruction of any people.<sup>8</sup>

And should these nations, in the most obnoxious<sup>9</sup> and tenacious manner, still adhere to it as they have done, and continue to carry on in their colonies such works and purposes of iniquity, in oppression and injustice against the Africans, nothing else can be expected for them at last, but to meet with the fierce wrath of Almighty God, for such a combination of wickedness, according to all the examples of his just retribution, who cannot suffer such deliberate, such monstrous iniquity to go long unpunished.

SLAVERY IN POETRY

JAMES GRAINGER

James Grainger (1721?–1766)—a Scottish poet and medical doctor who spent years on sugar plantations in the Caribbean—wrote several seemingly conflicting things about slavery: he expressed pity for the plight of those enslaved, shared with enslavers his acquired wisdom about how to make the most profitable purchases of human beings, lamented he did not have the power to end slavery altogether, and (wrongly, self-interestedly) suggested that the lives of enslaved people in the Caribbean were really not so bad. Indeed, Grainger said all of these things in a single poem, The Sugar-Cane (1764)—a massive poem composed of four books and over 2,500 blank verse lines—and it is an ethical and historical question, how one person and one poem held together these ideas. The very form of his poem also involved him in another contradiction. The Sugar-Cane is a georgic poem, modeled after the ancient Latin poet Virgil's Georgics, which offered how-to farming advice in verse. Disturbingly, some of the language and ideas that Virgil used when discussing how to choose and treat livestock are here applied to enslaved people (a move that undercuts Grainger's explicit claim in the poem that it is wrong to treat enslaved people as "bestial," not human). Grainger was an "ameliorationist," meaning that he did not want to abolish slavery (as abolitionists did) but to "ameliorate," or improve, the living and working conditions of the enslaved. Grainger's wife was from a wealthy family that owned plantations in the Caribbean, and Grainger personally benefited from slavery on St. Christopher Island (or St. Kitts).

Many scholars understand Grainger's poem as a complex historical record of pro-imperial and proslavery thought in the eighteenth century; they reckon with its racism and try to understand its vision of slavery's place in the British Empire. With its detailed descriptions of nature and often quite scientifically precise footnotes about the island's flora and fauna (some of which are reproduced here), the poem also offers a rich account of Caribbean islands in the eighteenth century. There is another way to read the poem, too. In Digital Grainger, a fascinating online edition of the whole poem, a collective of scholars led by Cristobal Silva, Julie Chun Kim, Kimberly Takahata, and Alex Gil have proposed, additionally, reading the poem “against the grain of Grainger’s pro-slavery narrative.” They suggest looking for what the poem shows, in spite of itself, about “the everyday lives of the enslaved and other marginalized subjects of the plantation.” For instance, they explain, the “provision grounds” that Grainger describes at the end of the selection here—lands set aside for enslaved people to grow their own food—might “be read as records of the resourcefulness and creativity of their cultivators, who dealt with the poor quality of lands they were given by learning to grow plants that others shunned.” While much early British abolitionist verse offers sentimental or general depictions of enslaved people, Grainger’s poem—almost unintentionally and often in uncomfortable, challenging language—might allow glimpses into Black lives on St. Kitts (and even hints of Black resistance amid horrifying circumstances).

From The Sugar-Cane*<sup>1</sup>

Genius of Africk!<sup>2</sup> whether thou bestrid'st<sup>o</sup>
The castled elephant; or at the source,
(While howls the desert fearfully around,)
Of thine own Niger,<sup>3</sup> sadly thou reclin'st
Thy temples shaded by the tremulous<sup>o</sup> palm,
5 Or quick papaw,<sup>4</sup> whose top is necklaced round
With numerous rows of party-colored<sup>o</sup> fruit:
Or hear'st thou rather from the rocky banks
Of Rio Grandê, or black Sanaga?<sup>5</sup>
Where dauntless thou<sup>6</sup> the headlong torrent brav'st
10 In search of gold, to brede<sup>o</sup> thy woolly locks,
Or with bright ringlets ornament thine ears,
Thine arms, and ankles: O attend my song.
A muse that pities<sup>7</sup> thy distressful state;
Who sees, with grief, thy sons in fetters bound;
15 Who wishes freedom to the race of man;
Thy nod assenting craves: dread Genius, come!

Yet vain thy presence, vain thy favoring nod;
Unless once more the muses, that erewhile
Upheld me fainting in my past career,
20 Through Caribbe's<sup>o</sup> cane-isles; kind condescend
To guide my footsteps, through parched Libya's wilds;<sup>8</sup>
And bind my sun-burnt brow with other bays,
Than ever deck'd the Sylvan bard before.

* * *

In mind, and aptitude for useful toil,

40 The negroes differ: muse that difference sing.<sup>9</sup>
Whether to wield the hoe, or guide the plane;
Or for domestic uses thou<sup>1</sup> intend'st
The sunny Libyan: from what clime they spring,
It not imports; if strength and youth be theirs.

45 Yet those from Congo's wide-extended plains,
Through which the long Zaire<sup>o</sup> winds with crystal stream,
Where lavish Nature sends indulgent forth
Fruits of high flavor, and spontaneous seeds
Of bland nutritious quality, ill bear
The toilsome field; but boast a docile mind,
And happiness of features. These, with care,
50 Be taught each nice<sup>2</sup> mechanic art: or trained
To household offices: their ductile souls
Will all thy care, and all thy gold repay.

But, if the labors of the field demand
Thy chief attention; and the ambrosial<sup>o</sup> cane shade
55 Thou long'st to see, with spiry<sup>o</sup> frequency,<sup>o</sup>
Many an acre: planter, choose the slave,
Who sails from barren climes; where want alone,
Offspring of rude necessity, compels
The sturdy native, or to plant the soil,
60 Or<sup>3</sup> stem vast rivers for his daily food.

Such are the children of the Golden Coast;
Such the Papaws,<sup>4</sup> of negroes far the best:
And such the numerous tribes, that skirt the shore,
65 From rapid Volta to the distant Rey.<sup>5</sup>

But, planter, from what coast soe'er they sail,
Buy not the old: they ever sullen prove;
With heart-felt anguish, they lament their home;
They will not, cannot work; they never learn

70 Thy native language; they are prone to ails;
And oft by suicide their being end.—

Must thou from Africk reinforce thy gang?<sup>6</sup>—
Let health and youth their every sinew firm;
Clear roll their ample eye; their tongue be red;
Broad swell their chest; their shoulders wide expand;
75 Not prominent their belly; clean and strong
Their thighs and legs, in just<sup>o</sup> proportion rise.
Such soon will brave the fervors of the clime;
And free from ails, that kill thy negroe-train,
A useful servitude will long support.
80

Yet, if thine own, thy children's life, be dear;
Buy not a Cormantee,<sup>7</sup> though healthy, young.
Of breed too generous<sup>o</sup> for the servile field;
They, born to freedom in their native land,
Choose death before dishonorable bonds:
85 Or, fired with vengeance, at the midnight hour,
Sudden they seize thine unsuspecting watch,
And thine own poinard bury in thy breast.

* * *

165 Nor, Negroe, at thy destiny repine,
Though doomed to toil from dawn to setting sun.
How far more pleasant is thy rural task,
Than theirs who sweat, sequestered from the day,
In dark tartarean caves, sunk far beneath
The earth's dark surface;<sup>8</sup> where sulphureous 170 flames,
Oft from their vapory prisons bursting wild,
To dire explosion give the caverned deep,
And in dread ruin all its inmates whelm?<sup>o</sup>—
Nor fateful only is the bursting flame;
The exhalations of the deep-dug mine,
175

Though slow, shake from their wings as sure a death.

With what intense severity of pain
Hath the afflicted muse, in Scotia,<sup>o</sup> seen
The miners racked, who toil for fatal lead?
What cramps, what palsies shake their feeble limbs,
180 Who, on the margin of the rocky Drave,<sup>9</sup>
Trace silver's fluent<sup>o</sup> ore? Yet white men these!

How far more happy ye,<sup>1</sup> than those poor slaves,
Who, whilom,<sup>o</sup> under native, gracious chiefs,
185 Incas<sup>2</sup> and emperors, long time enjoyed
Mild government, with every sweet of life,
In blissful climates? See them dragged in chains,
By proud insulting tyrants, to the mines
Which once they called their own, and then despised!

See, in the mineral bosom of their land,
190 How hard they toil! how soon their youthful limbs
Feel the decrepitude of age! how soon
Their teeth desert their sockets! and how soon
Shaking paralysis unstrings their frame!
Yet scarce, even then, are they allowed to view
195 The glorious God of day, of whom they beg,
With earnest hourly supplications, death;
Yet death slow comes, to torture them the more!

With these compared, ye sons of Afric, say,
200 How far more happy is your lot? Bland<sup>o</sup> health,
Of ardent eye, and limb robust, attends
Your custom'd<sup>o</sup> labor; and, should sickness seize,
With what solicitude are ye not nursed!—
Ye Negroes, then, your pleasing task pursue;
And, by your toil, deserve your master's care.

205
When first your Blacks are novel<sup>o</sup> to the hoe;

Study their humors:<sup>3</sup> Some, soft-soothing words;
Some, presents; and some, menaces subdue;
And some I've known, so stubborn is their kind,
Whom blows, alas! could win alone to toil.

210

Yet, planter, let humanity prevail.—
Perhaps thy Negroe, in his native land,
Possessed large fertile plains, and slaves, and herds:
Perhaps, whene'er he deigned to walk abroad,
The richest silks, from where the Indus<sup>4</sup> rolls, 215 His limbs invested<sup>o</sup> in their gorgeous pleats:
Perhaps he wails his wife, his children, left
To struggle with adversity: Perhaps
Fortune, in battle for his country fought,
Gave him a captive to his deadliest foe:
220 Perhaps, incautious, in his native fields,
(On pleasurable scenes his mind intent)
All as he wandered; from the neighboring grove,
Fell ambush dragged him to the hated main.<sup>o</sup>—
Were they even sold for crimes; ye polished, say!
225 Ye, to whom Learning opes her amplest page!
Ye, whom the knowledge of a living God
Should lead to virtue! Are ye free from crimes?
Ah pity, then, these uninstructed swains;<sup>5</sup>
And still let mercy soften the decrees
230 Of rigid justice, with her lenient hand.

Oh, did the tender muse possess the power,
Which monarchs have, and monarchs oft abuse:
'Twould be the fond ambition of her soul,
To quell tyrannic sway; knock off the chains
235 Of heart-debasing slavery; give to man,
Of every color and of every clime,
Freedom, which stamps him image of his God.
Then laws, Oppression's scourge,<sup>6</sup> fair Virtue's prop,

240 Offspring of Wisdom! should impartial reign,
To knit the whole in well-accorded strife:
Servants, not slaves; of choice, and not compelled;
The Blacks should cultivate the Cane-land isles.

* * *

'Til morning dawn, and Lucifer<sup>7</sup> withdraw
His beamy<sup>o</sup> chariot; let not the loud bell
Call forth thy negroes from their rushy couch:<sup>8</sup>
And ere the sun with mid-day fervor glow,
When every broom-bush<sup>9</sup> opes<sup>o</sup> her yellow flower;
410 Let thy black laborers from their toil desist:
Nor till the broom her every petal lock,
Let the loud bell recall them to the hoe.
But when the jalap<sup>1</sup> her bright tint displays,
When the solanum<sup>2</sup> fills her cup with dew,
415 And crickets, snakes, and lizards 'gin<sup>o</sup> their coil;
Let them find shelter in their cane-thatched huts:
Or, if constrained unusual hours to toil,
(For even the best must sometimes urge their gang)
With double nutriment reward their pains.

420
Howe'er insensate<sup>3</sup> some may deem their slaves,
Nor 'bove<sup>o</sup> the bestial rank; far other thoughts
The muse, soft daughter of humanity!
Will ever entertain.—The Ethiop<sup>4</sup> knows,
The Ethiop feels, when treated like a man;
425 Nor grudges, should necessity compel,
By day, by night, to labor for his lord.

Not less inhuman, than unthrifty those;
Who, half the year's rotation round the sun,
Deny subsistence to their laboring slaves.
430 But would'st thou see thy negroe-train increase,
Free from disorders; and thine acres clad

With groves of sugar: every week dispense
Or English beans, or Carolinian rice;
Iërne's<sup>o</sup> beef, or Pensilvanian flour;
435 Newfoundland cod, or herrings from the main
That howls tempestuous round the Scotian isles!

Yet some there are so lazily inclined,
And so neglectful of their food, that thou,
Would'st thou preserve them from the jaws of death;
440 Daily, their wholesome viands<sup>o</sup> must prepare:
With these let all the young, and childless old,
And all the morbid<sup>o</sup> share;—so heaven will bless,
With manifold increase, thy costly care.

Suffice not this; to every slave assign
445 Some mountain-ground: or, if waste broken land
To thee belong, that broken land divide.
This let them cultivate, one day, each week;
And there raise yams, and there cassada's root:
From a good daemon's staff cassada<sup>o</sup> sprang,
450 Tradition says, and Caribbees believe;
Which into three the white-robed genius broke,
And bade them plant, their hunger to repel.<sup>5</sup>
There let angola's<sup>6</sup> bloomy bush supply
For many a year, with wholesome pulse their board.
455 There let the bonavist,<sup>7</sup> his fringed pods
Throw liberal o'er the prop; while ochra<sup>8</sup> bears
Aloft his slimy pulp, and help disdains.
There let potatoes<sup>o</sup> mantle o'er the ground;
Sweet as the cane-juice is the root they bear.
460 There too let eddas<sup>9</sup> spring in order meet,
With Indian cale,<sup>1</sup> and foodful<sup>o</sup> calaloo:
While mint, thyme, balm, and Europe's coyer herbs,
Shoot gladsome forth, nor reprobate the clime.

WILLIAM SHENSTONE

Among the twenty-six elegies included in the Works in Verse and Prose (2 volumes, 1764) by the British writer and garden designer William Shenstone (1714–1763) is one that adopts the voice of an enslaved African, whose sufferings Shenstone considers alongside his own. As a group, Shenstone's elegies treat his personal life, his melancholy, and his unrequited love for a woman he calls Delia. It was common in poetry to dramatize the pains of love: using an ancient poetic idiom, male poets often declared themselves the "slaves" of the women on whom they fixated. But Shenstone's Elegy XX does something markedly different. He begins by acknowledging that his sufferings are insignificant and even pleasing compared to the plight of those subject to enslavement. In lofty, heroic language, he imagines the voice of an African cruelly victimized by European Christians, who hypocritically speak to him of goodness and heaven. The poem's antislavery themes so far exceeded its original context—Shenstone's melancholic account of his own life—that the famous British abolitionist Granville Sharp included it in two of his antislavery tracts, An Essay on Slavery (1773) and The Just Limitations of Slavery in the Laws of God (1776), with the first four stanzas lopped off, under the title "An Elegy on the Miserable State of an African Slave." Throughout the poem, Shenstone subtly acknowledges the distances between his own poetic language and the actual experiences and feelings of the African whom he and other Britons endeavor to imagine sympathetically.

Elegy XX

He compares his humble fortune with the distress of others;
and his subjection to Delia, with the miserable servitude of an African slave.<sup>1</sup>

Why droops his heart, with fancied<sup>o</sup> woes forlorn?
Why sinks my soul beneath each wintry sky?
What pensive crowds, by ceaseless labors worn,
What myriads, wish to be as blest as I!

5      What though my roofs devoid of pomp<sup>o</sup> arise,
Nor tempt the proud to quit his destined way?
Nor costly art my flowery dales disguise.<sup>2</sup>
Where only simple friendship deigns to stray?

10     See the wild sons of Lapland's chill domain,<sup>3</sup>
That scoop their couch<sup>o</sup> beneath the drifted snows!
How void of hope they ken<sup>o</sup> the frozen plains,
Where the sharp east<sup>o</sup> forever, ever blows!

15     Slave though I be, to Delia's eyes a slave,
My Delia's eyes endear the bands<sup>o</sup> I wear;
The sigh she causes well becomes the brave.
The pang she causes, 'tis even bliss to bear.

20     See the poor native quit the Lybian shores,<sup>4</sup>
Ah! not in love's delightful fetters bound!
No radiant smile his dying peace restores,
Nor love, nor fame, nor friendship heals his wound.

Let vacant bards<sup>o</sup> display their boasted woes,
Shall I the mockery of grief display?

No, let the muse his<sup>o</sup> piercing pangs disclose,
Who bleeds and weeps his sum of life away!

25 On the wild beach in mournful guise he stood,
Ere the shrill boatswain<sup>5</sup> gave the hated sign;
He dropt a tear unseen into the flood;<sup>o</sup>
He stole one secret moment, to repine,

Yet the muse listened to the complaints he made;
Such moving complaints as nature could inspire;
30 To me the muse his tender plea conveyed,
But smoothed, and suited to the sounding lyre.<sup>o</sup>

“Why am I ravished<sup>6</sup> from my native strand?<sup>o</sup>
What savage race protects this impious gain?
Shall foreign plagues infest this teeming land,
35 And more than sea-born monsters plough the main?
<sup>o</sup>

Here the dire locusts horrid swarms prevail;
Here the blue asps with livid poison swell;
Here the dry dipsas<sup>7</sup> writhes his sinuous mail;
40 Can we not here, secure from envy, dwell?<sup>8</sup>

When the grim lion urged his cruel chase,
When the stern panther sought his midnight prey,
What fate reserved me for this Christian race?
O race more polished, more severe than they!

45 Ye prowling wolves pursue my latest cries!
Thou hungry tiger, leave thy reeking den!
Ye sandy wastes in rapid eddies rise!
O tear me from the whips and scorns of men!

Yet in their face superior beauty glows;
Are smiles the mien<sup>o</sup> of rapine and of wrong?
50

Yet from their lip the voice of mercy flows,
And even religion dwells upon their tongue.

Of blissful haunts<sup>o</sup> they tell, and brighter climes,<sup>o</sup>
Where gentle minds conveyed by death repair,<sup>9</sup> 55 But stained with blood, and crimsoned o'er with crimes,
Say, shall they merit what they paint<sup>o</sup> so fair?

No, careless, hopeless of those fertile plains,
Rich by our toils, and by our sorrows gay,
They ply our labors, and enhance our pains,
60 And feign these distant regions to repay.<sup>1</sup>

For them our tusked elephant expires;
For them we drain the mine's embowelled gold;
Where rove the brutal nations' wild desires?—
Our limbs are purchased, and our life is sold!

65 Yet shores there are, blest shores for us remain,
And favored isles with golden fruitage crowned,
Where tufted flowerets paint the verdant plain,
Where every breeze shall med'cine<sup>o</sup> every wound.

There the stern tyrant that embitters life
70 Shall, vainly suppliant, spread his asking hand;
There shall we view the billow's raging strife,
Aid the kind breast, and waft his boat to land."

JUPITER HAMMON

Among the founders of Black American literature, Jupiter Hammon (1711–ca. 1806) was born enslaved to the Lloyd family on Long Island, New York. The circumstances under which he learned to read and write are not established, though it is possible he was taught at a schoolhouse along with the Lloyd children. His first published literary work, the poem “An Evening Thought: Salvation by Christ with Penitential Cries” (1761), was written when he was nearly fifty, in 1760, and it stands as the first published poem by a Black North American poet. Some eighteen years later, he published the poem “An Address to Miss Phillis Wheatley” (1778), which praises and encourages the younger Black poet’s Christian piety. Such themes prevail throughout his work, as he promotes the acceptance of God’s will and gratitude for Christ’s salvation. Among his most well-known pieces is his prose An Address to Negroes in the State of New York, a speech he gave in 1786, when he was seventy-one years old, to the African Society, the first Black social and political organization in New York City. While still stressing a message of obedience and salvation, the speech also affirms that “liberty is a great thing,” and says he wishes that “the young negroes were to be free.” (At his age, he felt that leaving the home in which he had lived his life enslaved and attempting to compete in the “free” labor market would only expose him to utter destitution.) He concludes by placing his hope in heaven, “where we shall find nobody to reproach us for being Black, or for being slaves.”

Dating to the same year as An Address, Hammon’s poem “An Essay on Slavery” was unpublished in his lifetime. It adopts many of the speech’s themes, with a more striking insistence that slavery is an evil and that liberty is the human destiny of Black people. The poem, in Hammon’s own hand, was located in a Yale University library by the scholar Julie McCown, and she and another scholar, Cedrick May, analyzed and published it in 2013. The poem complicates the previously common view of Hammon as merely compliant and uninterested in contesting enslavement. McCown and May argue that Hammon likely intended to publish it alongside An Address, and persuasively speculate that elements of its message might have been too inflammatory for the Lloyd family to allow it into print. The edition by McCown and May (which is reproduced here, with notes abridged) meticulously records evidence of Hammon's revisions to the manuscript: final wordings, marked in the main text below with asterisks, can be compared to initial wordings marked with asterisks in the right margins. As McCown and May point out, some of these final revisions more decisively place the moral blame for slavery on "Man," not on God or the nature of things, and imply that it is the duty of humanity to replace slavery with liberty. The text below preserves the idiosyncrasies of Hammon's handwriting, spelling, and style—notably clean and consistent by eighteenth-century manuscript standards—while indicating a carefully revised, largely finished production.

An Essay on Slavery, with submission to Divine providence, knowing that God Rules over all things—

Written by Jupiter Hammon—

1

Our forefathers came from Africa
tost over the raging main to a Christian shore there for to stay and not return again.

2

5 Dark and dismal was the Day
When slavery began
All humble thoughts were put away
Then slaves were made *by Man.

3

10 When God doth please for to permit
That slavery should be
It is our duty to submit
Till Christ shall *make us free

4

Come let us join with one consent
With humble hearts *and say
For every sin we must repent

15 And walk in wisdoms way.

5

If we are free *we'll pray to God
If we are slaves the same
*It's firmly fixt in **his word.
20 Ye shall not pray in vain.

6

Come blessed Jesus in thy Love
And hear thy Children cry
And send them smiles now from above
And grant them Liberty.

7

25 Tis thou alone can make us free
We are thy subjects two<sup>1</sup>
Pray give us grace to bend a knee
The time we stay below.

8

30 This unto thee we look for all
Thou art our only King
Thou hast the power to save the soul
And bring us flocking in.

9

We come as sinners *unto thee
We know thou hast the word
Come blessed Jesus make us free

35 And bring us to our God.

10

Although we are in slavery-
We will pray unto our God
He hath mercy ~~hid~~<sup>2</sup> beyond the sky
40 Tis in his holy word.

11

Come unto me ye humble souls
Although you live in strife
I keep alive, *I save the soul
And give eternal life.

12

45 To all that do repent of sin
*Be they ~~there~~<sup>3</sup> bond or free.
I am their savior and their king
They must come unto me.

13

50 Hear the words *now of the Lord
The call is loud and certain
We must be judged by his word
Without respect of person.<sup>4</sup>

14

55 Come let us seek his precepts now
And love his holy word
With humble soul we'll surely bow

And wait the great reward.

15

Although we came from Africa
We look unto our God
To help with our hearts to sigh and pray
And Love his holy word.

16

Although we are in slavery
Bound *by the yoke of Man
We must always have a single Eye
And do the best we can.

17

Come let us join with humble voice
Now on the christian shore
If we will have our only choice
Tis Slavery no more.

18

Now [~~surely~~ surely] let us not repine
And say his wheels are slow<sup>5</sup>
He can fill our hearts with things divine
And give us freedom two.

19

He hath the power all in his hand
And all he doth is right
And if we are tide to ~~the~~ yoke of man

*We'll pray with all our might.

20

80 This the State of thousands now
Who are on the christian shore
Forget the Lord to whom we bow
And think of him no more.

21

85 When shall we hear the joyfull sound
Echo the christian shore
Each humble voice with songs resound
That Slavery is no more.

22

Then shall we rejoice and sing
Loud praises to our God
Come sweet Jesus heavenly king
Thou art the son *Our Lord.

23

90 We are thy children blessed Lord
Tho still in Slavery
*We'll seek thy precepts Love thy word
Untill the day we Die.

24

95 Come blessed Jesus hear us now
And teach our hearts to pray
And seek the Lord to whom we Bow

Before tribunal day.

25

100      Now Glory be unto our God
All praise be justly given
Come seek his precepts Love his works
That is the way to Heaven.—

HANNAH MORE

The author, educator, and philanthropist Hannah More (1745–1833) led a life crowded with literary successes, and with causes: she wrote and worked to reform the aristocracy, educate the poor, and establish “modern” methods to educate women as well, with an eye toward equipping them to fulfill the social roles their gender enjoined on them. Her intellect and passions were particularly strongly engaged by the movement to end the British trade in enslaved people, which gained adherents and fervor in Britain in the late 1780s. In 1787, she met William Wilberforce, the chief parliamentary campaigner for abolition, and published Slavery, a Poem early in 1788 to support the first bill to end the trade that would be promoted by Wilberforce and his allies. The bill’s failure in 1789 only invigorated More to work harder for the cause. When Parliament at last banned the British trade in 1807, she joined the newly formed African Institution, which sought to establish a refuge for freed Black people in Sierra Leone, in West Africa; and worked in subsequent decades to rid the British colonies of slavery itself, a task finally accomplished by the passage of the Slavery Abolition Act of 1833, a few months before her death.

More’s poem Slavery orchestrates many contrasting energies. She insists on the mass scale of the moral catastrophe of slavery, differentiating herself from earlier writers such as Aphra Behn and Thomas Southerne, who focused on the injustice of enslaving singularly exalted individuals like Oroonoko and Imoinda (see p. 152). But she also tells the story of Quashi, a noble African enslaved in the West Indies whom she learned about from her friend, the abolitionist minister James Ramsay; and her poem includes sentimental vignettes that visualize an African husband torn from his wife and infant, and address a murdering slaver on the brink of his crime. Further complexities emerge from her sympathetic yet stereotyped, generalizing views of Africans’ “rude energy” and

"strong but luxuriant virtues." More weaves a somewhat confused language of otherness to portray Africans alongside social groups with whom she and her readers were more familiar. Like heroes of Roman antiquity, Africans are noble "pagans," that is, non-Christians. But More also repeatedly refers to Africans as "savages," implicitly distinguishing them from "civilized" ancient Romans, as well as from modern Europeans. She nevertheless also casts European enslavers as "barbarians," perhaps alluding to the hordes from northern Europe who wrecked the civilization of Rome. Finally all these frail distinctions break down in the poem's concluding section: at a dramatic moment of reversal, she addresses the "WHITE SAVAGE!" (line 211) who perpetrates the abductions, murders, and expropriations of European colonialism. The poem comes to rest with the descent of angelic Mercy, a universalizing Christian influence sent to all peoples from heaven.

From Slavery, a Poem

* * *

Though not to me, sweet bard,<sup>1</sup> thy powers belong,
50 Fair truth, a hallowed guide! inspires my song.
Here art would weave her gayest flowers in vain,
For truth the bright invention would disdain.
For no fictitious ills these numbers<sup>o</sup> flow,
But living anguish, and substantial woe;
55 No individual griefs my bosom melt,
For millions feel what Oroonoko felt:
Fired by no single wrongs, the countless host
I mourn, by rapine dragged from Afric's coast.
Perish th'illiberal thought which would debase
60 The native genius of the sable race!
Perish the proud philosophy, which sought
To rob them of the powers of equal thought!
Does then th'immortal principle within
Change with the casual<sup>o</sup> color of a skin?
Does matter govern spirit? or is mind
65 Degraded by the form to which 'tis joined?
No: they have heads to think, and hearts to feel,
And souls to act, with firm, though erring, zeal;
For they have keen affections, kind desires,
70 Love strong as death, and active patriot fires;<sup>o</sup>
All the rude energy, the fervid flame,
Of high-souled passion, and ingenuous shame:
Strong but luxuriant<sup>o</sup> virtues boldly shoot
From the wild vigor of a savage root.
Nor weak their sense of honor's proud control,
75 For pride is virtue in a pagan<sup>2</sup> soul;

A sense of worth, a conscience<sup>o</sup> of desert,
A high, unbroken haughtiness of heart:
That self-same stuff which erst<sup>o</sup> proud empires swayed,
Of which the conquerors of the world were made.
80 Capricious fate of man! that very pride
In Afric scourged, in Rome was deified.
    No Muse, O Quashi!<sup>3</sup> shall thy deeds relate,
No statue snatch thee from oblivious<sup>o</sup> fate!
For thou wast born where never gentle muse
85 On valor's grave the flowers of genius strews;
And thou wast born where no recording page
Plucks the fair deed from time's devouring rage.
Had fortune placed thee on some happier coast,
Where polished souls heroic virtue boast,
90 To thee, who sought'st a voluntary grave,
Th'uninjur'd honors of thy name to save,
Whose generous arm thy barbarous master spared,
Altars had smoked, and temples had been reared.<sup>4</sup>
    Whene'er to Afric's shores I turn my eyes,
95 Horrors of deepest, deadliest guilt arise;
I see, by more than fancy's mirror<sup>o</sup> shown,
The burning village, and the blazing town:
See the dire victim torn from social life,
The shrieking babe, the agonizing wife!
100 She, wretch forlorn! is dragged by hostile hands,
To distant tyrants sold, in distant lands!
Transmitted miseries, and successive chains,
The sole sad heritage her child obtains!
Ev'n this last wretched boon their foes deny,
105 To weep together, or together die.
By felon hands, by one relentless stroke,
See the fond links of feeling nature broke!
The fibers twisting round a parent's heart,
Torn from their grasp, and bleeding as they part.
110

Hold, murderers, hold! not aggravate distress;
Respect the passions you yourselves possess;
Ev'n you, of ruffian heart, and ruthless hand,
Love your own offspring, love your native land.
115 Ah! leave them holy freedom's cheering smile,
The heaven-taught fondness for the parent soil;
Revere affections mingled with our frame,<sup>o</sup>
In every nature, every clime the same;
In all, these feelings equal sway maintain;
In all the love of HOME and FREEDOM reign:
120 And Tempe's vale, and parched Angola's sand,<sup>5</sup>
One equal fondness of their sons command.
Th'unconquer'd savage laughs at pain and toil,
Basking in freedom's beams which gild his native soil.

Does thirst of empire, does desire of fame,
125 (For these are specious crimes)<sup>6</sup> our rage inflame?
No: sordid lust of gold their fate controls,
The basest appetite of basest souls;
Gold, better gained by what their ripening sky,<sup>7</sup>
Their fertile fields, their arts<sup>8</sup> and mines supply.

130 What wrongs, what injuries does oppression plead
To smooth the horror of th'unnatural deed?
What strange offence, what aggravated sin?
They stand convicted—of a darker skin!
Barbarians, hold! th'opprobrious commerce spare,
135 Respect his<sup>o</sup> sacred image which they bear:
Though dark and savage, ignorant and blind,
They claim the common privilege of kind;<sup>o</sup>
Let malice strip them of each other plea,
They still are men, and men should still be free.
140 Insulted reason loathes th'inverted trade—
Dire change! the agent is the purchase made!<sup>9</sup>
Perplexed, the baffled muse involves<sup>o</sup> the tale;

145 Nature confounded, well may language fail!
The outraged goddess with abhorrent eyes
Sees MAN the traffic, SOULS the merchandize!

* * *

And thou, WHITE SAVAGE! whether lust of gold,
Or lust of conquest, rule thee uncontrolled!
Hero, or robber!—by whatever name
Thou plead thy impious claim to wealth or fame;
Whether inferior mischiefs<sup>1</sup> be thy boast,
215 A petty tyrant rifling Gambia's coast:
Or bolder carnage track thy crimson way,
Kings dispossessed, and provinces thy prey;
Panting to tame wide earth's remotest bound;
All Cortez murdered, all Columbus found;<sup>2</sup>
220 O'er plundered realms to reign, detested Lord,
Make millions wretched, and thyself abhorred;—
In reason's eye, in wisdom's fair account,
Your sum of glory boasts a like amount;
The means may differ, but the end's the same;
225 Conquest is pillage with a nobler name.
Who makes the sum of human blessings less,
Or sinks the stock of general happiness,
No solid fame shall grace, no true renown,
His life shall blazon,<sup>o</sup> or his memory crown.
230 Had those advenferous spirits who explore Through ocean's trackless wastes, the far-sought shore;
Whether of wealth insatiate, or of power,
Conquerors who waste, or ruffians who devour:
Had these possessed, O Cook!<sup>3</sup> thy gentle mind,
235 Thy love of arts, thy love of humankind;
Had these pursued thy mild and liberal plan,
DISCOVERERS had not been a curse to man!

* * *

Shall Britain, where the soul of freedom reigns,
Forge chains for others she herself disdains?
Forbid it, Heaven! O let the nations know
The liberty she loves she will bestow;
255 Not to herself the glorious gift confined,
She spreads the blessing wide as humankind;
And, scorning narrow views of time and place,
Bids all be free in earth's extended space.
What page of human annals can record
A deed so bright as human rights restored?
260 O may that god-like deed, that shining page,
Redeem OUR fame, and consecrate OUR age!
And see, the cherub Mercy from above,
Descending softly, quits the sphere of love!
On feeling hearts she sheds celestial dew,
265 And breathes her spirit o'er th'enlighten'd few;
From soul to soul the spreading influence steals,
Till every breast the soft contagion feels.
She bears, exulting, to the burning shore
The loveliest office o angel ever bore;
270 To vindicate the power in Heaven adored,
To still the clank of chains, and sheathe the sword;
To cheer the mourner, and with soothing hands
From bursting hearts unbind th'oppressor's bands;
To raise the luster of the Christian name,
275 And clear the foulest blot that dims its fame.
As the mild spirit hovers o'er the coast,
A fresher hue the withered landscapes boast;
Her healing smiles the ruined scenes repair,
And blasted nature wears a joyous air.
280 She spreads her blest commission from above,
Stamped with the sacred characters of love;
She tears the banner stained with blood and tears,
And, LIBERTY! thy shining standard rears!

285 As the bright ensign's<sup>o</sup> glory she displays,
See pale OPPRESSION faints beneath the blaze!
The giant dies! no more his frown appalls,
The chain untouched, drops off; the fetter falls.
Astonished echo tells the vocal shore,
Oppression's fallen, and slavery is no more!
290 The dusky myriads<sup>o</sup> crowd the sultry plain,
And hail that mercy long invoked in vain.
Victorious power! she bursts their two-fold bands,
And FAITH and FREEDOM spring from Mercy's hands.

- Note 1: More has just addressed Thomas Southerne in lines not included here ("plaintive Southerne!" 37), the Irish dramatist who adapted Oroonoko (1688) by Aphra Behn for the stage, as Oroonoko, a Tragedy (1696): as in Behn's story, the title character is a noble African prince whose resistance to enslavement ends in his death.Return to reference 1

It is a point of honor among negroes of a high spirit to die rather than to suffer their glossy skin to bear the mark of the whip. Qua-shi had somehow offended his master, a young planter with whom he had been bred up in the endearing intimacy of a play-fellow. His services had been faithful; his attachment affectionate. The master resolved to punish him, and pursued him for that purpose. In trying to escape Qua-shi stumbled and fell; the master fell upon him; they wrestled long with doubtful victory; at length Qua-shi got uppermost, and, being firmly seated on his master's breast, he secured his legs with one hand, and with the other drew a sharp knife; then said, 'Master, I have been bred up with you from a child; I have loved you as myself: in return, you have condemned me to a punishment of which I must ever have borne the marks: thus only can I avoid them'; so saying, he drew the knife with all his strength across his own throat, and fell down dead, without a groan, on his master's body. Ramsay's Essay on the Treatment of African Slaves [More's note]. More condenses and freely paraphrases an anecdote related in James Ramsay, An Essay on the Treatment and Conversion of African Slaves in the British Sugar Colonies (1784), pp. 249–53. Ramsay, a surgeon and Anglican minister who worked on St. Kitts in the Caribbean, offers firsthand accounts of Quashi and many other enslaved people to illustrate both the inherent nobility of Africans and their need to be converted to Christianity (which forbids suicide).

JAMES BOSWELL

The Scottish biographer, diarist, and lawyer James Boswell initially seemed inclined against slavery, working on the legal team that supported the appeal of Joseph Knight, an enslaved man in Scotland who first sued for his freedom in 1774, and soliciting an abolitionist argument to support Knight's case in 1777 from his friend Samuel Johnson (see above). Boswell also attended a meeting of the Committee for the Abolition of the Slave Trade in 1787. But by the time he published his masterpiece, The Life of Samuel Johnson (1791; see p. 884), his position had shifted. In the Life, he consistently worked, scholars have pointed out, to mute the vigorous antislavery sentiments of his literary hero. The same year the Life appeared, Boswell also anonymously published No Abolition of Slavery, or the Universal Empire of Love, a lampoon of the leading parliamentary abolitionists that also rehearses familiar arguments made by slavery's apologists: he claims that Africans are happy to be enslaved on British plantations, that the promoters of ending the transatlantic trade do not understand how deleterious to British commerce such a ban would be, that God intends society to be a hierarchy in which some groups must be subordinated to others, and so on. He concludes with the most bizarre point of all, seemingly made, after a fashion, in jest. Love holds ultimate power over everybody, Boswell muses, making all men its slaves, and stopping Britain's transatlantic system of chattel slavery would have no effect on this universal "slavery" of the romantic kind. The poem facetiously advances this idea as a compliment to the unnamed young woman it addresses, evoking offhand the sufferings of the Middle Passage and the often fatal "seasoning" of enslaved Africans in British Caribbean colonies to illustrate Boswell's own pangs of love. His analogy suggests how easily some White Britons of the era could minimize or connive at the painful realities of enslavement when they were invested, financially, ideologically, or otherwise, in its continuance.

From No Abolition of Slavery; or, The Universal Empire of Love

* * *

Noodles,<sup>1</sup> who rave for abolition
Of th'African's improved condition,<sup>2</sup>
At your own cost fine projects try;
Don't rob—from pure humanity.

25     Go, W—, with narrow skull,
Go home, and preach away at Hull,<sup>3</sup>
No longer to the senate<sup>4</sup> cackle,
In strains which suit the tabernacle;<sup>o</sup>
I hate your little witling<sup>o</sup> sneer,
Your pert and self-sufficient leer,
30     Mischief to trade sits on thy lip,
Insects will gnaw the noblest ship;
Go, W—, be gone, for shame,
Thou dwarf,<sup>5</sup> with a big-sounding name.

* * *

55     What frenzies will a rabble seize
In lax luxurious days, like these;
THE PEOPLE'S MAJESTY, forsooth,
Must fix our rights, define our truth;
Weavers<sup>6</sup> become our lords of trade,
And every clown throw<sup>7</sup> by his spade,
60     T'instruct our ministers of state,
And foreign commerce regulate:
Ev'n bony Scotland with her dirk,<sup>8</sup>
Nay, her starved Presbyterian kirk,<sup>9</sup>

65 With ignorant effrontery prays Britain to dim the western rays,<sup>1</sup>
Which while they on our island fall
Give warmth and splendor to us all.

* * *

180 He who to thwart GOD'S system<sup>2</sup> tries,
Bids mountains sink, and valleys rise;
Slavery, subjection, what you will,
Has ever been, and will be still:
Trust me, that in this world of woe
Mankind must different burthens know;
185 Each bear his own, th'apostle spoke;<sup>3</sup>
And chiefly they who bear the yoke.<sup>4</sup>
From wise subordination's plan
Springs the chief happiness of man;
Yet from that source to numbers flow
Varieties of pain and woe;
190 Look round this land of freedom, pray,
And all its lower ranks survey;
Bid the hard-working laborer speak,
What are his scanty gains a week?
All huddled in a smoky shed,
195 How are his wife and children fed?
Are not the poor in constant fear
Of the relentless overseer?<sup>5</sup>

LONDON! Metropolis of bliss!
200 Ev'n there sad sights we cannot miss;
Beggars at every corner stand,
With doleful look and trembling hand;
Hear the shrill piteous cry of sweep,
See wretches riddling<sup>o</sup> an ash heap;
The streets some for old iron scrape,
205 And scarce the crush of wheels escape;

Some share with dogs the half-eat bones,
From dunghills picked with weary groans.

* * *

Lo then, in yonder fragrant isle
Where nature ever seems to smile,
The cheerful gang!<sup>6</sup>—the negroes see
Perform the task of industry:
245 Ev'n at their labor hear them sing,
While time flies quick on downy wing;
Finished the business of the day,
No human beings are more gay:
Of food, clothes, cleanly lodging sure,
250 Each has his property secure;
Their wives and children are protected,
In sickness they are not neglected;
And when old age brings a release,
Their grateful days they end in peace.

255 But should our wrongheads have their will,
Should Parliament approve their bill,
Pernicious as th'effect would be,
T'abolish negro slavery,
Such partial freedom would be vain,
260 Since love's strong empire must remain.

VENUS, czarina<sup>o</sup> of the skies,
Despotic by her killing eyes,
Millions of slaves who don't complain,
Confess her universal reign:
265 And Cupid too well-used to try
His bow-string lash, and darts to ply,
Her little Driver still we find,
A wicked rogue, although he's blind.<sup>7</sup>

Bring me not maxims from the schools;<sup>o</sup>

270 Experience now my conduct rules;
O ——! trust thy lover true,
I must and will be slave to you.<sup>8</sup>

Yet I must say—but prithee smile,—
'Twas a hard trip to Paphos<sup>9</sup> isle;
By your keen roving glances caught,
275 And to a beauteous tyrant brought;
My head with giddiness turned round,
With strongest fetters I was bound;
I fancy from my frame and face,
You thought me of th'Angola race:<sup>1</sup>
280 You kept me long indeed, my dear,
Between the decks of hope and fear;
But this and all the seasoning<sup>2</sup> o'er,
My blessings I enjoy the more.

285 Contented with my situation,
I want but little REGULATION;
At intervals chanson à boire
And good old port in my Code noire;<sup>3</sup>
Nor care I when I've once begun,
How long I labor, in the sun
290 Of your bright eyes!—which beam with joy,
Warm, cheer, enchant, but don't destroy.

My charming friend! it is full time
To close this argument in rhyme;
The rhapsody must now be ended,
295 My proposition I've defended;
For, slavery there must ever be,
While we have mistresses like thee!

- Note 1: If the abettors of the Slave trade Bill should think they are too harshly treated in this Poem, let them consider how they should feel if their estates were threatened by an agrarian law; (no unpalatable measure) and let them make allowances for the irritation which themselves have occasioned [Boswell's note].
"Noodles": fools.Return to reference 1
- Note 2: That the Africans are in a state of savage wretchedness, appears from the most authentic accounts. Such being the fact, an abolition of the slave trade would in truth be precluding them from the first step towards progressive civilization, and consequently of happiness, which it is proved by the most respectable evidence they enjoy in a great degree in our West-India islands, though under well-regulated restraint [from Boswell's note, which goes on to compare enslaved Africans to Scottish Highlanders, whom Boswell considered primitive, who protested the union of 1707 with England].Return to reference 2
- Note 3: The initial letter W (line 25) provided by Boswell indicates William Wilberforce (1759–1833), leader of the parliamentary antislavery faction, member for Kingston upon Hull in the north of England, and a passionate evangelical Christian (see line 28).Return to reference 3
- Note 4: The question now agitated in the British Parliament concerning slavery, is illustrated with great information, able argument, and perspicuous expression, in a work entitled, Doubts on the Abolition of the Slave Trade, by an Old Member of Parliament; printed for Stockdale, in Picadilly, 1790. It is ascribed to John Ranby, Esq. [Boswell's note, which goes on to acknowledge that the "evils" of enslavement should "be humanely remedied" without abolition, praising the Slave Trade Act of 1788, also known as Dolben's Act, which limited the number of enslaved people who could be transported in ships, based on the ships' sizes].Return to reference 4

- Note 3: Properly code noir (French, black code), French laws enacted by Louis XIV (1638–1715) in 1685 that regulated the conditions of enslavement in French colonies. Boswell presumably applies the term to his port, a fortified wine, because of its dark color. “REGULATION”: Boswell maintains his view that the trade in enslaved people should be better regulated, but not abolished. “Chanson à boire”: drinking song (French).Return to reference 3

ca. 1753–1784

The poet who would become Phillis Wheatley was born in West Africa around 1753—we do not know the details of precisely when and where. We do know, though, that enslavers forcibly took her, shipped her to America, and put her up for sale in 1761. While living in Boston as the legal property of John and Susanna Wheatley, the future poet learned to read and write, began to publish individual poems, and chose to be baptized as a Christian. Her book, Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral, appeared in 1773, with a prefatory note in which important White male figures of Boston patronizingly vouch for their belief that Wheatley was capable of writing it. She was freed from enslavement later that year, and in 1778 she married John Peters, a free Black man. They had three children, but all of them died young. The poet herself died, poor, in 1784, and her grave is unmarked.

Frontispiece portrait engraving of Phillis Wheatley, in Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral, 1773, after a painting perhaps by Scipio Moorhead (see p. 995 for Wheatley's poem addressed to him).

The name on the title page of her Poems—Phillis Wheatley—bears a violent history. We do not know what she was named in Africa when she was born. In America she became “Phillis,” named after the slaving ship that carried her through the Middle Passage to Boston. “Wheatley” was the last name of the family to which she was enslaved. Later, after her book had been published, she became free, married, and took on her husband’s last name, “Peters.” Many scholars today use the second last name as the only name she herself chose, one marking instead a history of love. Phillis Wheatley Peters later wrote another volume of poems—one that might have borne this chosen name and, as Black American poet June Jordan wrote in 1985, “would have been the poetry of someone who had chosen herself, free, and brave to be free in a land of slavery”—but Wheatley Peters was unable to arrange for its publication. This poet who could not get support for her second book, however, is now one of the most read and most important eighteenth-century writers.

Wheatley wrote in North America: she belongs in a tradition of American and African American literature. But she is also part of the British tradition. Her first big success was a poem on the English Methodist preacher George Whitefield, dedicated to the English Countess of Huntingdon, Selina Hastings. And when Wheatley was unable to get her poems published in Boston, Hastings helped her arrange for English publication. Wheatley traveled to London, where her Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral were first printed in 1773. (On the journey, she penned a “Farewell to America”: “for Britannia’s distant shore / We sweep the liquid plain”). Moreover, Wheatley knew and admired the works of English poets like John Milton and Alexander Pope, and her poetry creatively repurposed the forms of Miltonic blank verse and Popean couplets. Like Milton and Pope, moreover, Wheatley is deeply interested in classical Greek and Latin poetic traditions—she meditates thoughtfully on her place in these in “To Maecenas.”

The neoclassical aspects of Wheatley’s work have sometimes disappointed or puzzled later readers, who seem to wish that she wrote in a more lyric or Romantic mode about her personal experiences and feelings. Other later readers have wanted her to be more vehement or angry in her condemnation of slavery. Yet we should not wish these formally brilliant poems to be otherwise. We ought to respect, on her own terms, Wheatley's careful thinking about poetry, about her engagement in a learned tradition, and about what she could or should say.

To Maecenas<sup>1</sup>

MAECENAS, you, beneath the myrtle shade,
Read o'er what poets sung, and shepherds played.
What felt those poets but you feel the same?
Does not your soul possess the sacred flame?
5 Their noble strains your equal genius shares
In softer language, and diviner airs.

While Homer<sup>2</sup> paints Io! circumfused<sup>o</sup> in air,
Celestial Gods in mortal forms appear;
Swift as they move hear each recess rebound,
10 Heav'n quakes, earth trembles, and the shores resound.

Great Sire of verse, before my mortal eyes,
The lightnings blaze across the vaulted skies,
And, as the thunder shakes the heav'nly plains,
A deep-felt horror thrills through all my veins.
When gentler strains demand thy graceful song,
15 The length'ning line moves languishing along.
When great Patroclus courts Achilles' aid,
The grateful tribute of my tears is paid;
Prone on the shore he feels the pangs of love,
20 And stern Pelides<sup>3</sup> tend'rest passions move.

Great Maro's<sup>4</sup> strain in heav'nly numbers flows,
The Nine<sup>5</sup> inspire, and all the bosom glows.
O could I rival thine and Virgil's page,
Or claim the Muses with the Mantuan Sage;<sup>o</sup>
25 Soon the same beauties should my mind adorn,
And the same ardors in my soul should burn:
Then should my song in bolder notes arise,

And all my numbers pleasingly surprise;
 But here I sit, and mourn a grov'ling mind,
 That fain would mount, and ride upon the wind.
 30

Not you, my friend, these plaintive<sup>o</sup> strains become,
 Not you, whose bosom is the Muses' home;
 When they from tow'ring Helicon<sup>6</sup> retire,
 They fan in you the bright immortal fire,
 But I less happy, cannot raise the song,
 35 The fault'ring music dies upon my tongue.

The happier Terence<sup>7</sup> all the choir inspir'd,
 His soul replenished, and his bosom fir'd;
 But say, ye Muses, why this partial grace,
 To one alone of Afric's sable race;
 40 From age to age transmitting thus his name
 With the first glory in the rolls of fame?

Thy virtues, great Maecenas! shall be sung
 In praise of him, from whom those virtues sprung:
 While blooming wreaths around thy temples spread,
 45 I'll snatch a laurel from thine honored head, }
 While you indulgent smile upon the deed. }

As long as Thames in streams majestic flows,
 Or Naiads<sup>8</sup> in their oozy beds repose,
 While Phoebus<sup>o</sup> reigns above the starry train,
 50 While bright Aurora<sup>9</sup> purples o'er the main,
 So long, great Sir, the muse thy praise shall sing,
 So long thy praise shall make Parnassus<sup>1</sup> ring:
 Then grant, Maecenas, thy paternal rays,
 Hear me propitious,<sup>o</sup> and defend my lays.
 55

- Note 1: Maecenas (70–8 B.C.E.) was a patron of poets in classical Rome, celebrated at the beginning of poems by Horace and Virgil. Wheatley uses the classical name to praise a patron in her own time (possibly Selina Hastings, John Wheatley, the man who held her enslaved, or Mather Byles, a Boston minister and poet who was among those who testified to the authenticity of Wheatley’s poems).Return to reference 1

To the University of Cambridge, in New-England<sup>1</sup>

While an intrinsic ardor prompts to write,
The muses promise to assist my pen;
'Twas not long since I left my native shore
The land of errors, and Egyptian gloom:
5 Father of mercy, 'twas thy gracious hand
Brought me in safety from those dark abodes.

Students, to you 'tis giv'n to scan the heights
Above, to traverse the ethereal space,
And mark the systems of revolving worlds.
Still more, ye sons of science ye receive 10 The blissful news by messengers from heav'n,
How Jesus' blood for your redemption flows.
See him with hands out-stretcht upon the cross;
Immense compassion in his bosom glows;
He hears revilers,<sup>2</sup> nor resents their scorn:
15 What matchless mercy in the Son of God!
When the whole human race by sin had fall'n,
He deigned to die that they might rise again,<sup>3</sup>
And share with him in the sublimest skies,
Life without death, and glory without end.

Improve your privileges while they stay,
Ye pupils, and each hour redeem, that bears
Or good or bad report of you to heav'n.
Let sin, that baneful evil to the soul,
By you be shunned, nor once remit<sup>o</sup> your guard;
25 Suppress the deadly serpent in its egg.
Ye blooming plants of human race divine,

An Ethiop<sup>4</sup> tells you 'tis your greatest foe;
 Its transient sweetness turns to endless pain,
 And in immense perdition<sup>5</sup> sinks the soul.

On Being Brought from Africa to America

5 'Twas mercy brought me from my Pagan land,
Taught my benighted soul to understand
That there's a God, that there's a Savior too:
Once I redemption neither sought nor knew.

Thoughts on the Works of Providence<sup>1</sup>

Arise, my soul, on wings enraptured, rise
To praise the monarch of the earth and skies,
Whose goodness and beneficence appear
As round its center moves the rolling year,
Or when the morning glows with rosy charms,
5 Or the sun slumbers in the ocean's arms:
Of light divine be a rich portion lent
To guide my soul, and favor my intent.
Celestial muse, my arduous flight sustain,
And raise my mind to a seraphic<sup>o</sup> strain!

10 Adored for ever be the God unseen,
Which round the sun revolves this vast machine,
Though to his eye its mass a point appears:
Adored the God that whirls surrounding spheres,<sup>o</sup>
Which first ordained that mighty Sol<sup>o</sup> should reign
15 The peerless monarch of th' ethereal train:
Of miles twice forty millions<sup>2</sup> is his height,
And yet his radiance dazzles mortal sight
So far beneath—from him th' extended earth
Vigor derives, and ev'ry flow'ry birth:
20 Vast through her orb<sup>3</sup> she moves with easy grace
Around her Phoebus in unbounded space;
True to her course th' impetuous storm derides,<sup>4</sup>
Triumphant o'er the winds, and surging tides.

25 Almighty, in these wond'rous works of thine,
What Pow'r, what Wisdom, and what Goodness shine?
And are thy wonders, Lord, by men explored,
And yet creating glory unadored!

Creation smiles in various beauty gay,
While day to night, and night succeeds to day:
30 That Wisdom, which attends Jehovah's<sup>o</sup> ways,
Shines most conspicuous in the solar rays:
Without them, destitute of heat and light,
This world would be the reign of endless night:
35 In their excess how would our race<sup>5</sup> complain,
Abhorring life! how hate its length'ned chain!
From air adust<sup>6</sup> what num'rous ills would rise?
What dire contagion taint the burning skies?
What pestilential vapors, fraught with death,
40 Would rise, and overspread the lands beneath?

Hail, smiling morn, that from the orient<sup>7</sup> main Ascending dost adorn the heav'nly plain!
So rich, so various are thy beauteous dies,
That spread through all the circuit of the skies,
45 That, full of thee, my soul in rapture soars,
And thy great God, the cause of all adores.

O'er beings infinite his love extends,
His Wisdom rules them, and his Pow'r defends.
When tasks diurnal<sup>o</sup> tire the human frame,
The spirits faint, and dim the vital flame,
50 Then too that ever active bounty shines,
Which not infinity of space confines.
The sable veil, that Night in silence draws,
Conceals effects, but shows th' Almighty Cause;
Night seals in sleep the wide creation fair,
55 And all is peaceful but the brow of care.
Again, gay Phoebus, as the day before,
Wakes ev'ry eye, but what shall wake no more;
Again the face of nature is renewed,
Which still appears harmonious, fair, and good.
60 May grateful strains salute the smiling morn,
Before its beams the eastern hills adorn!

Shall day to day and night to night conspire
To show the goodness of the Almighty Sire?
This mental voice shall man regardless hear,
65 And never, never raise the filial pray'r?
To-day, O hearken, nor your folly mourn
For time misspent, that never will return.

But see the sons of vegetation<sup>8</sup> rise,
And spread their leafy banners to the skies.
70 All-wise Almighty Providence we trace
In trees, and plants, and all the flow'ry race;
As clear as in the nobler frame of man,
All lovely copies of the Maker's plan.
The pow'r the same that forms a ray of light,
75 That called creation from eternal night.
"Let there be light," he said:<sup>9</sup> from his profound<sup>1</sup>
Old Chaos heard, and trembled at the sound:
Swift as the word, inspir'd by pow'r divine,
Behold the light around its maker shine,
80 The first fair product of th' omnific<sup>2</sup> God,
And now through all his works diffused abroad.

As reason's pow'rs by day our God disclose,
So we may trace him in the night's repose:
Say what is sleep? and dreams how passing
85 strange!<sup>3</sup>

When action ceases, and ideas range
Licentious and unbounded o'er the plains,
Where Fancy's queen in giddy triumph reigns.
Hear in soft strains the dreaming lover sigh
To a kind fair, or rave in jealousy;
90 On pleasure now, and now on vengeance bent,
The lab'ring passions struggle for a vent.
What pow'r, O man! thy reason then restores,
So long suspended in nocturnal hours?

95      What secret hand returns the mental train,
And gives improved thine active pow'rs again?
From thee, O man, what gratitude should rise!
And, when from balmy sleep thou op'st thine eyes,
          Let thy first thoughts be praises to the skies. }
100      How merciful our God who thus imparts
O'erflowing tides of joy to human hearts,
When wants and woes might be our righteous lot,
Our God forgetting, by our God forgot!

          Among the mental pow'rs a question rose,
          "What most the image of th' Eternal shows?"
105      When thus to Reason (so let Fancy rove)
Her great companion spoke immortal Love.<sup>4</sup>

          "Say, mighty pow'r, how long shall strife prevail,
          And with its murmurs load the whisp'ring gale?
          Refer the cause to Recollection's shrine,
110      Who loud proclaims my origin divine,
The cause whence heav'n and earth began to be,
And is not man immortalized by me?
Reason let this most causeless strife subside."
115      Thus Love pronounced, and Reason thus replied.

          "Thy birth, celestial queen! 'tis mine to own,
          In thee resplendent is the Godhead shown;
          Thy words persuade, my soul enraptured feels Resistless beauty which thy smile reveals."
120      Ardent she spoke, and, kindling at her charms,
She clasped the blooming goddess in her arms.

          Infinite Love where'er we turn our eyes
          Appears: this ev'ry creature's wants supplies;
          This most is heard in Nature's constant voice,
          This makes the morn, and this the eve rejoice;

125 This bids the fost'ring rains and dew's descend
 To nourish all, to serve one gen'ral end,
 The good of man: yet man ungrateful pays
 But little homage, and but little praise.
 130 To him,<sup>o</sup> whose works arrayed with mercy shine,
 What songs should rise, how constant, how divine!

On Imagination

Thy various works, imperial queen,<sup>1</sup> we see,
How bright their forms! how decked with pomp by thee!

Thy wond'rous acts in beauteous order stand,
And all attest how potent is thine hand.

5      From Helicon's refulgent<sup>2</sup> heights attend,
Ye sacred choir, and my attempts befriend:
To tell her glories with a faithful tongue,
Ye blooming graces, triumph in my song.

10      Now here, now there, the roving Fancy<sup>3</sup> flies,
Till some loved object strikes her wand'ring eyes,
Whose silken fetters all the senses bind,
And soft captivity involves the mind.

15      Imagination! who can sing thy force?
Or who describe the swiftness of thy course?
Soaring through air to find the bright abode,
Th' empyreal<sup>4</sup> palace of the thund'ring God,
We on thy pinions<sup>o</sup> can surpass the wind,
And leave the rolling universe behind:
From star to star the mental optics rove,
Measure the skies, and range the realms above.
20      There in one view we grasp the mighty whole,
Or with new worlds amaze th' unbounded soul.

25      Though Winter frowns to Fancy's raptured eyes
The fields may flourish, and gay scenes arise;
The frozen deeps may break their iron bands,
And bid their waters murmur o'er the sands.

Fair Flora may resume her fragrant reign,
And with her flow'ry riches deck the plain;
Sylvanus<sup>5</sup> may diffuse his honors round,
And all the forest may with leaves be crowned:
30 Show'rs may descend, and dew's their gems disclose,
And nectar sparkle on the blooming rose.

Such is thy pow'r, nor are thine orders vain,
O thou the leader of the mental train:
35 In full perfection all thy works are wrought,
And thine the scepter o'er the realms of thought.
Before thy throne the subject-passions<sup>6</sup> bow,
Of subject-passions sov'reign ruler Thou;
At thy command joy rushes on the heart,
40 And through the glowing veins the spirits dart.

Fancy might now her silken pinions try
To rise from earth, and sweep th' expanse on high:
From Tithon's bed now might Aurora rise,<sup>7</sup>
Her cheeks all glowing with celestial dyes, 45 While a pure stream of light o'erflows the skies. }

The monarch of the day I might behold,
And all the mountains tipt with radiant gold,
But I reluctant leave the pleasing views,
Which Fancy dresses to delight the Muse;
50 Winter austere forbids me to aspire,
And northern tempests damp the rising fire;
They chill the tides of Fancy's flowing sea,
Cease then, my song, cease the unequal lay.

To the Right Honorable William, Earl of Dartmouth, His Majesty's Principal
Secretary of State for North America, &c<sup>1</sup>

Hail, happy day, when, smiling like the morn,
Fair Freedom rose New-England to adorn:
The northern clime beneath her genial ray,
Dartmouth, congratulates thy blissful sway:
5 Elate with hope her race no longer mourns,
Each soul expands, each grateful bosom burns,
While in thine hand with pleasure we behold
The silken reins, and Freedom's charms unfold.
Long lost to realms beneath the northern skies
10 She shines supreme, while hated faction dies:
Soon as appeared the Goddess long desir'd,
Sick at the view, she<sup>2</sup> languished and expir'd;
Thus from the splendors of the morning light
The owl in sadness seeks the caves of night.

15 No more, America, in mournful strain
Of wrongs, and grievance unredressed complain, }
No longer shalt thou dread the iron chain,
Which wanton Tyranny with lawless hand
Had made, and with it meant t' enslave the land.<sup>3</sup>

20 Should you, my lord, while you peruse my song,
Wonder from whence my love of Freedom sprung,
Whence flow these wishes for the common good,
By feeling hearts alone best understood,
I, young in life, by seeming cruel fate
Was snatched from Afric's fancied happy seat:

25      What pangs excruciating must molest,
           What sorrows labor in my parent's breast?
           Steeled was that soul and by no misery moved
           That from a father seized his babe below'd:
 30      Such, such my case. And can I then but pray
           Others may never feel tyrannic sway?

           For favors past, great Sir, our thanks are due,
           And thee we ask thy favors to renew,
           Since in thy pow'r, as in thy will before,
           To sooth the griefs, which thou did'st once deplore.
 35      May heav'nly grace the sacred sanction give
           To all thy works, and thou for ever live
           Not only on the wings of fleeting Fame,
           Though praise immortal crowns the patriot's name,
           But to conduct to heav'ns refulgent fane,<sup>o</sup>
 40      May fiery coursers<sup>o</sup> sweep th' ethereal plain,
           And bear thee upwards to that blest abode,
           Where, like the prophet,<sup>4</sup> thou shalt find thy God.

To S. M., a Young African Painter, on Seeing His Works<sup>1</sup>

To show the lab'ring bosom's deep intent,
And thought in living characters to paint,
When first thy pencil did those beauties give,
And breathing figures learnt from thee to live,
5 How did those prospects give my soul delight,
A new creation rushing on my sight?
Still, wond'rous youth! each noble path pursue,
On deathless glories fix thine ardent view:
Still may the painter's and the poet's fire
10 To aid thy pencil, and thy verse conspire!
And may the charms of each seraphic<sup>o</sup> theme
Conduct thy footsteps to immortal fame!
High to the blissful wonders of the skies
Elate thy soul, and raise thy wishful eyes.
Thrice happy, when exalted to survey
15 That splendid city, crowned with endless day,
Whose twice six gates on radiant hinges ring:
Celestial Salem<sup>2</sup> blooms in endless spring.

Calm and serene thy moments glide along,
And may the muse inspire each future song!
20 Still, with the sweets of contemplation blessed,
May peace with balmy wings your soul invest!<sup>3</sup>
But when these shades of time are chased away,
And darkness ends in everlasting day,
On what seraphic pinions shall we move,
25 And view the landscapes in the realms above?
There shall thy tongue in heav'nly murmurs flow,
And there my muse with heav'nly transport glow:

No more to tell of Damon's tender sighs,<sup>4</sup>
 Or rising radiance of Aurora's eyes,
 For nobler themes demand a nobler strain,
 And purer language on th' ethereal plain.
 Cease, gentle muse! the solemn gloom of night
 Now seals the fair creation from my sight.

Letter to Samson Occom<sup>1</sup>

Rev'd and honored Sir,

I have this day received your obliging kind epistle, and am greatly satisfied with your reasons respecting the Negroes, and think highly reasonable what you offer in vindication of their natural rights: Those that invade them cannot be insensible that the divine light is chasing away the thick darkness which broods over the land of Africa; and the Chaos which has reigned so long is converting into beautiful Order, and reveals more and more clearly the glorious dispensation of civil and religious liberty, which are so inseparably united, that there is little or no enjoyment of one without the other: Otherwise, perhaps, the Israelites had been less solicitous for their freedom from Egyptian slavery; I don't say they would have been contented without it, by no means, for in every human breast, God has implanted a principle, which we call love of freedom; it is impatient of oppression, and pants for deliverance; and by the leave of our modern Egyptians<sup>2</sup> I will assert, that the same principle lives in us. God grant deliverance in his own way and time, and get him honor upon all those whose avarice impels them to countenance and help forward the calamities of their fellow creatures. This I desire not for their hurt, but to convince them of the strange absurdity of their conduct whose words and actions are so diametrically opposite. How well the cry for liberty and the reverse disposition for the exercise of oppressive power over others agree—I humbly think it does not require the penetration of a philosopher to determine.

Sentiment

The connection between literature and the emotions has been a focus of critical attention since ancient times. Aristotle's Poetics (ca. 330 B.C.E.), for instance, says that the aim of tragedy is to arouse pity and fear. And religious and moral writing has always been intent on the passions, though their influence has usually been seen as negative. (Five of the Seven Deadly Sins, including Greed and Envy, are passions.) But a profound reevaluation of the social meaning and power of feeling developed in Britain in the eighteenth century. Changes in practices of material culture helped drive this transformation. The massive growth of Britain's commercial wealth in the period depended on ever more encounters between strangers—buyers and sellers, retailers and consumers, travelers and locals—in big cities (especially, of course, London), stock exchanges and shops, and public places like coffeehouses, parks, and assemblies. And this gave cultural commentators a reason to stress the pleasing emotions arising from commerce, a term used to signify both sociable and financial exchange. The English philosopher Anthony Ashley Cooper, third Earl of Shaftesbury (1671–1713), remarked in 1709 that in a civil society, “we polish one another, and rub off our Corners and rough Sides by a sort of amicable Collision”; people coming together socially reveal and refine their naturally warm feelings toward each other. The Anglo-Dutch physician and philosopher Bernard Mandeville (1670–1733) retorted gleefully that greed, pride, and selfishness make a society thrive, not amicability or politeness. Either way, the passions had a new, crucial role to play: they made a nation prosperous and happy. The debate engaged other notable thinkers, including the Irish-Scottish philosopher Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746), who took Shaftesbury's side, arguing that God had implanted naturally benevolent feelings in all of us toward each other. Some began to insist that we own up to the fact that feelings are our sole source of energy and motivation:

"reason is, and ought only to be the slave of the passions, and can never pretend to any other office than to serve and obey them," declared David Hume (see below). Finally Hutcheson's student and Hume's friend Adam Smith would unite the period's dual emphases on feelings and commercial activity to help lay the ideological foundations of the modern age: in The Wealth of Nations (1776), he argued that a nation prospered not by following moral rules and rational planning but by allowing free play to "the private interests and passions of individuals."

Literature invested in the new prestige of feelings. This created not only a new kind of content but also a new relationship between literary works and readers. One of the most influential novelists of the age, Samuel Richardson (1689–1761), wrote epistolary novels because letters supposedly written by the principal characters immersed readers in their emotional states more directly and immediately than a detached narration would. Samuel Johnson remarked, "if you were to read Richardson for the story, your impatience would be so much fretted that you would hang yourself. But you must read him for the sentiment, and consider the story as only giving occasion to the sentiment." Johnson and others use the term sentiment to identify a kind of feeling that affects thinking: as the Scottish critic and philosopher Henry Home, Lord Kames (1696–1782) puts it, "every thought prompted by passion is termed a sentiment." And the idea that plot could be almost entirely subordinated to the display of sentiment furnished fiction with a new motive, especially after the mid-eighteenth century. The works of Laurence Sterne, including Tristram Shandy (1759–67) and A Sentimental Journey through France and Italy (1768), attained their high points in emotional episodes that would have been too insignificant for earlier fiction. In Tristram, Uncle Toby's refusal to kill a fly solicits the reader's own tenderness, and a chance encounter between Yorick, protagonist of A Sentimental Journey, and a passing monk leads to a sentimental exchange of their snuffboxes and a flood of tears. In The Man of Feeling (1771) by the Scottish writer Henry Mackenzie (see below), the tears flow so regularly, in incident after incident, that they seem almost like a programmed response. The multitude of fictions after 1770 subtitled "A Sentimental Novel" promised to fulfill readers' expectations—to cry, feel their protagonists' sorrows, and sigh at the injustice of the world. Sentimentalism established itself in literature by promoting a set of recognizable emotional protocols and roles, which could be taken up by readers in the real world. But sentimental works also often pressed against their own conventions. Sterne enjoys the ironies as well as the affecting powers of his sentimental performances, and poets like Ann Yearsley (see below) recognize how the codes of sentiment could falsify as well as heighten her naturally strong feelings.

One region of culture over which sentiment exercised a profound and sometimes surprising influence was gender. Women's emotional susceptibility had long been seen as a given, and the era of sentiment exaggerated this purported aspect of feminine character yet more. "Great sensibility of taste is generally accompanied by lively passions," remarked the Scottish philosopher Alexander Gerard in 1759; "women have always been considered as possessing both in a more eminent degree than men." Women sometimes resisted this imperative, as Frances Greville does in her poem "A Prayer for Indifference" (see below). And though women poets after midcentury were often expected to produce poems addressed to Sentiment or to Sensibility—that aspect of the personality endowed with taste and prone to be affected by evocative situations and objects—they used them as opportunities to define and assert their own emotions. The culture of sentiment stretched expectations about men further. Sentimental men were expected to weep. Masculinity could include sympathy for the suffering of others, delicately emotional friendships between men, and a passion for sentimental literature, which men consumed at least as much as women. In many ways, the man of feeling was a kind of fantasy. Harley, the protagonist of Mackenzie's novel, is presented as an exceptional case, unlike other men. But the novel also includes framing devices to show how rougher, less emotionally susceptible men may be touched by Harley's sensitivity in spite of themselves.

In literature and life, sentiment almost always entails a social situation, one person's encounter with some other being, a person or animal, or even an object imaginatively imbued with sentience. (Individuals rarely get sentimental all by themselves.) In his first book, The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759; see below), Adam Smith called the mechanism whereby people share their feelings "sympathy": our imaginations create in us, however imperfectly, versions of the feelings of someone else. We can sympathize with nearly any exhibited emotion, but Smith recognized that pain and suffering were especially powerful sympathetic objects. Scenes in prisons or hospitals, figures afflicted by poverty, oppression, or abuse, dogs or jackasses mistreated by hard-hearted owners recur in sentimental literature, which hence discovers a natural tendency to reflect on social cruelties and injustices. The exchange of letters in 1766 between the formerly enslaved man Ignatius Sancho and Sterne (see below) helped establish a sentimental strand in the literature of the abolitionist movement in Britain, a strand taken up by numerous writers appalled by the trade in enslaved people: White writers imagined what it felt like to be enslaved, torn from loved ones in Africa, abused in a British sugar colony.

But many have noted the limitations of sympathy as a political force. In the wake of his exchange with Sancho, Sterne finds that sentiment works best when directed at just one other person—he says the thought of multitudes of enslaved Africans "did but distract me." Often sentimental feeling can be an end in itself, so absorbing that it blocks people from trying to do anything about the pain with which they sympathize. Reflecting on slavery and injustice in her Vindication of the Rights of Men (1790), Mary Wollstonecraft bitterly brushes aside a merely sentimental response: "such misery demands more than tears." Sympathy could seem like a kind of emotional vampirism, always on the hunt for sentimental stimulation from suffering people. Still, for many who understood and presented themselves as people of feeling, such as Sancho himself, and Olaudah Equiano (see p. 1081), sentimental discourse was not a dead end but an opening door. A feeling for others' suffering may lead to feeling a commitment to relieve it. Though always very personal in motive and effect, sentiment as defined in the period nonetheless builds the feelings of others into our sense of ourselves and finds its purpose in closing distances between people.

DAVID HUME

The boldness and radical intent of the thought of David Hume (1711–1776), the Scottish philosopher, essayist, and historian, could scarcely appear in a stronger light than in the following selection from his first book, A Treatise of Human Nature (1739–40). The Treatise is a work full of groundbreaking arguments: it questions what we can know about the relation of causes to effects, undermines commonsense notions of personal identity, and insists that the language of facts and the language of moral obligation are entirely distinct. This section dismisses a long philosophical tradition that had identified the passions as the chief enemies of moral life and recruited reason to block their influence and motivate good actions. For Hume, passions are always our sole motivations, moral or otherwise. Though Hume's argumentation here is intricate and rich in implication, his principal contention can be clearly drawn. Reason can identify what is true or false in our abstract ideas (by analyzing relations between them) or in our beliefs about the world (by assessing our experience of it). But such facts are in themselves inert. They do not matter to us unless our passion is already engaged in some situation to which they are relevant. Being told that  $2 + 2 = 4$  will not motivate us to do anything—unless greed, for instance, has already excited us about a scheme to double our money. A passion, in Hume's terminology, is an "original influence": unlike the conclusions of reason, a passion cannot be true or false—it just is—and while reason may help a passion attain its end, or lead it astray, it cannot demonstrate that any passion is somehow “untrue.” “’Tis not contrary to reason,” Hume declares, “to prefer the destruction of the whole world to the scratching of my finger.” A flair for dramatic utterances like this one enlivens Hume’s prose, as he suddenly reveals how far his methodical thinking has led. But while Hume discovers a more complete power in passions over our motives, perhaps, than had ever been asserted before, he does not abandon us to a moral life governed by wildly passionate whims. At the section’s end, he maintains that morality is a contest not between reason and passion but between “calm passions” and violent ones, the former moderating, the latter out of control. The Treatise initially did not exercise much influence on discussions of morality in common life or philosophical discourse, and Hume would later repackage many of its arguments and observations in elegant, more accessible essays and enquiries. But its philosophically rigorous account of the passions’ motivational power anticipates a general impulse in British culture after midcentury: to recognize the basis of our moral lives in feelings.

From A Treatise of Human Nature

Book 2, Part 3, Section 3. Of the Influencing Motives of the Will

Nothing is more usual in philosophy, and even in common life, than to talk of the combat of passion and reason, to give the preference to reason, and assert that men are only so far virtuous as they conform themselves to its dictates.<sup>1</sup> Every rational creature, 'tis said, is obliged to regulate his actions by reason; and if any other motive or principle challenge the direction of his conduct, he ought to oppose it, till it be entirely subdued, or at least brought to a conformity with that superior principle. On this method of thinking, the greatest part of moral philosophy, ancient and modern, seems to be founded; nor is there an ampler field, as well for metaphysical arguments, as popular declamations, than this supposed preeminence of reason above passion. The eternity, invariableness, and divine origin of the former have been displayed to the best advantage; the blindness, unconstancy, and deceitfulness of the latter have been as strongly insisted on. In order to show the fallacy of all this philosophy, I shall endeavor to prove first, that reason alone can never be a motive to any action of the will; and secondly, that it can never oppose passion in the direction of the will.

The understanding<sup>2</sup> exerts itself after two different ways, as it judges from demonstration or probability; as it regards the abstract relations of our ideas, or those relations of objects of which experience only gives us information. I believe it scarce will be asserted that the first species of reasoning alone is ever the cause of any action. As its proper province is the world of ideas, and as the will always places us in that of realities, demonstration and volition seem, upon that account, to be totally removed from each other. Mathematics, indeed, are useful in all mechanical operations, and arithmetic in almost every art and profession: But 'tis not of themselves they have any influence. Mechanics are the art of regulating the motions of bodies to some designed end or purpose; and the reason why we employ arithmetic in fixing the proportions of numbers is only that we may discover the proportions of their influence and operation. A merchant is desirous of knowing the sum total of his accounts with any person. Why? but that he may learn what sum will have the same effects in paying his debt, and going to market, as all the particular articles taken together.<sup>3</sup> Abstract or demonstrative reasoning, therefore, never influences any of our actions, but only as it directs our judgment concerning causes and effects; which leads us to the second operation of the understanding.

'Tis obvious that when we have the prospect of pain or pleasure from any object, we feel a consequent emotion of aversion or propensity, and are carried to avoid or embrace what will give us this uneasiness or satisfaction. 'Tis also obvious, that this emotion rests not here, but making us cast our view on every side, comprehends whatever objects are connected with its original one by the relation of cause and effect. Here then reasoning takes place to discover this relation; and according as our reasoning varies, our actions receive a subsequent variation. But 'tis evident in this case that the impulse arises not from reason, but is only directed by it. 'Tis from the prospect of pain or pleasure that the aversion or propensity arises towards any object. And these emotions extend themselves to the causes and effects of that object, as they are pointed out to us by reason and experience. It can never in the least concern us to know that such objects are causes, and such others effects, if both the causes and effects be indifferent to us. Where the objects themselves do not affect us, their connexion can never give them any influence; and 'tis plain, that as reason is nothing but the discovery of this connexion, it cannot be by its means that the objects are able to affect us.

Since reason alone can never produce any action, or give rise to volition, I infer, that the same faculty is as incapable of preventing volition, or of disputing the preference with any passion or emotion. This consequence is necessary. 'Tis impossible reason could have the latter effect of preventing volition, but by giving an impulse in a contrary direction to our passion; and that impulse, had it operated alone, would have been able to produce volition. Nothing can oppose or retard the impulse of passion, but a contrary impulse; and if this contrary impulse ever arises from reason, that latter faculty must have an original influence on the will, and must be able to cause, as well as hinder any act of volition. But if reason has no original influence, 'tis impossible it can withstand any principle which has such an efficacy, or ever keep the mind in suspense a moment. Thus it appears that the principle which opposes our passion cannot be the same with reason, and is only called so in an improper sense. We speak not strictly and philosophically when we talk of the combat of passion and of reason. Reason is, and ought only to be the slave of the passions, and can never pretend to any other office than to serve and obey them. As this opinion may appear somewhat extraordinary, it may not be improper to confirm it by some other considerations.

A passion is an original existence, or, if you will, modification of existence,<sup>4</sup> and contains not any representative quality, which renders it a copy of any other existence or modification. When I am angry, I am actually possessed with the passion, and in that emotion have no more a reference to any other object, than when I am thirsty, or sick, or more than five foot high. 'Tis impossible, therefore, that this passion can be opposed by or be contradictory to truth and reason; since this contradiction consists in the disagreement of ideas, considered as copies, with those objects, which they represent.

What may at first occur on this head is that as nothing can be contrary to truth or reason except what has a reference to it, and as the judgments of our understanding only have this reference, it must follow, that passions can be contrary to reason only so far as they are accompanied with some judgment or opinion. According to this principle, which is so obvious and natural, 'tis only in two senses that any affection can be called unreasonable. First, when a passion, such as hope or fear, grief or joy, despair or security, is founded on the supposition or the existence of objects, which really do not exist. Secondly, when in exerting any passion in action, we choose means insufficient for the designed end, and deceive ourselves in our judgment of causes and effects. Where a passion is neither founded on false suppositions, nor chooses means insufficient for the end, the understanding can neither justify nor condemn it. 'Tis not contrary to reason to prefer the destruction of the whole world to the scratching of my finger. 'Tis not contrary to reason for me to choose my total ruin, to prevent the least uneasiness of an Indian or person wholly unknown to me. 'Tis as little contrary to reason to prefer even my own acknowledged lesser good to my greater, and have a more ardent affection for the former than the latter. A trivial good may, from certain circumstances, produce a desire superior to what arises from the greatest and most valuable enjoyment; nor is there anything more extraordinary in this, than in mechanics to see one pound weight raise up a hundred by the advantage of its situation.<sup>5</sup> In short, a passion must be accompanied with some false judgment in order to its being unreasonable; and even then 'tis not the passion, properly speaking, which is unreasonable, but the judgment.

The consequences are evident. Since a passion can never, in any sense, be called unreasonable, but when founded on a false supposition or when it chooses means insufficient for the designed end, 'tis impossible that reason and passion can ever oppose each other, or dispute for the government of the will and actions. The moment we perceive the falsehood of any supposition, or the insufficiency of any means, our passions yield to our reason without any opposition. I may desire any fruit as of an excellent relish; but whenever you convince me of my mistake, my longing ceases. I may will the performance of certain actions as means of obtaining any desired good; but as my willing of these actions is only secondary, and founded on the supposition that they are causes of the proposed effect; as soon as I discover the falsehood of that supposition, they must become indifferent to me.

'Tis natural for one that does not examine objects with a strict philosophic eye, to imagine that those actions of the mind are entirely the same, which produce not a different sensation, and are not immediately distinguishable to the feeling and perception.

Reason, for instance, exerts itself without producing any sensible emotion; and except in the more sublime disquisitions of philosophy, or in the frivolous subtilties of the schools,<sup>6</sup> scarce ever conveys any pleasure or uneasiness. Hence it proceeds that every action of the mind which operates with the same calmness and tranquility is confounded with reason by all those who judge of things from the first view and appearance. Now 'tis certain there are certain calm desires and tendencies, which, though they be real passions, produce little emotion in the mind, and are more known by their effects than by the immediate feeling or sensation. These desires are of two kinds; either certain instincts originally implanted in our natures, such as benevolence and resentment, the love of life, and kindness to children; or the general appetite to good, and aversion to evil, considered merely as such. When any of these passions are calm, and cause no disorder in the soul, they are very readily taken for the determinations of reason, and are supposed to proceed from the same faculty, with that which judges of truth and falsehood. Their nature and principles have been supposed the same, because their sensations are not evidently different.

Beside these calm passions, which often determine the will, there are certain violent emotions of the same kind, which have likewise a great influence on that faculty. When I receive any injury from another, I often feel a violent passion of resentment, which makes me desire his evil and punishment, independent of all considerations of pleasure and advantage to myself. When I am immediately threatened with any grievous ill, my fears, apprehensions, and aversions rise to a great height, and produce a sensible<sup>7</sup> emotion.

The common error of metaphysicians has lain in ascribing the direction of the will entirely to one of these principles,<sup>8</sup> and supposing the other to have no influence. Men often act knowingly against their interest; for which reason the view of the greatest possible good does not always influence them. Men often counteract a violent passion in prosecution of their interests and designs; 'tis not therefore the present uneasiness alone which determines them. In general we may observe, that both these principles operate on the will; and where they are contrary, that either of them prevails, according to the general character or present disposition of the person. What we call strength of mind implies the prevalence of the calm passions above the violent; though we may easily observe, there is no man so constantly possessed of this virtue, as never on any occasion to yield to the solicitations of passion and desire. From these variations of temper proceeds the great difficulty of deciding concerning the actions and resolutions of men, where there is any contrariety of motives and passions.

ADAM SMITH

The Scottish philosopher, professor, and political economist Adam Smith (1723–1790) wrote two landmark works in the history of thought, The Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759) and The Wealth of Nations (1776). The latter stands as the principal founding document of classical economics, while the former offers the richest, most evocative account in eighteenth-century British philosophy of the role of feelings in our moral lives. In the Theory, Smith draws inspiration from other major figures of the Scottish Enlightenment, notably his teacher at the University of Glasgow, Francis Hutcheson (1694–1746), and his elder friend David Hume, by whom his thinking was especially influenced. But his work stands out for its attention to the origins of moral sentiments in social relationships, illustrated with psychologically complex examples. The first chapter of The Theory of Moral Sentiments, “Of Sympathy,” establishes this emphasis: our feelings, according to Smith, materialize in a kind of dialogue with those of others. By sympathy, Smith means something more than commiseration with sadness or pain: sympathy springs from our instinctive capacity to imagine what someone else is feeling—suffering, joy, triumph, anxiety, anything—and produce a version of that feeling in ourselves. Part of the interest of such sympathetic imagination arises from its imperfection. Smith begins by acknowledging the truism that we can never really feel what someone else feels. Sympathy helps us cross this gulf, and often recreates what is felt by others uncannily well. But sometimes it leads us to feel things that another person ought to feel but does not; sometimes it simply fails to connect with particular emotions displayed by others, like rage; and sometimes it mimics feelings imputed to those, like the dead, who can feel nothing at all. The flexibility and subtlety of sympathy in the Theory make it particularly useful for thinking about literature. Smith directly refers to tragedy and prose fiction to substantiate his account. Sympathetic literary emotions are mirrorings, again, of feelings that do not really exist (feigned by actors or made up by authors). Especially pertinent to literature is Smith's idea of a sentiment's "situation": for another person's feeling to affect us properly, we need to know the story behind it. In the years after Smith's theory appeared, as authors increasingly put strong feeling at the center of literature, they also developed new ways to situate it, using embedded frame stories, suggestive fragments of prose, or intimate depictions of domestic life to bring what others feel, as Smith says, "home to ourselves."

From The Theory of Moral Sentiments

Of Sympathy

How selfish soever man may be supposed, there are evidently some principles in his nature which interest him in the fortune of others, and render their happiness necessary to him, though he derives nothing from it except the pleasure of seeing it. Of this kind is pity or compassion, the emotion which we feel for the misery of others, when we either see it, or are made to conceive it in a very lively manner. That we often derive sorrow from the sorrow of others is too obvious to require any instances to prove it; for this sentiment, like all the other original passions of human nature, is by no means confined to the virtuous and humane, though they perhaps may feel it with the most exquisite sensibility. The greatest ruffian, the most hardened violator of the laws of society, is not altogether without it.

As we have no immediate experience of what other men feel, we can form no idea of the manner in which they are affected, but by conceiving what we ourselves should feel in the like situation.

Though our brother is upon the rack,<sup>1</sup> as long as we are at our ease, our senses will never inform us of what he suffers. They never did and never can carry us beyond our own person,<sup>2</sup> and it is by the imagination only that we can form any conception of what are his sensations. Neither can that faculty help us to this any other way, than by representing to us what would be our own if we were in his case. It is the impressions of our own senses only, not those of his, which our imaginations copy. By the imagination we place ourselves in his situation, we conceive ourselves enduring all the same torments, we enter as it were into his body and become in some measure him, and thence form some idea of his sensations, and even feel something which, though weaker in degree, is not altogether unlike them. His agonies, when they are thus brought home to ourselves, when we have thus adopted and made them our own, begin at last to affect us, and we then tremble and shudder at the thought of what he feels. For as to be in pain or distress of any kind excites the most excessive sorrow, so to conceive or to imagine that we are in it, excites some degree of the same emotion, in proportion to the vivacity or dullness of the conception.

That this is the source of our fellow-feeling for the misery of others, that it is by changing places in fancy<sup>3</sup> with the sufferer, that we come either to conceive or to be affected by what he feels, may be demonstrated by many obvious observations, if it should not be thought sufficiently evident of itself. When we see a stroke aimed and just ready to fall upon the leg or arm of another person, we naturally shrink and draw back our own leg or our own arm; and when it does fall, we feel it in some measure, and are hurt by it as well as the sufferer. The mob,<sup>4</sup> when they are gazing at a dancer on the slack rope, naturally writhe and twist and balance their own bodies as they see him do, and as they feel that they themselves must do in his situation. Persons of delicate fibers<sup>5</sup> and a weak constitution of body complain, that in looking on the sores and ulcers that are exposed by beggars in the streets, they are apt to feel an itching or uneasy sensation in the corresponding part of their own bodies. The horror which they conceive at the misery of those wretches affects that particular part in themselves more than any other; because that horror arises from conceiving what they themselves would suffer, if they really were the wretches whom they are looking upon, and if that particular part in themselves was actually affected in the same miserable manner. The very force of this conception is sufficient, in their feeble frames, to produce that itching or uneasy sensation complained of. Men of the most robust make observe that in looking upon sore eyes they often feel a very sensible soreness in their own, which proceeds from the same reason; that organ being in the strongest man more delicate than any other part of the body is in the weakest.

Neither is it those circumstances only which create pain or sorrow that call forth our fellow-feeling. Whatever is the passion which arises from any object in the person principally concerned, an analogous emotion springs up, at the thought of his situation, in the breast of every attentive spectator. Our joy for the deliverance of those heroes of tragedy or romance<sup>6</sup> who interest us is as sincere as our grief for their distress, and our fellow-feeling with their misery is not more real than that with their happiness. We enter into their gratitude towards those faithful friends who did not desert them in their difficulties; and we heartily go along with their resentment against those perfidious traitors who injured, abandoned, or deceived them. In every passion of which the mind of man is susceptible, the emotions of the bystander always correspond to what, by bringing the case home to himself, he imagines should be the sentiments of the sufferer.

Pity and compassion are words appropriated to signify our fellow-feeling with the sorrow of others. Sympathy, though its meaning was perhaps originally the same, may now, however, without much impropriety, be made use of to denote our fellow-feeling with any passion whatever.

Upon some occasions sympathy may seem to arise merely from the view of a certain emotion in another person. The passions, upon some occasions, may seem to be transfused from one man to another, instantaneously, and antecedent to any knowledge of what excited them in the person principally concerned. Grief and joy, for example, strongly expressed in the look and gestures of any one, at once affect the spectator with some degree of a like painful or agreeable emotion. A smiling face is, to everybody that sees it, a cheerful object; as a sorrowful countenance, on the other hand, is a melancholy one.

This, however, does not hold universally, or with regard to every passion. There are some passions of which the expressions excite no sort of sympathy, but before we are acquainted with what gave occasion to them, serve rather to disgust and provoke us against them. The furious behavior of an angry man is more likely to exasperate us against himself than against his enemies. As we are unacquainted with his provocation, we cannot bring his case home to ourselves, nor conceive anything like the passions which it excites. But we plainly see what is the situation of those with whom he is angry, and to what violence they may be exposed from so enraged an adversary. We readily, therefore, sympathize with their fear or resentment, and are immediately disposed to take party<sup>7</sup> against the man from whom they appear to be in danger.

If the very appearances of grief and joy inspire us with some degree of the like emotions, it is because they suggest to us the general idea of some good or bad fortune that has befallen the person in whom we observe them: and in these passions this is sufficient to have some little influence upon us. The effects of grief and joy terminate in the person who feels those emotions, of which the expressions do not, like those of resentment, suggest to us the idea of any other person for whom we are concerned, and whose interests are opposite to his. The general idea of good or bad fortune, therefore, creates some concern for the person who has met with it, but the general idea of provocation excites no sympathy with the anger of the man who has received it. Nature, it seems, teaches us to be more averse to enter into this passion, and, till informed of its cause, to be disposed rather to take part against it.

Even our sympathy with the grief or joy of another, before we are informed of the cause of either, is always extremely imperfect. General lamentations, which express nothing but the anguish of the sufferer, create rather a curiosity to enquire into his situation, along with some disposition to sympathize with him, than any actual sympathy that is very sensible.<sup>8</sup> The first question which we ask is, "What has befallen you?" Till this be answered, though we are uneasy both from the vague idea of his misfortune, and still more from torturing ourselves with conjectures about what it may be, yet our fellow-feeling is not very considerable.

Sympathy, therefore, does not arise so much from the view of the passion as from that of the situation which excites it. We sometimes feel for another a passion of which he himself seems to be altogether incapable; because when we put ourselves in his case, that passion arises in our breast from the imagination, though it does not in his from the reality. We blush for the impudence and rudeness of another, though he himself appears to have no sense of the impropriety of his own behavior; because we cannot help feeling with what confusion we ourselves should be covered, had we behaved in so absurd a manner.

Of all the calamities to which the condition of mortality exposes mankind, the loss of reason<sup>9</sup> appears, to those who have the least spark of humanity, by far the most dreadful, and they behold that last stage of human wretchedness with deeper commiseration than any other. But the poor wretch who is in it laughs and sings, perhaps, and is altogether insensible of his own misery. The anguish which humanity feels, therefore, at the sight of such an object, cannot be the reflection of any sentiment of the sufferer. The compassion of the spectator must arise altogether from the consideration of what he himself would feel if he was reduced to the same unhappy situation, and, what perhaps is impossible, was at the same time able to regard it with his present reason and judgment.

What are the pangs of a mother, when she hears the moanings of her infant that during the agony of disease cannot express what it feels? In her idea of what it suffers, she joins to its real helplessness her own consciousness of that helplessness, and her own terrors for the unknown consequences of its disorder; and out of all these, forms, for her own sorrow, the most complete image of misery and distress. The infant, however, feels only the uneasiness of the present instant, which can never be great. With regard to the future it is perfectly secure, and in its thoughtlessness and want of foresight possesses an antidote against fear and anxiety, the great tormentors of the human breast, from which reason and philosophy will in vain attempt to defend it when it grows up to a man.

We sympathize even with the dead, and overlooking what is of real importance in their situation, that awful<sup>1</sup> futurity which awaits them, we are chiefly affected by those circumstances which strike our senses, but can have no influence upon their happiness. It is miserable, we think, to be deprived of the light of the sun; to be shut out from life and conversation; to be laid in the cold grave a prey to corruption and the reptiles of the earth; to be no more thought of in this world, but to be obliterated, in a little time, from the affections and almost from the memory of their dearest friends and relations. Surely, we imagine, we can never feel too much for those who have suffered so dreadful a calamity. The tribute of our fellow-feeling seems doubly due to them now when they are in danger of being forgot by everybody; and by the vain honors which we pay to their memory, we endeavor, for our own misery, artificially to keep alive our melancholy remembrance of their misfortune. That our sympathy can afford them no consolation seems to be an addition to their calamity; and to think that all we can do is unavailing, and that, what alleviates all other distress, the regret, the love, and the lamentation of their friends, can yield no comfort to them, serves only to exasperate our sense of their misery. The happiness of the dead, however, most assuredly is affected by none of these circumstances; nor is it the thought of these things which can ever disturb the security of their repose. The idea of that dreary and endless melancholy, which the fancy naturally ascribes to their condition, arises altogether from our joining to the change which has been produced upon them our own consciousness of that change; from our putting ourselves in their situation, and from our lodging, if I may be allowed to say so, our own living souls in their inanimated bodies, and thence conceiving what would be our emotions in this case. It is from this very illusion of the imagination which renders the foresight of our own dissolution so terrible to us, and the idea of those circumstances, which undoubtedly can give us no pain when we are dead, makes us miserable while we are alive. And from thence arises one of the most important principles in human nature, the dread of death, the great poison to the happiness, but the great restraint upon the injustice of mankind, which, while it afflicts and mortifies the individual, guards and protects the society.

FRANCES GREVILLE

Moving in the loftiest social circles, the poet Frances Greville (ca. 1727–1789), born Frances Macartney, was famous in her time for being a fashionable “beauty” and highly regarded for her witty, intellectually commanding conversation. Her poetry mostly consisted of clever verses about high society, intended to be ephemeral. But her poem “A Prayer for Indifference” captured the imagination of her age. It was likely written around 1756 and widely circulated in manuscript, then was published in various slightly different versions in compilations and anthologies through the 1760s and beyond. It has been called the most celebrated poem by a British woman in the second half of the eighteenth century. Her husband seemed to resent any public attention she gained, and their marriage went from bad to disastrous, ending by 1788 in a legal separation after he had lost all his own money and tried to lay hold of hers. Greville’s famous poem testifies to the power of sentimental feeling by its strenuous attempt to reject it. She asks for the protection of Indifference, personified as a nymph who will prevent her from feeling too much, and others from feeling too much for her. The poem was often printed with rejoinders, largely forgotten, from other poets praising sensibility, but Greville’s “Prayer” remains memorable for the intensity with which she renders the feelings she yearns to escape.

A Prayer for Indifference

Oft I've implored the gods in vain,
And prayed till I've been weary;
For once I'll try my wish to gain
Of Oberon,<sup>1</sup> the fairy.

5 Sweet airy being, wanton sprite,<sup>o</sup>
That liv'st in woods unseen,
And oft, by Cynthia's silver light,<sup>2</sup>
Tripst<sup>o</sup> gaily o'er the green;

If ere thy pitying heart was moved
(As ancient stories tell)
10 And for th'Athenian maid who loved,
Thou soughtst a wondrous spell,<sup>3</sup>

O! deign once more t'exert thy power;
Haply some herb, or tree,
15 Sovereign as juice from western flower,<sup>4</sup>
Conceals a balm for me.

I ask no kind return of love,
No tempting charm to please;
Far from the heart such gifts remove,
20 That sighs for peace and ease.

Nor ease, nor peace, the heart can know,
That, like the needle true,<sup>5</sup>
Turns at the touch of joy or woe,
But turning trembles too.

25 Far as distress the soul can wound,

'Tis pain in each degree;<sup>o</sup>
Bliss goes but to a certain bound;<sup>o</sup>
Beyond is agony.

30 Then take this treacherous sense of mind,<sup>6</sup>
Which dooms me still to smart;<sup>o</sup>
Which pleasure can to pain refine,
To pain new pangs impart.

35 O! haste to shed the sovereign balm,
My shattered nerves new-string,
And for my guest, serenely calm,
The nymph Indifference bring.

40 At her approach, see Hope, see Fear,
See Expectation fly,<sup>o</sup>
With Disappointment in the rear,
That blasts the promised joy.

The tears which Pity taught to flow
My eyes shall then disown;
The heart that throbbed at others' woe
Shall then scarce feel its own.

45 The wounds which now each moment bleed,
Each moment then shall close,
And peaceful days shall still succeed
To nights of calm repose.

50 O fairy elf, but grant me this,
This one kind comfort send,
And so may never-fading bliss
Thy flowery paths attend!

So may the glow-worm's glimmering light
Thy tiny footsteps lead
To some new region of delight,

55                   Unknown to mortal tread;
And be thy acorn goblets filled
                  With heaven's ambrosial<sup>2</sup> dew,
From sweetest freshest flowers distilled,
60                   That shed fresh sweets for you.
And what of life remains for me
                  I'll pass in sober ease,
Half pleased, contented will I be;
                  Contented, half to please.

IGNATIUS SANCHO

The remarkable life of Ignatius Sancho (ca. 1729–1780) began aboard an enslaver's ship, on which he was born in the midst of the Middle Passage. After he and his parents reached New Grenada, a vast Spanish colony in northern South America, his mother died of disease, and his father "defeated the miseries of slavery by suicide" (in the words of the early biography that originally introduced Sancho's Letters). Baptized as Ignatius by a Spanish bishop, Sancho was later taken, as a two-year-old, to Britain, where he was held enslaved by three unmarried sisters in Greenwich, who named him Sancho (after Don Quixote's squire) and refused to educate him. But as a child, he met John, second Duke of Montagu (1690–1749), who sponsored his education and to whose estate in Blackheath he escaped, at around age twenty, shortly after the duke's death. Sancho's initial rejection by the widowed duchess nearly drove him to despair, but she soon took him on as butler, a free and paid servant, to the household. Thereafter his relation to the Montagu family became a source of stability and support in his life: the duchess bequeathed an annuity of £30 to him at her death, and the next duke, her son George, took him on as his valet; and after ill health made it impossible for Sancho to continue in service, the Montagu family helped set him up as owner of a grocery store in London, in 1774. He shared this enterprise with his wife Anne (1733–1817), whom he had married in 1758; his first biographer describes her as "a very deserving young woman of West-Indian origin." The couple had seven children, four of whom lived to adulthood. Sancho's life in London was that of a highly cultured and accomplished man. He composed and published a substantial body of music, including minuets, cotillons, country dances, and songs, many of which have been recorded and can be heard online today. (His early biography also mentions a "Theory of Music" that he published, but which is now lost.) His love of theater led him to write two plays (both also lost) and form friendships with eminent actors, including David Garrick and John Henderson; his friends also included many painters, professional and amateur, on whose work he would offer his judgment. He is said to be the first Black Briton to vote in parliamentary elections (1774 and 1780), a right secured by his status as an independent business owner and householder. When he died in 1780, of complications of gout and other ailments, he left behind a group of friends—writers, painters, and other artists, and people of every social station from servants to the nobility—who looked to him for guidance and sympathetic, playful, and critically minded friendship.

His fame as a writer had its beginnings in a letter he wrote in 1766 to the celebrated novelist Laurence Sterne, deploring the treatment of enslaved Africans in Britain's colonies and urging Sterne to advocate for them in print. Sterne's reply became an important text for the nascent British abolitionist movement when it was published, along with Sancho's letter, in his posthumous 1775 Letters. Sancho's own body of correspondence, published as Letters of the Late Ignatius Sancho, an African (2 volumes, 1782), also appeared after his death. Many of his stylistic gestures were influenced by his literary hero Sterne, such as a copious use of long dashes. The letters' thematic elements—such as a sympathetic connection to animals, and displays of benevolent feeling that extends far beyond the Christian world—also connect them to the larger body of sentimental literature of his time. He clearly intends to present himself in his correspondence as an exemplary man of feeling. But his unique position in British culture allowed him to do things with this role that other people of sentiment could not. As a Black man, he advocated for the people whom the British Empire enslaved and exploited. He does not stop, as Sterne does, with single, affecting examples, but trenchantly diagnoses the whole system, and its base motivations ("money—money—money," as one selection below says, putting the sentimental dash to a new purpose). The letters document his times with uncommon keenness of observation. (A series on the Gordon Riots, not included here, offers powerful eyewitness testimony to the explosive anti-Catholic violence, looting, and arson that shook London in the summer of 1780.) But mostly the letters display the humanity, idiosyncratic charm, and confident intelligence of their author, which challenged racist assumptions of ordinary White readers, in Britain and beyond, in an unprecedented way.

TO MR. M—<sup>1</sup>

August 25, 1777.

JACK-ASSES.

My gall has been plentifully stirred—by the barbarity of a set of gentry,<sup>2</sup> who every morning offend my feelings—in their cruel parade through Charles Street<sup>3</sup> to and from market—they vend potatoes in the day—and thief in the night season.—A tall lazy villain was bestriding his poor beast (although loaded with two panniers<sup>4</sup> of potatoes at the same time) and another of his companions, was good-naturedly employed in whipping the poor sinking animal—that the gentleman-rider might enjoy the two-fold pleasure of blasphemy<sup>5</sup> and cruelty—this is a too common evil—and, for the honor of rationality, calls loudly for redress.—I do believe it might be in some measure amended—either by a hint in the papers, of the utility of impressing such vagrants for the king's service<sup>6</sup>—or by laying a heavy tax upon the poor Jack-asses—I prefer the former, both for thy sake and mine;—and, as I am convinced we feel instinctively the injuries of our fellow creatures, I do insist upon your exercising your talents in behalf of the honest sufferers.—I ever had a kind of sympathetic (call it what you please) for that animal—and do I not love you?<sup>7</sup>—Before Sterne had wrote them into respect,<sup>8</sup> I had a friendship for them—and many a civil greeting have I given them at casual meetings—what has ever (with me) stamped a kind of uncommon value and dignity upon the long-eared kind of the species, is that our Blessed Savior, in his day of worldly triumph, chose to use that in preference to the rest of his own blessed creation—“meek and lowly, riding upon an ass.”<sup>9</sup> I am convinced that the general inhumanity of mankind proceeds—first, from the cursed false principle of common education—and, secondly, from a total

indifference (if not disbelief) of the Christian faith;—a heart and mind impressed with a firm belief of the Christian tenets, must of course exercise itself in a constant uniform general philanthropy—such a being carries his heaven in his breast—and such be thou! therefore write me a bitter Philippick<sup>1</sup> against the misusers of Jack-asses—it shall honor a column in the Morning Post<sup>2</sup>—and I will bray—bray my thanks to you—thou shalt figure away the champion of poor friendless asses here—and hereafter shalt not be ashamed in the great day of retribution.<sup>3</sup>

Mrs. Sancho would send you some tamarinds.—I know not her reasons;—as I hate contentions, I contradicted not—but shrewdly suspects she thinks you want cooling;<sup>4</sup>—Do you hear, Sir? send me some more good news about your head.—Your letters will not be the less welcome for talking about J—M—,<sup>5</sup> but pray do not let vanity so master your judgement—to fancy yourself upon a footing with George for well looking:—if you were indeed a proof sheet—you was marred in the taking off—for George (ask the girls) is certainly the fairest impression.<sup>6</sup>

I had an order from Mr. H<sup>7</sup>—on Thursday night to see him do Falstaff—I put some money to it, and took Mary and Betsy<sup>8</sup> with me—it was Betty's first affair—and she enjoyed it in truth—H—'s Falstaff is entirely original—and I think as great as his Shylock;—he kept the house in a continual roar of laughter;—in some things he falls short of Quin<sup>9</sup>—in many I think him equal.—When I saw Quin play, he was at the height of his art, with thirty years judgement to guide him. H—, in seven years more, will be all that better—and confessedly the first<sup>1</sup> man on the English stage, or I am much mistaken.

I am reading a little pamphlet,<sup>2</sup> which I much like: it favors an opinion which I have long indulged—which is the improbability of eternal Damnation—a thought which almost petrifies one—and, in my opinion, derogatory to the fullness, glory, and benefit of the blessed expiation of the Son of the Most High God—who died for the sins of all—all—Jew, Turk, Infidel, and Heretic;—fair—sallow—brown

—tawney—black—and you—and I—and every son and daughter of Adam.—You must find eyes to read this book—head and heart—with a quickness of conception thou enjoyest—with many—many advantages—which have the love—and envy almost of yours,

I. SANCHO.

Respects in folio to Mrs. H——.<sup>3</sup>

TO MR. F—<sup>4</sup>

Charles Street, January 27, 1778.

Full heartily and most cordially do I thank thee—good Mr. F—, for your kindness in sending the books—that upon the unchristian and most diabolical usage of my brother Negroes—the illegality—the horrid wickedness of the traffic—the cruel carnage and depopulation of the human species—is painted in such strong colors—that I should think would (if duly attended to) flash conviction—and produce remorse in every enlightened and candid reader.—The perusal affected me more than I can express;—indeed I felt a double or mixt sensation—for while my heart was torn for the sufferings—which, for aught I know—some of my nearest kin might have undergone—my bosom, at the same time, glowed with gratitude—and praise toward the humane—the Christian—the friendly and learned Author of that most valuable book.—Blest be your sect!<sup>5</sup>—and Heaven’s peace be upon them!—I, who, thank God! am no bigot—but honor virtue—and the practice of the great moral duties—equally in the turban—or the lawn-sleeves<sup>6</sup>—who think Heaven big enough for all the race of man—and hope to see and mix amongst the whole family of Adam in bliss hereafter—I with these notions (which, perhaps, some may style absurd) look upon the friendly Author—as a being far superior to any great name upon your continent.—I could wish that every member of each house of parliament had one of these books.—And if his Majesty perused one through before breakfast—though it might spoil his appetite—yet the consciousness of having it in his power to facilitate the great work—would give an additional sweetness to his tea.—Phyllis’s poems<sup>7</sup> do credit to nature—and put art—merely as art—to the blush.—It reflects nothing either to the glory or generosity of her master—if she is still his slave—except he glories in the low vanity of having in his wanton power a mind animated by Heaven—a genius superior to himself—the list of splendid—titled—learned names, in confirmation of her being the real authoress,—alas! shows how very poor the acquisition of wealth and knowledge are—without generosity—feeling—and humanity.—These good great folks—all knew—and perhaps admired—nay, praised Genius in bondage—and then, like the Priests and the Levites in sacred writ, passed by—not one good Samaritan amongst them.<sup>8</sup>—I shall be ever glad to see you—and am, with many thanks,

Your most humble servant.
IGNATIUS SANCHO.

1778.

Your good father insists on my scribbling a sheet of absurdities, and gives a notable reason for it, that is, "Jack will be pleased with it."—Now be it known to you—I have a respect both for father and son—yea for the whole family, who are every soul (that I have the honor or pleasure to know anything of) tinctured—and leavened with all the obsolete goodness of old times—so that a man runs some hazard, in being seen in the W—e's society, of being biased to Christianity.—I never see your poor Father—but his eyes betray his feelings—for the hopeful youth in India—a tear of joy dancing upon the lids—is a plaudit not to be equaled this side death!—See the effects of right-doing, my worthy friend—continue in the tract of rectitude—and despise poor paltry Europeans—titled Nabobs.<sup>1</sup>—Read your Bible—as day follows night, God's blessing follows virtue—honor—and riches bring up the rear—and the end is peace.—Courage, my boy—I have done preaching.—Old folks love to seem wise—and if you are silly enough to correspond with grey hairs—take the consequence.—I have had the pleasure of reading most of your letters, through the kindness of your father.—Youth is naturally prone to vanity—such is the weakness of Human Nature, that pride has a fortress in the best of hearts—I know no person that possesses a better than Johnny W—e—but although flattery is poison to youth, yet truth obliges me to confess that your correspondence betrays no symptom of vanity—but teems with truths of an honest affection—which merits praise—and commands esteem.

In some of your letters which I do not recollect, you speak (with honest indignation) of the treachery and chicanery of the natives.<sup>2</sup>—My good friend, you should remember from whom they learnt those vices:—the first Christian visitors found them a simple, harmless people—but the cursed avidity for wealth urged these first visitors (and all the succeeding ones) to such acts of deception—and even wanton cruelty—that the poor ignorant natives soon learnt to turn the knavish and diabolical arts which they soon imbibed—upon their teachers.

I am sorry to observe that the practice of your country (which as a resident I love—and for its freedom—and for the many blessings I enjoy in it—shall ever have my warmest wishes—prayers—and blessings); I say, it is with reluctance that I must observe your country's conduct has been uniformly wicked in the East—West-Indies—and even on the coast of Guinea.—The grand object of English navigators—indeed of all Christian navigators—is money—money—money—for which I do not pretend to blame them—Commerce was meant by the goodness of the Deity to diffuse the various goods of the earth into every part—to unite mankind in the blessed chains of brotherly love—society—and mutual dependence:—the enlightened Christian should diffuse the riches of the Gospel of peace—with the commodities of his respective land—Commerce, attended with strict honesty—and with Religion for its companion—would be a blessing to every shore it touched at.—In Africa, the poor wretched natives—blessed with the most fertile and luxuriant soil—are rendered so much the more miserable for what Providence meant as a blessing:—the Christians' abominable traffic for slaves—and the horrid cruelty and treachery of the petty kings<sup>3</sup>—encouraged by their Christian customers—who carry them strong liquors, to enflame their national madness—and powder and bad firearms, to furnish them with the hellish means of killing and kidnapping.—But enough—it is a subject that sours my blood—and I am sure will not please the friendly bent of your social affections.—I mention these only to guard my friend against being too hasty in condemning the knavery of a people who bad as they may be—possibly—were made worse by their Christian visitors.—Make human nature thy study—wherever thou residest—whatever the religion—or the complexion—study their hearts.—Simplicity, kindness, and charity be thy guide—with these even savages will respect you—and God will bless you!

Your father—who sees every improvement of his boy with delight—observes that your hand-writing is much for the better—in truth, I think it as well as any modest man can wish:—if my long epistles do not frighten you—and I live till the return of next spring<sup>4</sup>—perhaps I shall be enabled to judge how much you are improved since your last favor:<sup>5</sup>—Write me a deal about the natives—the soil and produce—the domestic and interior manners of the people—customs—prejudices—fashions—and follies.—Alas! we have plenty of the two last here—and what is worse, we have politics—and a detestable Brother's war<sup>6</sup>—where the right hand is hacking and hewing the left—whilst angels weep at our madness—and devils rejoice at the ruinous prospect.

Mr. R—<sup>7</sup> and the ladies are well.—Johnny R—has favored me with a long letter; he is now grown familiar with danger<sup>8</sup>—and can bear the whistling of bullets—the cries and groans of the human species—the roll of drums—clangor of trumpets—shouts of combatants—and thunder of cannon—all these he can bear with soldier-like fortitude—with now and then a secret wish for the society of his London friends—in the sweet blessed security—of peace—and friendship.

This, young man, is my second letter;—I have wrote till I am stupid, I perceive—I ought to have found it out two pages back.—Mrs. Sancho joins me in good wishes—I join her in the same;—in which double sense believe me,

Yours, &c. &c.

I. SANCHO.

Very short.

Postscript.

It is with sincere pleasure I hear you have a lucrative establishment<sup>9</sup>—which will enable you to appear and act with decency;—your good sense will naturally lead you to proper œconomy<sup>1</sup>—as distant from frigid parsimony, as from a heedless extravagancy—but as you may possibly have some time to spare upon your hands for necessary recreation—give me leave to obtrude my poor advice.—I have heard it more than once observed of fortunate adventurers—they have come home enriched in purse—but wretchedly barren in intellects—the mind, my dear Jack, wants food—as well as the stomach—why then should not one wish to increase in knowledge as well as money?—Young says—“Books are fair Virtue’s advocates and friends”<sup>2</sup>—now my advice is—to preserve about 20 l. a year for two or three seasons—by which means you may gradually form a useful, elegant, little library—suppose now the first year you send the order—and the money to your father—for the following books—which I recommend from my own superficial knowledge as useful.—A man should know a little of geography—history, nothing more useful, or pleasant.

Robertson’s Charles the Fifth, 4 vols.

Goldsmith’s History of Greece, 2 vols.

Ditto, of Rome, 2 vols.

Ditto, of England, 4 vols.

Two small volumes of Sermons—useful—and very sensible—by one Mr. Williams,<sup>3</sup> a dissenting minister—which are as well as fifty—for I love not a multiplicity of doctrines—a few plain tenets—easy—simple and directed to the heart—are better than volumes of controversial nonsense.—Spectators—Guardians—and Tatlers—you have of course.—Young’s Night-Thoughts—Milton—and Thomson’s Seasons<sup>4</sup> were my summer companions for near twenty years—they mended my heart—they improved my veneration to the Deity—and increased my love to my neighbors.

You have to thank God for strong natural parts<sup>5</sup>—a feeling humane heart—you write with sense and judicious discernment—improve yourself, my dear Jack, that if it should please God to return you to your friends with the fortune of a man in upper rank, the embellishments of your mind may be ever considered as greatly superior to your riches—and only inferior to the goodness of your heart. I give you the above as a sketch—your father and other of your friends will improve upon it in the course of time—I do indeed judge that the above is enough at first—in conformity with the old adage—"A few Books and a few Friends, and those well chosen."

Adieu. Yours,

I. SANCHO.

ANTISLAVERY SENTIMENT: THE SANCHO–STERNE EXCHANGE

The exchange of letters between the great Anglo-Irish novelist and minister Laurence Sterne (1713–1768) and the wit, composer, and formerly enslaved man Ignatius Sancho (ca. 1729–1780; see above) illustrates the transformative moral power, and some of the political limitations, of literary idioms of sentiment. Without having met him, Sancho reached out in 1766 to Sterne, one of his favorite authors, who had condemned slavery in a brief passage in a published sermon. Sancho's letter urges Sterne to extend himself further to generate more sympathy for the enslaved Africans abused in Britain's Caribbean sugar colonies, without exactly asking him to advocate for the abolition of the transatlantic trade. Such advocacy would not become a political force in Britain until two decades later. But Sterne's tender reply itself was taken up in that struggle. Published in 1775 in a posthumous collection of Sterne's letters, it became a source of emotional conviction for abolitionists. Sancho first came to public notice as a result of this publication, and would himself posthumously gain fame as a letter-writer when his literary executors printed The Letters of the Late Ignatius Sancho, an African (1782), two years after his death. The two letters below, with the fictional vignettes by Sterne published in the wake of his exchange with Sancho, dramatize the way deep feeling for the suffering of others can be raised. Sancho's letter seems deliberately limited in scope: he asks Sterne to bestow merely "one half hour's attention" to slavery, and focuses as much on the pleasure such sympathy would bring Sterne as on the suffering of the kidnapped Africans on whose behalf he writes. In his reply, Sterne confesses a certain helplessness in the face of mass suffering, even as it fills his heart with sorrow. The stylistic devices shared by both letters—such as the copious dashes, representing sentimental pauses and transitions—draw attention to the writer's evolving sympathetic feeling, and to that extent at least, away from the feeling's causes. (Sancho doubtless picked up the technique of the long, "Shandean" dash from his literary mentor.) The "tender tale" to which Sterne alludes in his letter to Sancho would appear in the final, ninth volume of his masterwork of literary experimentation, The Life and Opinions of Tristram Shandy (1759–67). The scene dramatizes the tentative development of an antiracist moral consciousness of two simple, isolated souls, Toby and Trim, who share a brief fragment of a story with only one detail: a Black girl in a shop brushing away flies without killing them. The chapter promises a fuller account of her suffering (and that of Trim's brother Tom) that never materializes. The ironies of fellow-feeling come fully into view in the excerpt from Sterne's A Sentimental Journey through France and Italy (1768), published the year he died. The narrator Yorick, facing imprisonment himself, describes his effort to imagine the feelings of those who have lost their liberty. He finds that the vast scale of enslavement in colonial America simply blocks this sympathetic imagination, so he concocts an image of a "pale and feverish" man in prison, and manages the details of this fictional scenario according to his own sentimental whims. (In his letter, Sancho also seemed to allow that sentimental sympathy has trouble extending itself to multitudes, when he concedes that a "benevolent heart" might find sufficient gratification by contributing to the relief "only of one" enslaved person.) While sentiment can project sympathy across the globe, its imperative to locate suffering that can be brought "home to ourselves" (as Adam Smith says), or "near me" (in Sterne's words), also sometimes limits its reach.

Sancho to Sterne

[July 1766]

REVEREND SIR,

It would be an insult on your humanity (or perhaps look like it) to apologize for the liberty I am taking.—I am one of those people whom the vulgar and illiberal call "Negurs."<sup>1</sup>—The first part of my life was rather unlucky, as I was placed in a family who judged ignorance the best and only security for obedience.—A little reading and writing I got by unwearied application.—The latter part of my life has been—thro' God's blessing, truly fortunate, having spent it in the service of one of the best families in the kingdom.<sup>2</sup>—My chief pleasure has been books.—Philanthropy I adore.—How very much, good Sir, am I (amongst millions) indebted to you for the character of your amiable uncle Toby!<sup>3</sup>—I declare, I would walk ten miles in the dog days, to shake hands with the honest corporal.<sup>4</sup>—Your Sermons<sup>5</sup> have touched me to the heart, and I hope have amended it, which brings me to the point.—In your tenth discourse, page seventy-eight, in the second volume—is this very affecting passage—"Consider how great a part of our species—in all ages down to this—have been trod under the feet of cruel and capricious tyrants, who would neither hear their cries, nor pity their distresses.—Consider slavery—what it is—how bitter a draught—and how many millions are made to drink it!"—Of all my favorite authors, not one has drawn a tear in favor of my miserable black brethren—excepting yourself, and the humane author of Sir George Ellison.<sup>6</sup>—I think you will forgive me;—I am sure you will applaud me for beseeching you to give one half hour's attention to slavery, as it is at this day practiced in our West Indies.—That subject, handled in your striking manner, would ease the yoke (perhaps) of many—but if only of one—Gracious God!—what a feast to a benevolent heart!—and, sure I am,

you are an epicurean<sup>7</sup> in acts of charity.—You, who are universally read, and as universally admired—you could not fail—Dear Sir, think in me you behold the uplifted hands of thousands of my brother Moors.<sup>8</sup>—Grief (you pathetically<sup>9</sup> observe) is eloquent;—figure to yourself their attitudes; hear their supplicating addresses!—alas!—you cannot refuse.—Humanity must comply—in which hope I beg permission to subscribe myself, Reverend, Sir, &c.

Sterne to Sancho

Coxwould, July 27, 1766

There is a strange coincidence, Sancho, in the little events (as well as in the great ones) of this world: for I had been writing a tender tale of the sorrows of a friendless poor negro-girl, and my eyes had scarce done smarting with it, when your letter of recommendation, in behalf of so many of her brethren and sisters, came to me—but why her brethren?—or yours, Sancho! any more than mine? It is by the finest tints, and most insensible gradations, that nature descends from the fairest face about St James's,<sup>1</sup> to the sootiest complexion in Africa:—at which tint of these is it, that the ties of blood are to cease? and how many shades must we descend lower still in the scale, ere mercy is to vanish with them? But 'tis no uncommon thing, my good Sancho, for one half of the world to use the other half of it like brutes, and then endeavor to make 'em so.—For my own part, I never look westward, (when I am in a pensive mood at least) but I think of the burthens which our brothers and sisters are there carrying, and could I ease their shoulders from one ounce of them, I declare I would set out this hour upon a pilgrimage to Mecca for their sakes—which by the bye, Sancho, exceeds your walk of ten miles in about the same proportion, that a visit of humanity, should one of mere form.<sup>2</sup>—However, if you meant my Uncle Toby more he is your debtor.—If I can weave the tale I have wrote into the work I am about<sup>3</sup>—'tis at the service of the afflicted—and a much greater matter; for in serious truth, it casts a sad shade upon the world, that so great a part of it are, and have been so long bound in chains of darkness, and in chains of misery; and I cannot but both respect and felicitate you, that by so much laudable diligence you have broke the one—and that by falling into the hands of so good and merciful a family, Providence has rescued you from the other.

And so good-hearted Sancho adieu! and believe me I will not forget your letter.

Yours,
L. STERNE.

- Note 2: That is, Sterne's long walk to Mecca for the sake of enslaved people would be longer than Sancho's "ten miles in the dog days" to the degree to which a genuinely benevolent mission ("a visit of humanity") is morally superior to one of politeness ("mere form"). In the next sentence, Sterne seems to wonder if Sancho meant to refer to Captain Toby Shandy instead of Corporal Trim, when Sancho said in his letter that he would undertake this journey "to shake hands with the honest corporal."Return to reference 2

[UNCLE TOBY AND CORPORAL TRIM DISCUSS SLAVERY AND RACE]

When Tom, an' please your honor,<sup>1</sup> got to the shop, there was nobody in it, but a poor negro girl, with a bunch of white feathers slightly tied to the end of a long cane, flapping away flies—not killing them.—'Tis a pretty picture! said my uncle Toby—she had suffered persecution, Trim, and had learnt mercy—

—She was good, an' please your honor, from nature, as well as from hardships; and there are circumstances in the story of that poor friendless slut,<sup>2</sup> that would melt a heart of stone, said Trim; and some dismal winter's evening, when your honor is in the humor, they shall be told you with the rest of Tom's story, for it makes a part of it—<sup>3</sup>

Then do not forget, Trim, said my uncle Toby.

A Negro has a soul? an' please your honor, said the corporal (doubtingly).

I am not much versed, corporal, quoth my uncle Toby, in things of that kind; but I suppose, God would not leave him without one, any more than thee or me—

—It would be putting one sadly over the head of<sup>4</sup> another, quoth the corporal.

It would so; said my uncle Toby. Why then, an' please your honor, is a black wench to be used<sup>5</sup> worse than a white one?

I can give no reason, said my uncle Toby——Only, cried the corporal, shaking his head, because she has no one to stand up for her—

—'Tis that very thing, Trim, quoth my uncle Toby,—which recommends her to protection—and her brethren with her; 'tis the fortune of war which has put the whip into our hands now—where it may be hereafter, heaven knows!—but be it where it will, the brave, Trim! will not use it unkindly.

—God forbid, said the corporal.

Amen, responded my uncle Toby, laying his hand upon his heart.

[THE STARLING]

—And as for the Bastile!<sup>1</sup> the terror is in the word—Make the most of it you can, said I to myself, the Bastile is but another word for a tower—and a tower is but another word for a house you can't get out of—Mercy on the gouty! for they are in it twice a year—But with nine livres<sup>2</sup> a day, and pen and ink, and paper, and patience, albeit a man can't get out, he may do very well within—at least for a month or six weeks; at the end of which, if he is a harmless fellow, his innocence appears, and he comes out a better and wiser man than he went in.

I had some occasion (I forget what) to step into the court-yard, as I settled this account; and remember I walked down stairs in no small triumph with the conceit of my reasoning—Beshrew<sup>3</sup> the somber pencil! said I, vauntingly—for I envy not its powers, which paints the evils of life with so hard and deadly a coloring. The mind sits terrified at the objects she has magnified herself, and blackened: reduce them to their proper size and hue, she overlooks them—'Tis true, said I, correcting the proposition—the Bastile is not an evil to be despised—but strip it of its towers—fill up the fossè<sup>4</sup>—unbarricade the doors—call it simply a confinement, and suppose 'tis some tyrant of a distemper—and not of a man, which holds you in it—the evil vanishes, and you bear the other half without complaint.

I was interrupted in the hey-day of this soliloquy, with a voice which I took to be of a child, which complained "it could not get out."—I looked up and down the passage, and seeing neither man, woman, nor child, I went out without farther attention.

In my return back through the passage, I heard the same words repeated twice over; and looking up, I saw it was a starling hung in a little cage.—“I can’t get out,—I can’t get out,” said the starling.<sup>5</sup>

I stood looking at the bird: and to every person who came through the passage it ran fluttering to the side towards which they approached it, with the same lamentation of its captivity—“I can’t get out,” said the starling—God help thee! said I, but I’ll let thee out, cost what it will; so I turned about the cage to get to the door; it was twisted and double twisted so fast with wire, there was no getting it open without pulling the cage to pieces—I took both hands to it.

The bird flew to the place where I was attempting his deliverance, and thrusting his head through the trellis,<sup>6</sup> pressed his breast against it, as if impatient—I fear, poor creature! said I, I cannot set thee at liberty—“No,” said the starling—“I can’t get out—I can’t get out,” said the starling.

I vow, I never had my affections more tenderly awakened; nor do I remember an incident in my life, where the dissipated spirits, to which my reason had been a bubble, were so suddenly called home.<sup>7</sup> Mechanical as the notes were, yet so true in tune to nature were they chanted, that in one moment they overthrew all my systematic reasonings upon the Bastile; and I heavily walked upstairs, unsaying every word I had said in going down them.

Disguise thyself as thou wilt, still, slavery! said I—still thou art a bitter draught; and though thousands in all ages have been made to drink of thee, thou art no less bitter on that account.—’Tis thou, thrice sweet and gracious goddess, addressing myself to LIBERTY, whom all in public or in private worship, whose taste is grateful, and ever wilt be so, till NATURE herself shall change—No tint of words can spot thy snowy mantle, or chymic<sup>8</sup> power turn thy scepter into iron—with thee to smile upon him as he eats his crust, the swain is happier than his monarch, from whose court thou art exiled—Gracious heaven! cried I, kneeling down upon the last step but one in my ascent—grant me but health, thou great Bestower of it, and give me but this fair goddess as my companion—and shower down thy miters, if it seems good unto thy divine providence, upon those heads which are aching for them.<sup>9</sup>

THE CAPTIVE.
PARIS.

The bird in his cage pursued me into my room; I sat down close to my table, and leaning my head upon my hand, I began to figure<sup>1</sup> to myself the miseries of confinement. I was in a right frame for it, and so I gave full scope to my imagination.

I was going to begin with the millions of my fellow creatures born to no inheritance but slavery: but finding, however affecting the picture was, that I could not bring it near me, and that the multitude of sad groups in it did but distract me.—

—I took a single captive, and having first shut him up in his dungeon, I then looked through the twilight of his grated door to take his picture.

I beheld his body half wasted away with long expectation and confinement, and felt what kind of sickness of the heart it was which arises from hope deferred. Upon looking nearer I saw him pale and feverish: in thirty years the western breeze had not once fanned his blood—he had seen no sun, no moon, in all that time—nor had the voice of friend or kinsman breathed through his lattice—his children —

But here my heart began to bleed—and I was forced to go on with another part of the portrait.

He was sitting upon the ground upon a little straw, in the furthest corner of his dungeon, which was alternately his chair and bed: a little calendar of small sticks were laid at the head, notched all over with the dismal days and nights he had passed there—he had one of these little sticks in his hand, and with a rusty nail he was etching another day of misery to add to the heap. As I darkened the little light he had, he lifted up a hopeless eye towards the door, then cast it down—shook his head, and went on with his work of affliction. I heard his chains upon his legs, as he turned his body to lay his little stick upon the bundle—He gave a deep sigh—I saw the iron enter into his soul<sup>2</sup>—I burst into tears—I could not sustain the picture of confinement which my fancy had drawn—I started up from my chair, and calling La Fleur, I bid him bespeak<sup>3</sup> me a remise, and have it ready at the door of the hotel by nine in the morning.

I'll go directly, said I, myself to Monsieur le Duc de Choiseul.<sup>4</sup>

La Fleur would have put me to bed; but—not willing he should see anything upon my cheek which would cost the honest fellow a heart ache—I told him I would go to bed by myself—and bid him go do the same.

HENRY MACKENZIE

The fame of Henry Mackenzie (1745–1831), Scottish man of letters and lawyer, rests on the reputation of his first novel, The Man of Feeling (1771), though he wrote two others, as well as three plays, and numerous essays for the periodicals he edited, the Mirror (1779–80) and the Lounger (1785–87), on the model of Addison and Steele's Spectator (1711–14). He was a leader in the Scottish literary scene for five decades; a founding member of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, Scotland's national academy of arts, letters, and sciences; and he also pursued an important legal career, filling the post of Scotland's comptroller of taxes in 1779. When he died in 1831, Scotland lost a figure whose literary life and sensibility linked the Scottish Enlightenment to the Romantic era.

Readers today turn to The Man of Feeling to find one of the most intense expressions of the sentimental ethos that dominated the final three decades of the eighteenth century. Mackenzie's first novel follows his English literary forebears Laurence Sterne (1713–1768) and Samuel Richardson (1689–1761) in focusing on intricately situated feelings instead of plot. Like Sterne's experiments in fiction, the story of Mackenzie's protagonist, Harley, emerges in jumbled, anecdotal fragments: the book's structural conceit is that its text is pieced together by a person who knows nothing of Harley, from torn manuscript pages he found being used as wadding for a hunting rifle. Many sections are missing; the book begins at Chapter XI. But unlike Sterne's and Richardson's fictions, The Man of Feeling pursues a grim strain of social satire. The exemplar of true sensitivity, Harley, travels to London—the center of a corrupt society—and back, and encounters numerous cheats, cynics, and morally desensitized people along the way, as well as those whom they have victimized. These victims, like Harley, are no match for the cruel world. The excerpt from the novel below distills the themes of sentimental literature so well that it was anthologized and published separately several times as “The Story of Old Edwards,” in the decades after the novel’s appearance. In it we meet a series of figures inviting Harley’s and the reader’s sympathy: Edwards himself, the old, disabled veteran and dispossessed tenant farmer, his destitute family, two family dogs who die pitiably, an old Indian man tortured by soldiers of the British East India Company, orphaned children, and so on. As this list indicates, a concern for justice often motivates Harley’s acts of sympathetic identification: landlords oppress the poor for their own comforts and amusement, humans wantonly abuse animals, and colonialists torment the peoples they colonize. Each anecdote of oppression calls forth Harley’s tears—and so many tears flow, in Edwards’s story and The Man of Feeling at large, that some later readers have found them laughable rather than touching. Harley’s state of hypersensitivity, unsurprisingly, blocks him from imagining, let alone fighting for, actual social change. As his conversation with Edwards about British crimes in India winds down, all he can do is sigh against “the general current of opinion” that applauds wealth gained by oppression, and resolve to “live sequestered from the noise of the multitude.” It is plain that The Man of Feeling intends to expose widespread injustice: the novel does not simply deplore a few exceptionally bad actors or incidents. If the protocols of sentiment leave Harley dispirited and withdrawn in the face of a bad world, the conclusions and actions to which they may lead readers are less easy to determine.

Chapter XXXIV. He meets an old acquaintance.

When the stage-coach arrived at the place of its destination,<sup>1</sup> Harley began to consider how he should proceed the remaining part of his journey. He was very civilly accosted<sup>2</sup> by the master of the inn where he alighted, who offered to accommodate him either with a post-chaise or horses, to any distance he had a mind: but as he did things frequently in a way different from what other people call natural, he refused these offers, and set out immediately a-foot, having first put a spare shirt in his pocket,<sup>3</sup> and given directions for the forwarding of his portmanteau. This was a method of traveling which he was accustomed to take: it saved the trouble of provision for any animal but himself, and left him at liberty to choose his quarters, either at an inn, or at the first cottage in which he saw a face he liked: nay, when he was not peculiarly attracted by the reasonable creation,<sup>4</sup> he would sometimes consort with a species of an inferior rank, and lay himself down to sleep by the side of a rock, or on the banks of a rivulet. He did few things without a motive, but his motives were rather eccentric: and the useful and expedient were terms which he held to be very indefinite, and which therefore he did not always apply to the sense they are commonly understood in.

The sun was now in his decline, and the evening remarkably serene, when he entered a hollow part of the road, which winded between the surrounding banks, and seamed the sward<sup>5</sup> in different lines, as the choice of travelers had directed them to tread it. It seemed to be little frequented now, for some of these had partly recovered their former verdure. The scene was such as induced Harley to stand and enjoy it; when, turning round, his notice was attracted by an object, which the fixture of his eye on the spot he walked had before prevented him from observing.

An old man, who from his dress seemed to have been a soldier, lay fast asleep on the ground; a knapsack was rested on a stone at his right hand, while his staff and brass-hilted sword were crossed at his left.

Harley looked on him with the most earnest attention. He was one of those figures which Salvator<sup>6</sup> would have drawn; nor was the surrounding scenery unlike the wildness of that painter's backgrounds. The banks on each side were covered with fantastic shrub-wood, and at a little distance, on the top of one of them, stood a fingerpost,<sup>7</sup> to mark the directions of two roads which diverged from the point where it was placed. A rock, with some dangling wild flowers, jutted out above where the soldier lay, on which grew the stump of a large tree, white with age, and a single twisted branch shaded his face as he slept. His face had the marks of manly comeliness impaired by time; his forehead was not altogether bald, but its hairs might have been numbered;<sup>8</sup> while a few white locks behind crossed the brown of his neck with a contrast the most venerable to a mind like Harley's. "Thou art old," said he to himself; "but age has not brought thee rest for its infirmities: I fear those silver hairs have not found shelter from thy country, though that neck has been bronzed in its service."<sup>9</sup> The stranger waked. He looked on Harley with the appearance of some confusion: it was a pain which he knew too well to think of causing in another; he turned and went on. The old man readjusted his knapsack, and followed in one of the tracts on the opposite side of the road.

When Harley heard the tread of his feet behind him, he could not help stealing back a glance at his fellow-traveler. He seemed to bend under the weight of his knapsack; he halted on his walk, and one of his arms was supported by a sling, and lay motionless across his breast. He had that steady look of sorrow, which indicates that its owner has gazed upon his griefs till he has forgotten to lament them; yet not without those streaks of complacency, which a good mind will sometimes throw into the countenance, through all the incumbent load of its depression.

He had now advanced nearer to Harley, and, with an uncertain sort of voice, begged to know what it was o'clock; "I fear," said he, "sleep has beguiled me of my time, and I shall hardly have light enough left to carry me to the end of my journey." "Father!" said Harley (who by this time found the romantic enthusiasm rising within him) "how far do you mean to go?" "But a little way, Sir," returned the other; "and indeed it is but a little way I can manage now: 'tis just four miles from the height to the village, thither I am going." "I am going there too," said Harley; "we may make the road shorter to one another. You seem to have served your country, Sir, to have served it hardly too; 'tis a character<sup>1</sup> I have the highest esteem for.—I would not be impertinently inquisitive; but there is that in your appearance which excites my curiosity to know something more of you; in the meantime suffer me to carry that knapsack."

The old man gazed on him; a tear stood in his eye! "Young gentleman," said he, "you are too good; may heaven bless you for an old man's sake, who has nothing but his blessing to give! but my knapsack is so familiar to my shoulders, that I should walk the worse for wanting it; and it would be troublesome to you, who have not been used to its weight." "Far from it," answered Harley, "I should tread the lighter; it would be the most honorable badge I ever wore."

"Sir," said the stranger, who had looked earnestly in Harley's face during the last part of his discourse, "is not your name Harley?" "It is," replied he; "I am ashamed to say I have forgotten yours." "You may well have forgotten my face," said the stranger, "'tis a long time since you saw it; but possibly you may remember something of old Edwards."—"Edwards!" cried Harley, "oh! heavens!" and sprung to embrace him; "let me clasp those knees on which I have sat so often: Edwards!—I shall never forget that fireside, round which I have been so happy! But where, where have you been? where is Jack? where is your daughter? How has it fared with them, when fortune, I fear, has been so unkind to you?"—"Tis a long tale," replied Edwards; "but I will try to tell it you as we walk."

"When you was at school in the neighborhood, you remember me at Southhill: that farm had been possessed by my father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, which last was a younger brother of that very man's ancestor, who is now lord of the manor.<sup>2</sup> I thought I managed it, as they had done, with prudence; I paid my rent regularly as it became due, and had always as much behind<sup>3</sup> as gave bread to me and my children. But my last lease was out soon after you left that part of the country; and the squire, who had lately got a London attorney for his steward, would not renew it, because, he said, he did not choose to have any farm under £300 a year value on his estate; but offered to give me the preference on the same terms with another, if I chose to take the one he had marked out, of which mine was a part.

"What could I do, Mr. Harley? I feared the undertaking was too great for me; yet to leave, at my age, the house I had lived in from my cradle! I could not, Mr. Harley, I could not; there was not a tree about it that I did not look on as my father, my brother, or my child: so I even ran the risk, and took the squire's offer of the whole. But I had soon reason to repent of my bargain: the steward had taken care that my former farm should be the best land of the division: I was obliged to hire more servants, and I could not have my eye over them all; some unfavorable seasons followed one another, and I found my affairs entangling on my hands. To add to my distress, a considerable corn-factor<sup>4</sup> turned bankrupt with a sum of mine in his possession: I failed paying my rent so punctually as I was wont to do, and the same steward had my stock taken in execution<sup>5</sup> in a few days after. So, Mr. Harley, there was an end of my prosperity. However, there was as much produced from the sale of my effects as paid my debts and saved me from a jail: I thank God I wronged no man, and the world could never charge me with dishonesty.

"Had you seen us, Mr. Harley, when we were turned out of Southhill, I am sure you would have wept at the sight. You remember old Trusty, my shag house-dog; I shall never forget it while I live; the poor creature was blind with age, and could scarce crawl after us to the door; he went however as far as the gooseberry-bush; that you may remember stood on the left side of the yard; he was wont to bask in the sun there: when he had reached that spot, he stopped; we went on: I called to him; he wagged his tail, but did not stir: I called again; he lay down: I whistled, and cried Trusty; he gave a short howl, and died! I could have lain down and died too; but God gave me strength to live for my children."

The old man now paused a moment to take breath. He eyed Harley's face; it was bathed in tears: 'twas a tale he had been accustomed to think often on; he dropped one tear, and no more.

"Though I was poor," continued he, "I was not altogether without credit. A gentleman in the neighborhood, who had a small farm unoccupied at the time, offered to let me have it, on giving security for the rent; which I made shift<sup>6</sup> to procure. It was a piece of ground which required management to make anything of; but it was nearly within the compass of my son's labor and my own. We exerted all our industry to bring it into some heart.<sup>7</sup> We began to succeed tolerably well, and lived contented on its produce, when an unlucky accident brought us under the displeasure of a neighboring justice of the peace, and broke all our family happiness again.

"My son was a remarkable good shooter; he had always kept a pointer on our former farm, and thought no harm in doing so now; when one day, having sprung a covey of birds on our own ground, the dog, of his own accord, followed them into the justice's. My son laid down his gun, and went after his dog to bring him back: the game-keeper, who had marked<sup>8</sup> the birds, came up, and seeing the pointer, shot him just as my son approached. The creature fell; my son ran up to him: he died with a complaining sort of cry at his master's feet. Jack could bear it no longer; but flying at the game-keeper, wrenched his gun out of his hand, and with the butt end of it, felled him to the ground.

"He had scarce got home, when a constable came with a warrant, and dragged him to prison; there he lay, for the justices would not take bail, till he was tried at the quarter-sessions<sup>9</sup> for the assault and battery. His fine was hard upon us to pay; we contrived however to live the worse for it, and make up the loss by our frugality: but the justice was not content with that punishment, and soon after had an opportunity of punishing us indeed.

"An officer with press-orders<sup>1</sup> came down to our county, and having met with the justices, agreed that they should pitch on a certain number, who could most easily be spared from the county, whom he would take care to make it rid of: my son's name was in the justices' list.

"'Twas on a Christmas Eve, and the birthday too of my son's little boy. The night was piercing cold, and it blew a storm, with showers of hail and snow. We had made up a cheering fire in an inner room; I sat before it in my wicker-chair; blessing Providence, that had still left a shelter for me and my children. My son's two little ones were holding their gambols<sup>2</sup> around us; my heart warmed at the sight; I brought a bottle of my best ale, and all our misfortunes were forgotten.

"It had long been our custom to play a game at blind-man's-buff on that night, and it was not omitted now; so to it we fell, I, and my son, and his wife, the daughter of a neighboring farmer, who happened to be with us at the time, the two children, and an old maidservant, that had lived with me from a child. The lot fell on my son to be blindfolded: we had continued some time in our game, when he groped his way into an outer room in pursuit of some of us, who, he imagined, had taken shelter there; we kept snug in our places, and enjoyed his mistake. He had not been long there, when he was suddenly seized from behind; 'I shall have you now,' said he, and turned about. 'Shall you so, master?' answered the ruffian, who had laid hold of him; 'we shall make you play at another sort of game by and by.'"—At these words Harley started with a convulsive sort of motion, and grasping Edwards's sword, drew it half out of the scabbard, with a look of the most frantic wildness. Edwards gently replaced it in its sheath, and went on with his relation.

"On hearing these words in a strange voice, we all rushed out to discover the cause; the room by this time was almost full of the gang.<sup>3</sup> My daughter-in-law fainted at the sight; the maid and I ran to assist her, while my poor son remained motionless, gazing by turns on his children and their mother. We soon recovered her to life, and begged her to retire and wait the issue of the affair; but she flew to her husband, and clung round him in an agony of grief and terror.

"Amongst the gang there was one of a smoother aspect, whom, by his dress, we discovered to be a serjeant of foot: he came up to me, and told me, that my son had his choice of the sea or land service, whispering at the same time, that if he chose the land, he might get off, on procuring him another man, and paying a certain sum for his freedom. The money we could just muster up in the house, by the assistance of the maid, who produced, in a green bag, all the little savings of her service; but the man we could not expect to find. My daughter-in-law gazed upon her children with a look of the wildest despair: 'My poor infants!' said she, 'your father is forced from you; who shall now labor for your bread? or must your mother beg for herself and you?' I prayed her to be patient; but comfort I had none to give her. At last, calling the serjeant aside, I asked him, if I was too old to be accepted in place of my son? 'Why, I don't know,' said he; 'you are rather old to be sure, but yet the money may do much.' I put the money in his hand, and coming back to my children, 'Jack,' said I, 'you are free; live to give your wife and these little ones bread; I will go, my child, in your stead; I have but little life to lose, and if I stayed, I should add one to the wretches you left behind.' 'No,' replied my son, 'I am not that coward you imagine me; heaven forbid, that my father's grey hairs should be so exposed, while I sat idle at home; I am young, and able to endure much, and God will take care of you and my family.' 'Jack,' said I, 'I will put an end to this matter, you have never hitherto disobeyed me; I will not be contradicted in this; stay at home, I charge you, and, for my sake, be kind to my children.'

"Our parting, Mr. Harley, I cannot describe to you; it was the first time we ever had parted: the very press-gang could scarcely keep from tears; but the serjeant, who had seemed the softest before, was now the least moved of them all. He conducted me to a party of new-raised recruits, who lay at a village in the neighborhood; and we soon after joined the regiment. I had not been long with it when we were ordered to the East Indies, where I was soon made a serjeant, and might have picked up some money, if my heart had been as hard as some others were; but my nature was never of that kind, that could think of making rich at the expense of my conscience.

"Amongst our prisoners was an old Indian, whom some of our officers supposed to have a treasure hidden somewhere; which is not an uncommon practice in that country. They pressed him to discover it. He declared he had none; but that would not satisfy them: so they ordered him to be tied to a stake, and suffer fifty lashes every morning till he should learn to speak out as they said. Oh! Mr. Harley, had you seen him, as I did, with his hands bound behind him, suffering in silence, while the big drops trickled down his shrivelled cheeks and wet his grey beard, which some of the inhuman soldiers plucked in scorn! I could not bear it, I could not for my soul, and one morning, when the rest of the guard were out of the way, I found means to let him escape. I was tried by a court-martial for negligence of my post, and ordered, in compassion of my age, and having got this wound in my arm, and that in my leg, in the service, only to suffer 300 lashes, and be turned out of the regiment; but my sentence was mitigated as to the lashes, and I had only 200. When I had suffered these, I was turned out of the camp, and had betwixt three and four hundred miles to travel before I could reach a sea-port, without guide to conduct me, or money to buy me provisions by the way. I set out however, resolved to walk as far as I could, and then to lay myself down and die. But I had scarce gone a mile, when I was met by the Indian whom I had delivered. He pressed me in his arms, and kissed the marks of the lashes on my back a thousand times: he led me to a little hut, where some friend of his dwelt, and after I was recovered of my wounds conducted me so far on my journey himself, and sent another Indian to guide me through the rest. When we parted he pulled out a purse with two hundred pieces of gold in it. 'Take this,' said he, 'my dear preserver, it is all I have been able to procure.' I begged him not to bring himself to poverty for my sake, who should probably have no need of it long, but he insisted on my accepting it. He embraced me: —'You are an Englishman,' said he, 'but the Great Spirit has given thee an Indian heart; may he bear up the weight of your old age, and blunt the arrow that brings it rest!’ We parted; and not long after I made shift to get my passage to England. ’Tis but about a week since I landed, and I am going to end my days in the arms of my son. This sum may be of use to him and his children; ’tis all the value I put upon it. I thank heaven I never was covetous of wealth; I never had much, but was always so happy as to be contented with my little.”

When Edwards had ended his relation, Harley stood a while looking at him in silence; at last he pressed him in his arms, and when he had given vent to the fulness of his heart by a shower of tears, “Edwards,” said he, “let me hold thee to my bosom; let me imprint the virtue of thy sufferings on my soul. Come, my honored veteran! let me endeavor to soften the last days of a life, worn out in the service of humanity; call me also thy son, and let me cherish thee as a father.” Edwards, from whom the recollection of his own suffering had scarce forced a tear, now blubbered like a boy; he could not speak his gratitude, but by some short exclamations of blessings upon Harley.

Chapter XXXV. He misses an old acquaintance.—An adventure consequent upon it.

When they had arrived within a little way of the village they journeyed to, Harley stopped short, and looked steadfastly on the mouldering walls of a ruined house that stood on the roadside. "Oh, heavens!" he cried, "what do I see: silent, unroofed, and desolate! Are all thy gay tenants gone? do I hear their hum no more? Edwards, look there, look there! the scene of my infant joys, my earliest friendships, laid waste and ruinous! That was the very school where I was boarded when you was at Southhill; 'tis but a twelvemonth since I saw it standing, and its benches filled with cherubims: that opposite side of the road was the green on which they sported; see it now ploughed up! I would have given fifty times its value to have saved it from the sacrilege of that plough."

"Dear sir," replied Edwards, "perhaps they have left it from choice, and may have got another spot as good." "They cannot," said Harley, "they cannot; I shall never see the sward covered with its daisies, nor pressed by the dance of the dear innocents: I shall never see that stump decked with the garlands which their little hands had gathered. These two long stones which now lie at the foot of it, were once the supports of a hut I myself assisted to rear: I have sat on the sods within it, when we had spread our banquet of apples before us, and been more blest—Oh! Edwards, infinitely more blest than ever I shall be again."

Just then a woman passed them on the road, and discovered<sup>4</sup> some signs of wonder at the attitude of Harley, who stood, with his hands folded together, looking with a moistened eye on the fallen pillars of the hut. He was too much entranced in thought to observe her at all; but Edwards civilly accosting her, desired to know, if that had not been the school-house, and how it came into the condition they now saw it in. "Alack a day!" said she, "it was the school-house indeed; but to be sure, Sir, the squire has pulled it down because it stood in the way of his prospects."<sup>5</sup> "What! how! prospects! pulled down!" cried Harley. "Yes, to be sure, sir; and the green, where the children used to play, he has ploughed up, because, he said, they hurt his fence on the other side of it.”—“Curses on his narrow heart,” cried Harley, “that could violate a right so sacred! Heaven blast the wretch!

And from his derogate body never spring

A babe to honor him!—<sup>6</sup>

But I need not, Edwards, I need not” (recovering himself a little), “he is cursed enough already: to him the noblest source of happiness is denied; and the cares of his sordid soul shall gnaw it, while thou sittest over a brown crust, smiling on those mangled limbs that have saved thy son and his children!” “If you want anything with the school-mistress, sir,” said the woman, “I can show you the way to her house.” He followed her without knowing whither he went.

They stopped at the door of a snug-looking house, where sat an elderly woman with a boy and a girl before her, with each a supper of bread and milk in their hands. “There, Sir, is the school-mistress.”—“Madam,” said Harley, “was not an old venerable-looking man school-master here some time ago?” “Yes, sir, he was; poor man! the loss of his former school-house, I believe, broke his heart, for he died soon after it was taken down; and as another has not yet been found, I have that charge in the meantime.”—“And this boy and girl, I presume, are your pupils?”—“Ay, sir; they are poor orphans, put under my care by the parish; and more promising children I never saw.” “Orphans!” said Harley. “Yes, Sir, of honest creditable parents as any in the parish; and it is a shame for some folks to forget their relations, at a time when they have most need to remember them.”—“Madam,” said Harley, “let us never forget that we are all relations.” He kissed the children.

“Their father, sir,” continued she, “was a farmer here in the neighborhood, and a sober industrious man he was; but nobody can help misfortunes: what with bad crops, and bad debts, which are worse, his affairs went to wreck, and both he and his wife died of broken hearts. And a sweet couple they were, sir; there was not a properer man to look on in the county than John Edwards, and so indeed were all the Edwardses." "What Edwardses?" cried the old soldier hastily. "The Edwardses of Southhill; and a worthy family they were."—"Southhill!" said he, in a languid voice, and fell back into the arms of the astonished Harley. The school-mistress ran for some water, and a smelling-bottle,<sup>7</sup> with the assistance of which they soon recovered the unfortunate Edwards. He stared wildly for some time, then folding his orphan grandchildren in his arms, "Oh! my children, my children," he cried, "have I found you thus? My poor Jack! art thou gone? I thought thou shouldst have carried thy father's grey hairs to the grave! And these little ones"—his tears choked his utterance, and he fell again on the necks of the children.

"My dear old man!" said Harley, "Providence has sent thee to relieve them; it will bless me, if I can be the means of assisting you." "Yes, indeed, sir," answered the boy; "father, when he was a-dying, bade God bless us; and prayed, that if grandfather lived, he might send him to support us."—"Where did they lay my boy?" said Edwards. "In the Old Churchyard," replied the woman, "hard<sup>8</sup> by his mother." "I will show it you," answered the boy, "for I have wept over it many a time, when first I came amongst strange folks."<sup>9</sup> He took the old man's hand, Harley laid hold of his sister's, and they walked in silence to the churchyard.

There was an old stone, with the corner broken off, and some letters, half-covered with moss, to denote the names of the dead: there was a cyphered<sup>1</sup> R. E. plainer than the rest; it was the tomb they sought. "Here it is, grandfather," said the boy. Edwards gazed upon it without uttering a word: the girl, who had only sighed before, now wept outright; her brother sobbed, but he stifled his sobbing. "I have told sister," said he, "that she should not take it so to heart; she can knit already, and I shall soon be able to dig, we shall not starve, sister, indeed we shall not, nor shall grandfather neither." The girl cried afresh; Harley kissed off her tears as they flowed, and wept between every kiss.

Chapter XXXVI. He returns home.—A description of his retinue.

It was with some difficulty that Harley prevailed on the old man to leave the spot where the remains of his son were laid. At last, with the assistance of the school-mistress, he prevailed; and she accommodated Edwards and him with beds in her house, there being nothing like an inn nearer than the distance of some miles.

In the morning, Harley persuaded Edwards to come with the children, to his house, which was distant but a short day's journey. The boy walked in his grandfather's hand; and the name of Edwards procured him a neighboring farmer's horse, on which a servant mounted, with the girl seated on a pillow before him.

With this train Harley returned to the abode of his fathers: and we cannot but think, that his enjoyment was as great as if he had arrived from the tour of Europe, with a Swiss valet for his companion, and half a dozen snuff-boxes, with invisible hinges,<sup>2</sup> in his pocket. But we take our ideas from sounds which folly has invented; Fashion, Bon ton, and Vertù,<sup>3</sup> are the names of certain idols, to which we sacrifice the genuine pleasures of the soul: in this world of semblance, we are contented with personating<sup>4</sup> happiness; to feel it is an art beyond us.

It was otherwise with Harley: he ran upstairs to his aunt, with the history of his fellow-travellers glowing on his lips. His aunt was an œconomist;<sup>5</sup> but she knew the pleasure of doing charitable things, and withal was fond of her nephew, and solicitous to oblige him. She received old Edwards therefore with a look of more complacency than is perhaps natural to maiden ladies of threescore, and was remarkably attentive to his grandchildren: she roasted apples with her own hands for their supper, and made up a little bed beside her own for the girl. Edwards made some attempts towards an acknowledgment for these favors; but his young friend stopped them in their beginnings. "Whosoever receiveth any of these children"<sup>6</sup>—said his aunt; for her acquaintance with her bible was habitual.

Early next morning, Harley stole into the room where Edwards lay: he expected to have found him a-bed; but in this he was mistaken: the old man had risen, and was leaning over his sleeping grandson, with the tears flowing down his cheeks. At first he did not perceive Harley; when he did, he endeavored to hide his grief, and crossing his eyes with his hand expressed his surprise at seeing him so early astir. "I was thinking of you," said Harley, "and your children: I learned last night that a small farm of mine in the neighborhood is now vacant: if you will occupy it, I shall gain a good neighbor, and be able in some measure to repay you the notice you took of me when a boy, and as the furniture of the house is mine, it will be so much trouble saved." Edwards's tears gushed afresh, and Harley led him to see the place he intended for him.

The house upon this farm was indeed little better than a hut; its situation, however, was pleasant, and Edwards, assisted by the beneficence of Harley, set about improving its neatness and convenience. He staked out a piece of the green before for a garden, and Peter, who acted in Harley's family as valet, butler, and gardener, had orders to furnish him with parcels of the different seeds he chose to sow in it. I have seen his master at work in this little spot, with his coat off, and his dibble<sup>7</sup> in his hand: it was a scene of tranquil virtue to have stopped an angel on his errands of mercy! Harley had contrived to lead a little bubbling brook through a green walk in the middle of the ground, upon which he had erected a mill in miniature for the diversion of Edwards's infant grandson, and made shift in its construction to introduce a pliant bit of wood, that answered with its fairy clack to the murmuring of the rill that turned it. I have seen him stand, listening to these mingled sounds, with his eye fixed on the boy, and the smile of conscious satisfaction on his cheek, while the old man, with a look half turned to Harley and half to heaven, breathed an ejaculation of gratitude and piety.

Father of mercies! I also would thank thee! that not only hast thou assigned eternal rewards to virtue, but that, even in this bad world, the lines of our duty, and our happiness, are so frequently woven together.

A FRAGMENT.<sup>8</sup> The Man of Feeling talks of what he does not understand.—An incident.

* * * "Edwards," said he, "I have a proper regard for the prosperity of my country: every native of it appropriates to himself some share of the power, or the fame, which, as a nation, it acquires; but I cannot throw off the man<sup>9</sup> so much, as to rejoice at our conquests in India. You tell me of immense territories subject to the English: I cannot think of their possessions, without being led to inquire, by what right they possess them. They came there as traders, bartering the commodities they brought for others which their purchasers could spare; and however great their profits were, they were then equitable. But what title have the subjects of another kingdom to establish an empire in India? to give laws to a country where the inhabitants received them on the terms of friendly commerce? You say they are happier under our regulations than the tyranny of their own petty princes. I must doubt it, from the conduct of those by whom these regulations have been made. They have drained the treasuries of Nabobs,<sup>1</sup> who must fill them by oppressing the industry of their subjects. Nor is this to be wondered at, when we consider the motive upon which those gentlemen do not deny their going to India. The fame of conquest, barbarous as that motive is, is but a secondary consideration: there are certain stations in wealth to which the warriors of the East<sup>2</sup> aspire. It is there indeed where the wishes of their friends assign them eminence, where the question of their country is pointed at their return. When shall I see a commander return from India in the pride of honorable poverty? You describe the victories they have gained; they are sullied by the cause in which they fought: you enumerate the spoils of those victories; they are covered with the blood of the vanquished!

"Could you tell me of some conqueror giving peace and happiness to the conquered? did he accept the gifts of their princes to use them for the comfort of those whose fathers, sons, or husbands, fell in battle? did he use his power to gain security and freedom to the regions of oppression and slavery? did he endear the British name by examples of generosity, which the most depraved are rarely able to resist? did he return with the consciousness of duty discharged to his country, and humanity to his fellow-creatures? did he return with no lace on his coat, no slaves in his retinue, no chariot at his door, and no Burgundy at his table?—these were laurels which princes might envy—which an honest man would not condemn!”

“Your maxims, Mr. Harley, are certainly right,” said Edwards. “I am not capable of arguing with you; but I imagine there are great temptations in a great degree of riches, which it is no easy matter to resist: these a poor man like me cannot describe, because he never knew them; and perhaps I have reason to bless God that I never did; for then, it is likely, I should have withstood them no better than my neighbors. For you know, sir, that it is not the fashion now, as it was in former times, that I have read of in books, when your great generals died so poor, that they did not leave wherewithal to buy them a coffin; and people thought the better of their memories for it: if they did so nowadays, I question if anybody, except yourself, and some few such, would thank them a whit.”

“I am sorry,” replied Harley, “that there is so much truth in what you say; but however the general current of opinion may point, the feelings are not yet lost that applaud benevolence, and censure inhumanity. Let us endeavor to strengthen them in ourselves; and we, who live sequestered from the noise of the multitude, have better opportunities of listening undisturbed to their voice.”

They now approached the little dwelling of Edwards. A maidservant, whom he had hired to assist him in the care of his grandchildren, met them a little way from the house: “There is a young lady within with the children,” said she. Edwards expressed his surprise at the visit: it was however not the less true; and we mean to account for it.

This young lady then was no other than Miss Walton.<sup>3</sup> She had heard the old man’s history from Harley, as we have already related. Curiosity, or some other motive, prompted her to desire to see his grandchildren: this she had an opportunity of gratifying soon, the children, in some of their walks, having strolled as far as her father's avenue. She put several questions to both; she was delighted with the simplicity of their answers, and promised, that if they continued to be good children, and do as their grandfather bid them, she would soon see them again, and bring some present or other for their reward. This promise she had performed now: she came attended only by her maid, and brought with her a complete suit of green for the boy, and a chintz gown, a cap, and a suit<sup>4</sup> of ribbons, for his sister. She had time enough, with her maid's assistance, to equip them in their new habiliments before Harley and Edwards returned. The boy heard his grandfather's voice, and, with that silent joy which his present finery inspired, ran to the door to meet him: putting one hand in his, with the other pointed to his sister, "See," said he, "what Miss Walton has brought us."—Edwards gazed on them. Harley fixed his eye on Miss Walton; hers were turned to the ground;—in Edwards's there was a beamy moisture.—He folded his hands together—"I cannot speak, young lady," said he, "to thank you." Nor could Harley neither. There were a thousand sentiments;—but they gushed so impetuously on his heart, that he could not utter a syllable. * * *

ELIZABETH RYVES

The poet, dramatist, and translator Elizabeth Ryves (1750–1797) inherited property from her family in her home country of Ireland, but she lost it in legal proceedings and went to London, where she attempted, and failed, to recover it by petitioning the government. She then tried to support herself there by writing. Though she got substantial work as a writer and translator, she remained desperately poor. Her Poems on Several Occasions appeared in 1777. A notice in the Gentleman's Magazine in 1797 printed after her death relates that when “she lodged in an obscure part of the city, she would spend her last shillings, herself unprovided with a dinner, in the purchase of a joint of meat for a starving family that occupied the floor above her.” The poem here proudly embraces a susceptibility to feeling while acknowledging its often painful costs.

Ode to Sensibility

I.

The sordid<sup>o</sup> wretch who ne'er has known,
To feel for miseries not his own;
Whose lazy pulse serenely beats,
While injured worth her wrongs repeats;
5 Dead to each sense of joy or pain,
A useless link in nature's chain,<sup>1</sup>
May boast the calm which I disdain.

II.

Give me a generous soul, that glows
With others' transports, others' woes;
Whose noble nature scorns to bend,<sup>o</sup>
10 Though Fate her iron scourge extend:
But bravely bears the galling yoke,
And smiles superior to the stroke,
With spirit free and mind unbroke.

III.

Yet, by compassion touched, not fear,
15 Sheds the soft sympathizing tear,
In tribute to affliction's claim,
Or envied merit's wounded fame.
Let Stoics scoff! I'd rather be
Thus curst with sensibility,
20 Than share their boasted apathy.<sup>2</sup>

ANN YEARSLEY

The title page of the first book of poems by Ann Yearsley (1753–1806), published in 1785, identifies her as “a Milkwoman of Bristol.” Selling milk did not generate enough income to support her, her husband (designated as “a laborer” in local records), and their five children, and by 1784 the family had fallen into extreme poverty. Among the philanthropic people who came forward to help them was the poet and reformer Hannah More (see p. 976), who learned that Yearsley wrote poetry and sponsored the publication of her first book, generating a large list of eminent subscribers, and around £600. Yearsley’s relationship with More soon soured, as the latter insisted that the book’s profits be put in trust to keep the money away from Yearsley’s husband. Publicly angry at More for her interference, Yearsley eventually gained control of her money at the expense of the support and friendship of More and her circle. Her second book, Poems on Various Subjects, by Ann Yearsley, Milkwoman of Clifton, Near Bristol (1787), found other well-connected subscribers. She continued her literary career, writing a play that was produced at Bristol in 1789 (published 1791), a long historical novel (1795), and a final volume of poetry (1796), as well as several stand-alone works, such as A Poem on the Inhumanity of the Slave Trade (1786).

The poem “Addressed to Sensibility” appears first in her second book and sets its tone. Sensibility was seen as an especially interesting topic for women poets in the period, and the word occurred in many of their poems’ titles; Hannah More’s own poem

"Sensibility" appeared in 1782. But Yearsley's work is distinguished by the complex perspective she brings to sensibility. Her own susceptibility to emotion governs her life, but she also understands that literary feeling is a refined discourse deployed by those more educated and socially elevated than herself. Her poem is crowded with various sentimental figures and scenarios conjured by memory, including a youth in Bedlam, an institution in London where the mentally ill were confined, a "haughty insult" that ended a friendship (it is hard here not to recall her relationship with More), and the tears of a pastoral figure, Lysander, which elicit the speaker's sympathy. The pain consistently caused by sensibility seems to lead Yearsley to reject it. (Later in Poems on Various Subjects, a companion poem to this one titled "To Indifference" will implore, "leave me, Sensibility!") But by the end of "Addressed to Sensibility," Yearsley seems to value the honesty of her own pain. Unlike the refined, educated, rule-bound sensibility that has become a mode of feeling affected by the wise and fashionable, Yearsley comes to embrace the rawness of her "untaught" emotions.

Addressed to Sensibility

Oh! Sensibility! Thou busy nurse
Of injuries once received, why wilt thou feed
Those serpents in the soul? their stings more fell<sup>o</sup>
Than those which writhed round Priam's priestly son;<sup>1</sup>

5 I feel them here! They rend my panting breast,
But I will tear them thence: ah! effort vain!
Disturbed they grow rapacious, while their fangs
Strike at poor Memory; wounded she deplores
Her ravished joys and murmurs o'er the past.

10 Why shrinks my soul within these prison<sup>2</sup> walls
Where wretches shake their chains? III-fated youth,<sup>3</sup>
Why does thine eye run wildly o'er my form,
Pointed with fond enquiry? 'Tis not me
Thy restless thought would find; the silent tear
Steals gently down his cheek: ah! could my arms
15 Afford thee refuge, I would bear thee hence
To a more peaceful dwelling. Vain the wish!
Thy powers are all unhinged, and thou wouldst sit Insensible to sympathy: farewell.
Lamented being! ever lost to hope,
20 I leave thee, yea despair myself of cure.

For, oh, my bosom bleeds, while griefs like thine
Increase the recent pang. Pensive I rove,
More wounded than the hart,<sup>o</sup> whose side yet holds
The deadly arrow: friendship, boast no more 25 Thy hoard of joys, o'er which my soul oft hung;
Like the too anxious miser o'er his gold.
My treasures are all wrecked; I quit the scene

Where haughty insult cut the sacred ties
Which long had held us: Cruel Julius!<sup>4</sup> take 30 My last adieu. The wound thou gav'st is death,
Nor canst e'en thou recall<sup>o</sup> my frightened sense
With friendship's pleasing sound; yet while I clasp
Thy valued image to my aching mind,
And viewing that, forgive thee; will deplore
35 The blow that severed two congenial souls!

Officious<sup>o</sup> Sensibility! 'tis thine<sup>5</sup>
To give the finest anguish, to dissolve
The dross<sup>o</sup> of spirit, till all essence, she Refines on real woe; from thence extracts
40 Sad unexisting phantoms, never seen.

Yet, dear ideal mourner, be thou near
When on Lysander's<sup>6</sup> tears I silent gaze;
Then, with thy viewless pencil,<sup>o</sup> form his sigh,
His deepest groan, his sorrow-tinged thought,
45 With immature impatience, cold despair
With all the tort'ring images that play,
In sable hue, within his wasted mind.

And when this dreary group shall meet my thought,
Oh! throw my pow'rs upon a fertile space,
50 Where mingles ev'ry varied soft relief.
Without thee, I could offer but the dregs
Of vulgar consolation; from her cup
He turns the eye, nor dare it soil his lip!
Raise thou my friendly hand; mix thou the draught
55 More pure than ether, as ambrosia clear,
Fit only for the soul; thy chalice fill
With drops of sympathy, which swiftly fall
From my afflicted heart: yet—yet beware,
Nor stoop to seize from passion's warmer clime

60 A poisonous sweet.—Bright cherub, safely rove
 Through all the deep recesses of the soul!
 Float on her raptures, deeper tinge her woes,
 Strengthen emotion, higher waft her sigh,
 Sit in the tearful orb, and ardent gaze
 65 On joy or sorrow. But thy empire ends
 Within the line of SPIRIT. My rough soul,
 O Sensibility! defenseless hails
 Thy feelings most acute. Yet, ye who boast
 Of bliss I ne'er must reach, ye, who can fix<sup>o</sup>
 70 A rule for sentiment, if rules there are,
 (For much I doubt, my friends, if rule e'er held Capacious sentiment) ye sure can point
 My mind to joys that never touched the heart.
 What is this joy? Where does its essence rest?
 75 Ah! self-confounding sophists,<sup>z</sup> will ye dare
 Pronounce that joy which never touched the heart?<sup>8</sup>
 Does education give the transport keen,
 Or swell your vaunted grief? No, Nature feels
 Most poignant, undefended, hails with me
 80 The Powers of Sensibility untaught.

FRANCES BURNEY

1752–1840

In the early twentieth century, Virginia Woolf described Frances Burney as “the mother of English fiction.” Burney herself also rightly emphasized the originality of her work. At the age of twenty-six, she pitched the idea for her first novel, Evelina (1778), to the bookseller who would publish it: “I believe it has not before been executed, though it seems a fair field open for the Novelist.” Yet, Burney’s claim for the novel’s originality—in the letter to the bookseller and, more cautiously yet palpably, at the end of the novel’s preface—also relies on her deep understanding of her distinguished predecessors in novel writing. Evelina is an epistolary novel (presented as a series of letters), a form influentially employed in Samuel Richardson’s Pamela (1740) and Clarissa (1747–48) as a way to depict characters’ emotions at the very moment they write, in the midst of the plot, not knowing the outcome. But Burney combines a Richardsonian moral sensibility with a bright comic vein evident in some of the other predecessors her preface cites, like Henry Fielding and Tobias Smollett. Burney’s writing crackles with humor and can be relentless in satirically exposing bad manners or a selfish heart.

Burney did not divulge her identity to that bookseller, nor confide in anybody except two siblings and a cousin about the composition of the novel, nor put her name on the title page when the book appeared. Only after its publication did delighted readers, including Samuel Johnson, Hester Thrale, and her father Charles Burney, find her out and sing her praises. Burney's father was a popular teacher and historian of music, and her family's London social circle included famous writers, actors, and musicians. Though she was shy and not encouraged by her father as much as her sisters, Burney educated herself and honed her intellect and observational skill among this cultured elite. She also learned the book business by helping her father prepare his own work for the press. As a teenager, she had drafted a version (now lost) of Evelina's backstory. Her first novel features, as Evelina's subtitle explains, "a young lady's entrance into the world," that is, the world of London high society. Evelina, a beautiful ingénue from the country, stumbles in learning the codes that govern conduct at public resorts and private parties and that shape taste, desire, and love. The selections reprinted here occur early in the novel, when Evelina first encounters London social life and learns, to her cost, how rules of politeness can serve as vehicles for aggression. It may be tempting to draw parallels between Burney's inexperienced first heroine and Burney herself at her literary debut—as the novel's preface and other introductory material encourage—but such parallels only go so far. Though Evelina widened Burney's acquaintance and buoyed her confidence with praise from powerful advocates, she did not begin her career artlessly and seemed to comprehend her own genius from the beginning. For the rest of her career as the most formidable English novelist of the late eighteenth century, Burney would continue to test the novel's range, dropping the epistolary style for a detached, sometimes severe, third-person narrator. Cecilia (1782) expanded her satirical and sentimental scope to present the fashionable world of London as a kind of wasteland; the immensely popular Camilla (1796) again mixed comedy and romantic feeling to portray the trials in love and life of a family's siblings; and her final novel, The Wanderer (1814), explored the possibilities of historical fiction, employing Gothic touches against a background of the French Revolution.

Burney's home life was tumultuous. She and her stepmother disliked each other, and Burney fell in love with a young clergyman who never got around to proposing. In 1786, to please her father, she accepted a place as a lady-in-waiting at court, where the paralyzing etiquette and lack of independence tormented her for the next five years, until she finally managed to resign. At forty-one she married a French émigré, General Alexandre-Gabriel-Jean-Baptiste d'Arblay. Despite the disapproval of her father—d'Arblay was penniless, Catholic, and politically liberal—the marriage was happy. Madame d'Arblay soon bore a son, and her fictions brought in good money. After she joined her husband in France, in 1802, the Napoleonic Wars prevented them from returning to England for ten years.

Burney never stopped writing—not only novels and plays but perpetual letters and journals, recording whatever she saw for friends and family as well as herself. These diaries and letters, edited after her death by a niece, made her famous again in the nineteenth century. Even the most informal pages display Burney's gifts: a knack for catching character, a wonderful ear for dialogue, wry humor, and a swift pace that carries the reader along from moment to moment. Her special subject is embarrassment—often her own. Her clear-eyed view of the world can also be incredibly painful, as in her gripping account of a mastectomy. In her first journal entry, she frees herself to write with utter honesty by pretending that nobody is going to read her. But her private thoughts are reported so fully and faithfully that, in the end, every reader can share them.

Preface

In the republic of letters, there is no member of such inferior rank, or who is so much disdained by his brethren of the quill,<sup>2</sup> as the humble novelist: nor is his fate less hard in the world at large, since, among the whole class of writers, perhaps not one can be named of which the votaries are more numerous but less respectable.

Yet, while in the annals of those few of our predecessors, to whom this species of writing is indebted for being saved from contempt, and rescued from depravity, we can trace such names as Rousseau, Johnson,<sup>3</sup> Marivaux, Fielding, Richardson, and Smollett, no man need blush at starting from the same post, though many, nay, most men, may sigh at finding themselves distanced.<sup>4</sup>

The following letters are presented to the public—for such, by novel writers, novel readers will be called,—with a very singular mixture of timidity and confidence, resulting from the peculiar situation of the editor,<sup>5</sup> who, though trembling for their success from a consciousness of their imperfections, yet fears not being involved in their disgrace, while happily wrapped up in a mantle of impenetrable obscurity.

To draw characters from nature, though not from life,<sup>6</sup> and to mark the manners of the times, is the attempted plan of the following letters. For this purpose, a young female, educated in the most secluded retirement, makes, at the age of seventeen, her first appearance upon the great and busy stage of life; with a virtuous mind, a cultivated understanding, and a feeling heart, her ignorance of the forms,<sup>7</sup> and inexperience in the manners of the world, occasion all the little incidents which these volumes record, and which form the natural progression of the life of a young woman of obscure birth, but conspicuous beauty, for the first six months after her entrance into the world.

Perhaps were it possible to effect the total extirpation of novels, our young ladies in general, and boarding-school damsels in particular, might profit from their annihilation; but since the distemper they have spread seems incurable, since their contagion bids defiance to the medicine of advice or reprehension, and since they are found to baffle all the mental art of physic, save what is prescribed by the slow regimen of time, and bitter diet of experience, surely all attempts to contribute to the number of those which may be read, if not with advantage, at least without injury, ought rather to be encouraged than contemned.

Let me, therefore, prepare for disappointment those who, in the perusal of these sheets, entertain the gentle expectation of being transported to the fantastic regions of romance, where fiction is colored by all the gay tints of luxurious imagination, where reason is an outcast, and where the sublimity of the marvelous rejects all aid from sober probability. The heroine of these memoirs, young, artless, and inexperienced, is but the offspring of nature, and of nature in her simplest attire.

No faultless Monster that the world ne'er saw;<sup>8</sup>

In all the arts, the value of copies can only be proportioned to the scarceness of originals: among sculptors and painters, a fine statue, or a beautiful picture, of some great master, may deservedly employ the imitative talents of younger and inferior artists, that their appropriation to one spot may not wholly prevent the more general expansion of their excellence;<sup>9</sup> but, among authors, the reverse is the case, since the noblest productions of literature are almost equally attainable with the meanest. In books, therefore, imitation cannot be shunned too sedulously; for the very perfection of a model which is frequently seen, serves but more forcibly to mark the inferiority of a copy.

To avoid what is common, without adopting what is unnatural, must limit the ambition of the vulgar herd of authors: however zealous, therefore, my veneration of the great writers I have mentioned, however I may feel myself enlightened by the knowledge of Johnson, charmed with the eloquence of Rousseau, softened by the pathetic<sup>1</sup> powers of Richardson, and exhilarated by the wit of Fielding and humor of Smollett, I yet presume not to attempt pursuing the same ground which they have tracked; whence, though they may have cleared the weeds, they have also culled the flowers, and, though they have rendered the path plain, they have left it barren.

The candor of my readers I have not the impertinence to doubt, and to their indulgence I am sensible I have no claim; I have, therefore, only to entreat, that my own words may not pronounce my condemnation; and that what I have here ventured to say in regard to imitation, may be understood, as it is meant, in a general sense, and not be imputed to an opinion of my own originality, which I have not the vanity, the folly, or the blindness, to entertain.

Whatever may be the fate of these letters, the editor is satisfied they will meet with justice; and commits them to the press, though hopeless of fame, yet not regardless of censure.

EVELINA TO THE REV. MR. VILLARS.<sup>1</sup>

Howard Grove, March 26.

This house seems to be the house of joy; every face wears a smile, and a laugh is at everybody's service. It is quite amusing to walk about, and see the general confusion; a room leading to the garden is fitting up for Captain Mirvan's study.<sup>2</sup> Lady Howard does not sit a moment in a place; Miss Mirvan is making caps; everybody so busy!—such flying from room to room!—so many orders given, and retracted, and given again!—Nothing but hurry and perturbation.

Well but my dear Sir, I am desired to make a request to you. I hope you will not think me an encroacher; Lady Howard insists upon my writing!—Yet I hardly know how to go on; a petition implies a want,—and have you left me one? No, indeed.

I am half ashamed of myself for beginning this letter. But these dear ladies are so pressing—I cannot, for my life, resist wishing for the pleasures they offer me,—provided you do not disapprove them.

They are to make a very short stay in town.<sup>3</sup> The Captain will meet them in a day or two. Mrs. Mirvan and her sweet daughter both go;—what a happy party! Yet, I am not very eager to accompany them: at least, I shall be contented to remain where I am, if you desire that I should.

Assured, my dearest Sir, of your goodness, your bounty, and your indulgent kindness, ought I to form a wish that has not your sanction? Decide for me, therefore, without the least apprehension that I shall be uneasy, or discontented. While I am yet in suspense, perhaps I may hope, but I am most certain, that when you have once determined, I shall not repine.

They tell me that London is now in full splendor. Two playhouses are open,—the Opera-House,—Ranelagh,—and the Pantheon.<sup>4</sup>—You see I have learned all their names. However, pray don't suppose that I make any point of going, for I shall hardly sigh to see them depart without me; though I shall probably never meet with such another opportunity. And, indeed, their domestic happiness will be so great,—it is natural to wish to partake of it.

I believe I am bewitched! I made a resolution when I began, that I would not be urgent; but my pen—or rather my thoughts, will not suffer me to keep it—for I acknowledge, I must acknowledge, I cannot help wishing for your permission.

I almost repent already that I have made this confession; pray forget that you have read it, if this journey is displeasing to you. But I will not write any longer; for the more I think of this affair, the less indifferent to it I find myself.

Adieu, my most honored, most revered, most beloved father! For by what other name can I call you? I have no happiness or sorrow, no hope or fear, but what your kindness bestows, or your displeasure may cause. You will not, I am sure, send a refusal without reasons unanswerable, and therefore I shall cheerfully acquiesce. Yet I hope—I hope you will be able to permit me to go! I am, with the utmost affection, gratitude, and duty, your

MR. VILLARS TO EVELINA.

Berry-Hill, March 28.

To resist the urgency of entreaty is a power which I have not yet acquired: I aim not at an authority which deprives you of liberty, yet I would fain guide myself by a prudence which should save me the pangs of repentance. Your impatience to fly to a place which your imagination has painted to you in colors so attractive surprises me not; I have only to hope that the liveliness of your fancy may not deceive you: to refuse, would be raising it still higher. To see my Evelina happy is to see myself without a wish: go then my child; and may that Heaven, which alone can, direct, preserve, and strengthen you! To that, my love, will I daily offer prayers for your felicity; O may it guard, watch over you! Defend you from danger, save you from distress, and keep vice as distant from your person as from your heart! And to me, may it grant the ultimate blessing of closing these aged eyes in the arms of one so dear—so deservedly beloved!

Volume I, Letter X

EVELINA TO THE REV. MR. VILLARS.

Queen-Ann-Street, London,<sup>6</sup> Saturday, April 2.

This moment arrived. Just going to Drury-Lane theatre. The celebrated Mr. Garrick performs Ranger.<sup>7</sup> I am quite in ecstasy. So is Miss Mirvan. How fortunate, that he should happen to play! We would not let Mrs. Mirvan rest till she consented to go; her chief objection was to our dress, for we have had no time to Londonize ourselves; but we teased her into compliance, and so we are to sit in some obscure place, that she may not be seen. As to me, I should be alike unknown in the most conspicuous or most private part of the house.

I can write no more now. I have hardly time to breathe—only just this, the houses and streets are not quite so superb as I expected. However, I have seen nothing yet, so I ought not to judge.

Well, adieu, my dearest Sir, for the present; I could not forbear writing a few words instantly on my arrival; though I suppose my letter of thanks for your consent is still on the road.

Saturday Night.

O my dear Sir, in what raptures am I returned! Well may Mr. Garrick be so celebrated, so universally admired—I had not any idea of so great a performer.

Such ease! such vivacity in his manner! such grace in his motions! such fire and meaning in his eyes!—I could hardly believe he had studied a written part, for every word seemed to be uttered from the impulse of the moment.

His action—at once so graceful and so free!—his voice—so clear, so melodious, yet so wonderfully various in its tones!—such animation!—Every look speaks!

I would have given the world to have had the whole play acted over again. And when he danced—O how I envied Clarinda!<sup>8</sup> I almost wished to have jumped on the stage and joined them.

I am afraid you will think me mad, so I won't say any more; yet, I really believe Mr. Garrick would make you mad too, if you could see him. I intend to ask Mrs. Mirvan to go to the play every night while we stay in town. She is extremely kind to me, and Maria, her charming daughter, is the sweetest girl in the world.

I shall write to you every evening all that passes in the day, and that in the same manner as, if I could see, I should tell you.

Sunday.

This morning we went to Portland chapel, and afterwards we walked in the mall of St. James's Park,<sup>9</sup> which by no means answered my expectations: it is a long straight walk, of dirty gravel, very uneasy to the feet; and at each end, instead of an open prospect, nothing is to be seen but houses built of brick. When Mrs. Mirvan pointed out the Palace<sup>1</sup> to me—I think I was never much more surprised.

However, the walk was very agreeable to us; everybody looked gay, and seemed pleased, and the ladies were so much dressed, that Miss Mirvan and I could do nothing but look at them. Mrs. Mirvan met several of her friends. No wonder, for I never saw so many people assembled together before. I looked about for some of my acquaintance, but in vain, for I saw not one person that I knew, which is very odd, for all the world seemed there.

Mrs. Mirvan says we are not to walk in the park again next Sunday, even if we should be in town, because there is better company in Kensington Gardens.<sup>2</sup> But really if you had seen how much every body was dressed, you would not think that possible.

Monday.

We are to go this evening to a private ball, given by Mrs. Stanley, a very fashionable lady of Mrs. Mirvan's acquaintance.

We have been a-shopping, as Mrs. Mirvan calls it, all this morning, to buy silks, caps, gauzes, and so forth.

The shops are really very entertaining, especially the mercers;<sup>3</sup> there seem to be six or seven men belonging to each shop, and every one took care, by bowing and smirking, to be noticed; we were conducted from one to another, and carried from room to room, with so much ceremony, that at first I was almost afraid to go on.

I thought I should never have chosen a silk, for they produced so many I knew not which to fix upon, and they recommended them all so strongly, that I fancy they thought I only wanted persuasion to buy every thing they showed me. And, indeed, they took so much trouble, that I was almost ashamed I could not.

At the milliners, the ladies we met were so much dressed, that I should rather have imagined they were making visits than purchases. But what most diverted me was, that we were more frequently served by men than by women; and such men! so finical, so affected! They seemed to understand every part of a woman's dress better than we do ourselves; and they recommended caps and ribbands with an air of so much importance, that I wished to ask them how long they had left off wearing them!<sup>4</sup>

"Ridiculous Taste, or the Ladies Absurdity," 1771, Matthias (or Matthew) Darly. This print satirizes fashionable hairdos worn by upper-class women, which, according to social commentators, had grown to extreme proportions. The hairdresser ascends a ladder to complete his work, while the lady's husband uses a sextant to measure its altitude.

The dispatch with which they work in these great shops is amazing, for they have promised me a complete suit of linen against<sup>5</sup> the evening.

I have just had my hair dressed. You can't think how oddly my head feels; full of powder and black pins, and a great cushion on the top of it.<sup>6</sup> I believe you would hardly know me, for my face looks quite different to what it did before my hair was dressed. When I shall be able to make use of a comb for myself I cannot tell, for my hair is so much entangled, frizzled they call it, that I fear it will be very difficult.

I am half afraid of this ball tonight, for, you know, I have never danced but at school; however, Miss Mirvan says there is nothing in it. Yet, I wish it was over.

Adieu, my dear Sir; pray excuse the wretched stuff I write, perhaps I may improve by being in this town, and then my letters will be less unworthy your reading. Meantime, I am, your dutiful and affectionate, though unpolished, EVELINA.

Poor Miss Mirvan cannot wear one of the caps she made, because they dress her hair too large for them.

EVELINA IN CONTINUATION.

Queen-Ann-Street, April 5, Tuesday morning.

I have a vast deal to say, and shall give all this morning to my pen. As to my plan of writing every evening the adventures of the day, I find it impracticable; for the diversions here are so very late, that if I begin my letters after them, I could not go to bed at all.

We passed a most extraordinary evening. A private ball this was called, so I expected to have seen about four or five couple; but Lord! my dear Sir, I believe I saw half the world! Two very large rooms were full of company; in one were cards for the elderly ladies, and in the other were the dancers. My mamma Mirvan, for she always calls me her child, said she would sit with Maria and me till we were provided with partners, and then join the card-players.

The gentlemen, as they passed and re-passed, looked as if they thought we were quite at their disposal, and only waiting for the honor of their commands; and they sauntered about, in a careless indolent manner, as if with a view to keep us in suspense. I don't speak of this in regard to Miss Mirvan and myself only, but to the ladies in general: and I thought it so provoking, that I determined in my own mind that, far from humoring such airs, I would rather not dance at all, than with any one who would seem to think me ready to accept the first partner who would condescend to take me.

Not long after, a young man, who had for some time looked at us with a kind of negligent impertinence, advanced, on tiptoe, towards me; he had a set smile on his face, and his dress was so foppish, that I really believed he even wished to be stared at; and yet he was very ugly.

Bowing almost to the ground with a sort of swing, and waving his hand with the greatest conceit, after a short and silly pause, he said, "Madam—may I presume?"—and stopped, offering to take my hand. I drew it back, but could scarce forbear laughing. "Allow me, Madam," (continued he, affectedly breaking off every half moment), "the honor and happiness—if I am not so unhappy as to address you too late—to have the happiness and honor—"

Again he would have taken my hand, but bowing my head, I begged to be excused, and turned to Miss Mirvan to conceal my laughter. He then desired to know if I had already engaged myself to some more fortunate man? I said No, and that I believed I should not dance at all. He would keep himself, he told me, disengaged, in hopes I should relent; and then, uttering some ridiculous speeches of sorrow and disappointment, though his face still wore the same invariable smile, he retreated.

It so happened, as we have since recollected, that during this little dialogue, Mrs. Mirvan was conversing with the lady of the house. And very soon after, another gentleman, who seemed about six-and-twenty years old, gaily but not foppishly dressed, and indeed extremely handsome, with an air of mixed politeness and gallantry, desired to know if I was engaged, or would honor him with my hand. So he was pleased to say, though I am sure I know not what honor he could receive from me; but these sort of expressions, I find, are used as words of course,<sup>7</sup> without any distinction of persons, or study of propriety.

Well, I bowed, and I am sure I colored; for indeed I was frightened at the thoughts of dancing before so many people, all strangers, and, which was worse, with a stranger; however, that was unavoidable, for though I looked round the room several times, I could not see one person that I knew. And so he took my hand, and led me to join in the dance.

The minuets were over<sup>8</sup> before we arrived, for we were kept late by the milliner's making us wait for our things.

He seemed very desirous of entering into conversation with me; but I was seized with such a panic, that I could hardly speak a word, and nothing but the shame of so soon changing my mind prevented my returning to my seat, and declining to dance at all.

He appeared to be surprised at my terror, which I believe was but too apparent: however, he asked no questions, though I fear he must think it very strange; for I did not choose to tell him it was owing to my never before dancing but with a school-girl.

His conversation was sensible and spirited; his air and address were open and noble; his manners gentle, attentive, and infinitely engaging; his person is all elegance, and his countenance, the most animated and expressive I have ever seen.

In a short time we were joined by Miss Mirvan, who stood next couple to us. But how I was startled when she whispered me that my partner was a nobleman! This gave me a new alarm; how will he be provoked, thought I, when he finds what a simple rustic<sup>9</sup> he has honored with his choice! one whose ignorance of the world makes her perpetually fear doing something wrong!

That he should be so much my superior in every way quite disconcerted me; and you will suppose my spirits were not much raised, when I heard a lady, in passing us, say, "This is the most difficult dance I ever saw."

"O dear, then," cried Maria to her partner, "with your leave, I'll sit down till the next."

"So will I too, then," cried I, "for I am sure I can hardly stand."

"But you must speak to your partner first," answered she; for he had turned aside to talk with some gentlemen. However, I had not sufficient courage to address him, and so away we all three tripped,<sup>1</sup> and seated ourselves at another end of the room.

But, unfortunately for me, Miss Mirvan soon after suffered herself to be prevailed upon to attempt the dance; and just as she rose to go, she cried, "My dear, yonder is your partner, Lord Orville, walking about the room in search of you."

"Don't leave me then, dear girl!" cried I; but she was obliged to go. And now I was more uneasy than ever; I would have given the world to have seen Mrs. Mirvan, and begged of her to make my apologies; for what, thought I, can I possibly say to him in excuse for running away? He must either conclude me a fool, or half mad; for any one brought up in the great world, and accustomed to its ways, can have no idea of such sort of fears as mine.

My confusion increased when I observed that he was everywhere seeking me, with apparent perplexity and surprise; but when, at last, I saw him move towards the place where I sat, I was ready to sink with shame and distress. I found it absolutely impossible to keep my seat, because I could not think of a word to say for myself, and so I rose, and walked hastily towards the card-room, resolving to stay with Mrs. Mirvan the rest of the evening, and not to dance at all. But before I could find her, Lord Orville saw and approached me.

He begged to know if I was not well? You may easily imagine how much I was embarrassed. I made no answer; but hung my head like a fool, and looked on my fan.

He then, with an air the most respectfully serious, asked if he had been so unhappy as to offend me?

"No, indeed!" cried I, and, in hopes of changing the discourse, and preventing his further inquiries, I desired to know if he had seen the young lady who had been conversing with me?

No;—but would I honor him with any commands to her?

"O, by no means!"

Was there any other person with whom I wished to speak?

I said no, before I knew I had answered at all.

Should he have the pleasure of bringing me any refreshment?

I bowed, almost involuntarily. And away he flew.

I was quite ashamed of being so troublesome, and so much above myself as these seeming airs made me appear; but indeed I was too much confused to think or act with any consistency.

If he had not been swift as lightning, I don't know whether I should not have stolen away again; but he returned in a moment. When I had drank a glass of lemonade, he hoped, he said, that I would again honor him with my hand, as a new dance was just begun. I had not the presence of mind to say a single word, and so I let him once more lead me to the place I had left.

Shocked to find how silly, how childish a part I had acted, my former fears of dancing before such a company, and with such a partner, returned more forcibly than ever. I suppose he perceived my uneasiness, for he entreated me to sit down again, if dancing was disagreeable to me. But I was quite satisfied with the folly I had already shown; and therefore declined his offer, though I was really scarce able to stand.

Under such conscious disadvantages, you may easily imagine, my dear Sir, how ill I acquitted myself. But, though I both expected and deserved to find him very much mortified and displeased at his ill fortune in the choice he had made, yet, to my very great relief, he appeared to be even contented, and very much assisted and encouraged me. These people in high life have too much presence of mind, I believe, to seem disconcerted, or out of humor, however they may feel: for had I been the person of the most consequence in the room, I could not have met with more attention and respect.

When the dance was over, seeing me still very much flurried, he led me to a seat, saying that he would not suffer me to fatigue myself from politeness.

And then, if my capacity, or even if my spirits had been better, in how animated a conversation I might have been engaged! It was then I saw that the rank of Lord Orville was his least recommendation, his understanding and his manners being far more distinguished. His remarks upon the company in general were so apt, so just, so lively, I am almost surprised myself that they did not reanimate me; but indeed I was too well convinced of the ridiculous part I had myself played before so nice<sup>2</sup> an observer, to be able to enjoy his pleasantry: so self-compassion gave me feeling for others. Yet I had not the courage to attempt either to defend them or to rally in my turn, but listened to him in silent embarrassment.

When he found this, he changed the subject, and talked of public places, and public performers; but he soon discovered that I was totally ignorant of them.

He then, very ingeniously, turned the discourse to the amusements and occupations of the country.

It now struck me that he was resolved to try whether or not I was capable of talking upon any subject. This put so great a constraint upon my thoughts, that I was unable to go further than a monosyllable, and not ever so far, when I could possibly avoid it.

We were sitting in this manner, he conversing with all gaiety, I looking down with all foolishness, when that fop who had first asked me to dance, with a most ridiculous solemnity approached, and, after a profound bow or two, said, "I humbly beg pardon, Madam,—and of you too, my Lord,—for breaking in upon such agreeable conversation—which must, doubtless, be much more delectable—than what I have the honor to offer—but—"

I interrupted him—I blush for my folly—with laughing; yet I could not help it; for, added to the man's stately foppishness, (and he actually took snuff between every three words) when I looked round at Lord Orville, I saw such extreme surprise in his face,—the cause of which appeared so absurd, that I could not for my life preserve my gravity.

I had not laughed before from the time I had left Miss Mirvan, and I had much better have cried then; Lord Orville actually stared at me; the beau, I know not his name, looked quite enraged. "Refrain—Madam," (said he, with an important air) "a few moments refrain!—I have but a sentence to trouble you with.—May I know to what accident I must attribute not having the honor of your hand?"

"Accident, Sir!" repeated I, much astonished.

"Yes, accident, Madam—for surely,—I must take the liberty to observe—pardon me, Madam,—it ought to be no common one—that should tempt a lady—so young a one too,—to be guilty of ill-manners."

A confused idea now for the first time entered my head, of something I had heard of the rules of an assembly; but I was never at one before—I have only danced at school—and so giddy and heedless I was, that I had not once considered the impropriety of refusing one partner, and afterwards accepting another. I was thunderstruck at the recollection: but, while these thoughts were rushing into my head, Lord Orville, with some warmth, said, "This lady, Sir, is incapable of meriting such an accusation!"

The creature—for I am very angry with him—made a low bow and with a grin the most malicious I ever saw, "My Lord," said he,

"far be it from me to accuse the lady, for having the discernment to distinguish and prefer—the superior attractions of your Lordship."

Again he bowed, and walked off.

Was ever any thing so provoking? I was ready to die with shame. "What a coxcomb!" exclaimed Lord Orville: while I, without knowing what I did, rose hastily, and moving off, "I can't imagine," cried I, "where Mrs. Mirvan has hid herself!"

"Give me leave to see," answered he. I bowed and sat down again, not daring to meet his eyes; for what must he think of me, between my blunder, and the supposed preference?

He returned in a moment, and told me that Mrs. Mirvan was at cards, but would be glad to see me; and I went immediately. There was but one chair vacant, so, to my great relief, Lord Orville presently left us. I then told Mrs. Mirvan my disasters, and she good-naturedly blamed herself for not having better instructed me, but said she had taken it for granted that I must know such common customs. However, the man may, I think, be satisfied with his pretty speech, and carry his resentment no farther.

In a short time, Lord Orville returned. I consented, with the best grace I could, to go down another dance, for I had had time to recollect myself; and therefore resolved to use some exertion, and, if possible, to appear less a fool than I had hitherto done; for it occurred to me, that, insignificant as I was, compared to a man of his rank and figure, yet, since he had been so unfortunate as to make choice of me for a partner, why I should endeavor to make the best of it.

The dance, however, was short, and he spoke very little; so I had no opportunity of putting my resolution in practice. He was satisfied, I suppose, with his former successful efforts to draw me out; or, rather, I fancied he had been inquiring who I was. This again disconcerted me, and the spirits I had determined to exert, again failed me. Tired, ashamed, and mortified, I begged to sit down till we returned home, which we did soon after. Lord Orville did me the honor to hand me to the coach, talking all the way of the honor I had done him! O these fashionable people!

Well, my dear Sir, was it not a strange evening? I could not help being thus particular, because, to me, every thing is so new. But it is now time to conclude. I am, with all love and duty, your

EVELINA IN CONTINUATION.

Tuesday, April 5.

There is to be no end to the troubles of last night. I have this moment, between persuasion and laughter, gathered from Maria the most curious dialogue that ever I heard. You will, at first, be startled at my vanity; but, my dear Sir, have patience!

It must have passed while I was sitting with Mrs. Mirvan, in the card-room. Maria was taking some refreshment, and saw Lord Orville advancing for the same purpose himself; but he did not know her, though she immediately recollected him. Presently after, a very gay-looking man, stepping hastily up to him cried, "Why, my Lord, what have you done with your lovely partner?"

"Nothing!" answered Lord Orville, with a smile and a shrug.

"By Jove," cried the man, "she is the most beautiful creature I ever saw in my life!"

Lord Orville, as he well might, laughed, but answered, "Yes, a pretty modest-looking girl."

"O my Lord!" cried the madman, "she is an angel!"

"A silent one," returned he.

"Why ay, my Lord, how stands she as to that? She looks all intelligence and expression."

"A poor weak girl!" answered Lord Orville, shaking his head.

"By Jove," cried the other, "I am glad to hear it!"

At that moment, the same odious creature who had been my former tormentor joined them. Addressing Lord Orville with great respect, he said, "I beg pardon, my Lord,—if I was—as I fear might be the case—rather too severe in my censure of the lady who is honored with your protection—but, my Lord, ill-breeding is apt to provoke a man."

"Ill-breeding!" cried my unknown champion, "impossible! that elegant face can never be so vile a mask!"

"O Sir, as to that," answered he, "you must allow me to judge; for though I pay all deference to your opinion—in other things,—yet I hope you will grant—and I appeal to your Lordship also—that I am not totally despicable as a judge of good or ill-manners."

"I was so wholly ignorant," said Lord Orville, gravely, "of the provocation you might have had, that I could not but be surprised at your singular resentment."

"It was far from my intention," answered he, "to offend your Lordship; but, really, for a person who is nobody, to give herself such airs,—I own I could not command my passions. For, my Lord, though I have made diligent inquiry—I cannot learn who she is."

"By what I can make out," cried my defender, "she must be a country parson's daughter."

"He! he! he! very good, 'pon honor!" cried the fop,—"well, so I could have sworn by her manners."

And then, delighted at his own wit, he laughed, and went away, as I suppose, to repeat it.

Full p. C-1055 Shorter p. 1513

"But what the deuce is all this?" demanded the other.

"Why a very foolish affair," answered Lord Orville; "your Helen<sup>3</sup> first refused this coxcomb, and then—danced with me. This is all I can gather of it."

"O, Orville," returned he, "you are a happy man!—But ill-bred?—I can never believe it! And she looks too sensible to be ignorant."

"Whether ignorant or mischievous, I will not pretend to determine, but certain it is, she attended to all I could say to her, though I have really fatigued myself with fruitless endeavors to entertain her, with the most immovable gravity; but no sooner did Lovel begin his complaint, than she was seized with a fit of laughing, first affronting the poor beau, and then enjoying his mortification."

"Ha! ha! ha! why there's some genius in that, my Lord, perhaps rather—rustic."

Here Maria was called to dance, and so heard no more.

Now, tell me, my dear Sir, did you ever know any thing more provoking? "A poor weak girl!" "ignorant or mischievous!" What mortifying words! I am resolved, however, that I will never again be tempted to go to an assembly. I wish I had been in Dorsetshire.

Well, after this, you will not be surprised that Lord Orville contented himself with an inquiry after our healths this morning, by his servant, without troubling himself to call; as Miss Mirvan had told me he would: but perhaps it may be only a country custom.

I would not live here for the world. I care not how soon we leave town. London soon grows tiresome. I wish the Captain would come. Mrs. Mirvan talks of the opera for this evening; however, I am very indifferent about it.

Wednesday morning.

Well, my dear Sir, I have been pleased, against my will, I could almost say, for I must own I went out in very ill humor, which I think you cannot wonder at: but the music and the singing were charming; they soothed me into a pleasure the most grateful, the best suited to my present disposition in the world. I hope to persuade Mrs. Mirvan to go again on Saturday. I wish the opera was every night. It is, of all entertainments, the sweetest and most delightful. Some of the songs seemed to melt my very soul. It was what they call a serious opera, as the comic<sup>4</sup> first singer was ill.

Tonight we go to Ranelagh. If any of those three gentlemen who conversed so freely about me should be there—but I won't think of it.

Thursday morning.

Well, my dear Sir, we went to Ranelagh. It is a charming place, and the brilliancy of the lights, on my first entrance, made me almost think I was in some enchanted castle, or fairy palace, for all looked like magic to me.

The very first person I saw was Lord Orville. I felt so confused!—but he did not see me. After tea, Mrs. Mirvan being tired, Maria and I walked round the room alone. Then again we saw him, standing by the orchestra. We, too, stopped to hear a singer. He bowed to me; I curtsied, and I am sure I colored. We soon walked on, not liking our situation: however, he did not follow us, and when we passed by the orchestra again, he was gone. Afterwards, in the course of the evening, we met him several times, but he was always with some party, and never spoke to us, though whenever he chanced to meet my eyes, he condescended to bow.

I cannot but be hurt at the opinion he entertains of me. It is true, my own behavior incurred it—yet he is himself the most agreeable, and, seemingly, the most amiable man in the world, and therefore it is, that I am grieved to be thought ill of by him: for of whose esteem ought we to be ambitious, if not of those who most merit our own?—But it is too late to reflect upon this now. Well I can't help it;—however, I think I have done with assemblies!

This morning was destined for seeing sights, auctions, curious shops, and so forth; but my head ached, and I was not in a humor to be amused, and so I made them go without me, though very unwillingly. They are all kindness.

And now I am sorry I did not accompany them, for I know not what to do with myself. I had resolved not to go to the play tonight; but I believe I shall. In short, I hardly care whether I do or not.

* * *

I thought I had done wrong! Mrs. Mirvan and Maria have been half the town over, and so entertained!—while I, like a fool, stayed at home to do nothing. And, at the auction in Pall-mall,<sup>5</sup> who should they meet but Lord Orville! He sat next to Mrs. Mirvan, and they talked a great deal together: but she gave me no account of the conversation.

I may never have such another opportunity of seeing London; I am quite sorry that I was not of the party; but I deserve this mortification, for having indulged my ill-humor.

Thursday night.

We are just returned from the play, which was King Lear,<sup>6</sup> and has made me very sad. We did not see any body we knew.

Well, adieu, it is too late to write more.

Friday.

Captain Mirvan is arrived. I have not spirits to give an account of his introduction, for he has really shocked me. I do not like him. He seems to be surly, vulgar, and disagreeable.

Almost the same moment that Maria was presented to him, he began some rude jests upon the bad shape of her nose, and called her a tall, ill-formed thing. She bore it with the utmost good-humor; but that kind and sweet-tempered woman, Mrs. Mirvan, deserved a better lot. I am amazed she would marry him.

For my own part, I have been so shy, that I have hardly spoken to him, or he to me. I cannot imagine why the family was so rejoiced at his return. If he had spent his whole life abroad, I should have supposed they might rather have been thankful than sorrowful. However, I hope they do not think so ill of him as I do. At least, I am sure they have too much prudence to make it known.

Saturday night.

We have been to the opera, and I am still more pleased than I was on Tuesday. I could have thought myself in paradise, but for the continual talking of the company around me. We sat in the pit,<sup>7</sup> where every body was dressed in so high a style, that, if I had been less delighted with the performance, my eyes would have found me sufficient entertainment from looking at the ladies.

I was very glad I did not sit next the Captain, for he could not bear the music, or singers, and was extremely gross in his observations of both. When the opera was over, he went into a place called the coffee-room, where ladies as well as gentlemen assemble. There are all sorts of refreshments, and the company walk about, and chat with the same ease and freedom as in a private room.

On Monday we go to a ridotto,<sup>8</sup> and on Wednesday we return to Howard Grove. The Captain says he won't stay here to be smoked with filth any longer; but, having been seven years smoked with a burning sun, he will retire to the country, and sink into a fair weather chap.<sup>9</sup> Adieu, my dear Sir.

EVELINA IN CONTINUATION.

Tuesday, April 12.

My dear Sir,

We came home from the ridotto so late, or rather, so early, that it was not possible for me to write. Indeed, we did not go, you will be frightened to hear it,—till past eleven o'clock: but nobody does. A terrible reverse of the order of nature! We sleep with the sun, and wake with the moon.

The room was very magnificent, the lights and decorations were brilliant, and the company gay and splendid. But I should have told you, that I made many objections to being of the party, according to the resolution I had formed. However, Maria laughed me out of my scruples, and so once again—I went to an assembly.

Miss Mirvan danced a minuet, but I had not the courage to follow her example. In our walks I saw Lord Orville. He was quite alone, but did not observe us. Yet, as he seemed of no party, I thought it was not impossible that he might join us; and though I did not wish much to dance at all,—yet, as I was more acquainted with him than with any other person in the room, I must own I could not help thinking it would be infinitely more desirable to dance again with him, than with an entire stranger. To be sure, after all that had passed, it was very ridiculous to suppose it even probable, that Lord Orville would again honor me with his choice; yet I am compelled to confess my absurdity, by way of explaining what follows.

Miss Mirvan was soon engaged; and, presently after, a very fashionable, gay-looking man, who seemed about 30 years of age, addressed himself to me, and begged to have the honor of dancing with me. Now Maria's partner was a gentleman of Mrs. Mirvan's acquaintance; for she had told us it was highly improper for young women to dance with strangers, at any public assembly. Indeed it was by no means my wish so to do: yet I did not like to confine myself from dancing at all; neither did I dare refuse this gentleman, as I had done Mr. Lovel, and then, if any acquaintance should offer, accept him: and so, all these reasons combining, induced me to tell him—yet I blush to write it to you!—that I was already engaged; by which I meant to keep myself at liberty to a dance or not, as matters should fall out.

I suppose my consciousness<sup>1</sup> betrayed my artifice, for he looked at me as if incredulous; and, instead of being satisfied with my answer, and leaving me, according to my expectation, he walked at my side, and, with the greatest ease imaginable, began a conversation, in the free style which only belongs to old and intimate acquaintance. But, what was most provoking, he asked me a thousand questions concerning the partner to whom I was engaged. And, at last, he said, “Is it really possible that a man whom you have honored with your acceptance can fail to be at hand to profit from your goodness?”

I felt extremely foolish, and begged Mrs. Mirvan to lead to a seat, which she very obligingly did. The Captain sat next her, and, to my great surprise, this gentleman thought proper to follow, and seat himself next to me.

“What an insensible!” continued he, “why, Madam, you are missing the most delightful dance in the world! The man must be either mad, or a fool.—Which do you incline to think him yourself?”

“Neither, Sir,” answered I, in some confusion.

He begged my pardon for the freedom of his supposition, saying, “I really was off my guard, from astonishment that any man can be so much and so unaccountably his own enemy. But where, Madam, can he possibly be?—Has he left the room?—or has not he been in it?”

“Indeed, Sir,” said I peevishly, “I know nothing of him.”

“I don’t wonder that you are disconcerted, Madam, it is really very provoking. The best part of the evening will be absolutely lost. He deserves not that you should wait for him.”

“I do not, Sir,” said I, “and I beg you not to—”

“Mortifying, indeed, Madam,” interrupted he, “a lady to wait for a gentleman:—O fie!—careless fellow!—What can detain him?—Will you give me leave to seek him?"

"If you please, Sir," answered I, quite terrified lest Mrs. Mirvan should attend to him, for she looked very much surprised at seeing me enter into conversation with a stranger.

"With all my heart," cried he; "pray, what coat has he on?"

"Indeed I never looked at it."

"Out upon him!" cried he; "What! did he address you in a coat not worth looking at?—What a shabby wretch!"

How ridiculous! I really could not help laughing, which, I fear, encouraged him, for he went on.

"Charming creature!—and can you really bear ill usage with so much sweetness? Can you, like patience on a monument,<sup>2</sup> smile in the midst of disappointment? For my part, though I am not the offended person, my indignation is so great, that I long to kick the fellow round the room!—unless, indeed," hesitating and looking earnestly at me, "unless, indeed,—it is a partner of your own creating?"

I was dreadfully abashed, and could not make an answer.

"But no!" cried he (again, and with warmth) "It cannot be that you are so cruel! Softness itself is painted in your eyes:—You could not, surely, have the barbarity so wantonly to trifle with my misery."

I turned away from this nonsense with real disgust. Mrs. Mirvan saw my confusion, but was perplexed what to think of it, and I could not explain to her the cause, lest the Captain should hear me. I therefore proposed to walk; she consented, and we all rose; but, would you believe it? this man had the assurance to rise too, and walk close by my side, as if of my party!

"Now," cried he, "I hope we shall see this ingrate.—Is that he?"—pointing to an old man, who was lame, "or that?" And in this manner he asked me of whoever was old or ugly in the room. I made no sort of answer; and when he found that I was resolutely silent, and walked on, as much as I could without observing him, he suddenly stamped his foot, and cried out, in a passion, "Fool! idiot! booby!"

I turned hastily toward him: "O, Madam," continued he, "forgive my vehemence, but I am distracted to think there should exist a wretch who can slight a blessing for which I would forfeit my life!—O! that I could but meet him!—I would soon—But I grow angry: pardon me, Madam, my passions are violent, and your injuries affect me!"

I began to apprehend he was a madman, and stared at him with the utmost astonishment. "I see you are moved, Madam," said he, "generous creature!—but don't be alarmed, I am cool again, I am indeed,—upon my soul I am,—I entreat you, most lovely of mortals! I entreat you to be easy."

"Indeed, Sir," said I very seriously, "I must insist upon your leaving me; you are quite a stranger to me, and I am both unused, and averse to your language and your manners."

This seemed to have some effect on him. He made me a low bow, begged my pardon, and vowed he would not for the world offend me.

"Then, Sir, you must leave me," cried I.

"I am gone, Madam, I am gone!" with a most tragical air; and he marched away, a quick pace, out of sight in a moment; but before I had time to congratulate myself, he was again at my elbow.

"And could you really let me go, and not be sorry?—Can you see me suffer torments inexpressible, and yet retain all your favor for that miscreant who flies you?—Ungrateful puppy!—I could bastinado him!"<sup>3</sup>

"For Heaven's sake, my dear," cried Mrs. Mirvan, "who is he talking of?"

"Indeed—I do not know, Madam," said I, "but I wish he would leave me."

"What's all that there?" cried the Captain.

The man made a low bow, and said, "Only, Sir, a slight objection which this young lady makes to dancing with me, and which I am endeavoring to obviate. I shall think myself greatly honored, if you will intercede for me."

"That lady, Sir," said the Captain coldly, "is her own mistress." And he walked sullenly on.

"You, Madam," said the man (who looked delighted, to Mrs. Mirvan), "you, I hope, will have the goodness to speak for me."

"Sir," answered she gravely, "I have not the pleasure of being acquainted with you."

"I hope when you have, Ma'am," cried he (undaunted), "you will honor me with your approbation: but, while I am yet unknown to you, it would be truly generous in you to countenance me; and, I flatter myself, Madam, that you will not have cause to repent it."

Mrs. Mirvan, with an embarrassed air, replied, "I do not at all mean, Sir, to doubt your being a gentleman,—but—"

"But what, Madam?—that doubt removed, why a but?"

"Well, Sir," said Mrs. Mirvan (with a good-humored smile), "I will even treat you with your own plainness, and try what effect that will have on you: I must therefore tell you, once for all—"

"O pardon me, Madam!" interrupted he eagerly, "you must not proceed with those words, once for all; no, if I have been too plain, and though a man, deserve a rebuke, remember, dear ladies, that if you copy, you ought, in justice, to excuse me."

We both stared at the man's strange behavior.

"Be nobler than your sex," continued he, turning to me, "honor me with one dance, and give up the ingrate who has merited so ill your patience."

Mrs. Mirvan looked with astonishment at us both. "Who does he speak of, my dear?—you never mentioned—"

"O, Madam!" exclaimed he, "he was not worth mentioning—it is a pity he was ever thought of; but let us forget his existence. One dance is all I solicit; permit me, Madam, the honor of this young lady's hand; it will be a favor I shall ever most gratefully acknowledge."

"Sir," answered she, "favors and strangers have with me no connection."

"If you have hitherto," said he, "confined your benevolence to your intimate friends, suffer me to be the first for whom your charity is enlarged."

"Well, Sir, I know not what to say to you,—but—"

He stopped her but with so many urgent entreaties, that she at last told me, I must either go down one dance, or avoid his importunities by returning home. I hesitated which alternative to choose; but this impetuous man at length prevailed, and I was obliged to consent to dance with him.

And thus was my deviation from truth punished; and thus did this man's determined boldness conquer.

During the dance, before we were too much engaged in it for conversation, he was extremely provoking about my partner, and tried every means in his power to make me own that I had deceived him; which, though I would not so far humble myself as to acknowledge, was, indeed, but too obvious.

Lord Orville, I fancy, did not dance at all; he seemed to have a large acquaintance, and joined several different parties: but you will easily suppose I was not much pleased to see him, in a few minutes after I was gone, walk towards the place I had just left, and bow to, and join Mrs. Mirvan!

How unlucky I thought myself, that I had not longer withstood this stranger's importunities! The moment we had gone down the dance, I was hastening away from him, but he stopped me, and said that I could by no means return to my party, without giving offense, before we had done our duty of walking up the dance.<sup>4</sup> As I know nothing at all of these rules and customs, I was obliged to submit to his directions; but I fancy I looked rather uneasy, for he took notice of my inattention, saying, in his free way, "Whence that anxiety?—Why are those lovely eyes perpetually averted?"

"I wish you would say no more to me, Sir," (cried I peevishly) "you have already destroyed all my happiness for this evening."

"Good Heaven! What is it I have done?—How have I merited this scorn?"

"You have tormented me to death; you have forced me from my friends, and intruded yourself upon me, against my will, for a partner."

"Surely, my dear Madam, we ought to be better friends, since there seems to be something of sympathy in the frankness of our dispositions.—And yet, were you not an angel—how do you think I could brook such contempt?"

"If I have offended you," cried I, "you have but to leave me—and O how I wish you would!"

"My dear creature," (said he, half laughing) "why where could you be educated?"

"Where I most sincerely wish I now was!"

"How conscious you must be, all beautiful that you are, that those charming airs serve only to heighten the bloom of your complexion!"

"Your freedom, Sir, where you are more acquainted, may perhaps be less disagreeable; but to me—"

"You do me justice," (cried he, interrupting me) "yes, I do indeed improve upon acquaintance; you will hereafter be quite charmed with me."

"Hereafter, Sir, I hope I shall never—"

"O hush!—hush!—have you forgot the situation in which I found you?—Have you forgot, that when deserted, I pursued you,—when betrayed, I adored you?—but for me—"

"But for you, Sir, I might, perhaps, have been happy."

"What then, am I to conclude that, but for me, your partner would have appeared?—poor fellow!—and did my presence awe him?"

"I wish his presence, Sir, could awe you!"

"His presence!—perhaps then you see him?"

"Perhaps, Sir, I do," cried I, quite wearied of his raillery.

"Where?—where?—for Heaven's sake show me the wretch!"

"Wretch, Sir?"

"O, a very savage!—a sneaking, shame-faced, despicable puppy!"

I know not what bewitched me—but my pride was hurt, and my spirits were tired, and—in short—I had the folly, looking at Lord Orville, to repeat, “Despicable, you think?”

His eyes instantly followed mine; “Why, is that the gentleman?”

I made no answer; I could not affirm, and I could not deny: for I hoped to be relieved from his teasing, by his mistake.

The very moment we had done what he called our duty, I eagerly desired to return to Mrs. Mirvan.

“To your partner, I presume, Madam?” said he, very gravely.

This quite confounded me; I dreaded lest this mischievous man, ignorant of his rank, should address himself to Lord Orville, and say something which might expose my artifice. Fool! to involve myself in such difficulties! I now feared what I had before wished; and therefore, to avoid Lord Orville, I was obliged myself to propose going down another dance, though I was ready to sink with shame while I spoke.

“But your partner, Ma’am?” (said he, affecting a very solemn air) “perhaps he may resent my detaining you: if you will give me leave to ask his consent—”

“Not for the universe.”

“Who is he, Madam?”

I wished myself a hundred miles off. He repeated his question, “What is his name?”

“Nothing—nobody—I don’t know—”

He assumed a most important solemnity; “How!—not know?—Give me leave, my dear Madam, to recommend this caution to you; never dance in public with a stranger,—with one whose name you are unacquainted with,—who may be a mere adventurer,—a man of no character,—consider to what impertinence you may expose yourself.”

Was ever any thing so ridiculous? I could not help laughing, in spite of my vexation.

At this instant, Mrs. Mirvan, followed by Lord Orville, walked up to us. You will easily believe it was not difficult for me to recover my gravity; but what was my consternation, when this strange man, destined to be the scourge of my artifice, exclaimed, "Ha! My Lord Orville!—I protest I did not know your Lordship. What can I say for my usurpation?—Yet, faith, my Lord, such a prize was not to be neglected."

My shame and confusion were unspeakable. Who could have supposed or foreseen that this man knew Lord Orville! But falsehood is not more unjustifiable than unsafe.

Lord Orville—well he might—looked all amazement.

"The philosophic coldness of your Lordship," continued this odious creature, "every man is not endowed with. I have used my utmost endeavors to entertain this lady, though I fear without success; and your Lordship will not be a little flattered, if acquainted with the difficulty which attended my procuring the honor of only one dance." Then, turning to me, who was sinking with shame, while Lord Orville stood motionless, and Mrs. Mirvan astonished,—he suddenly seized my hand, saying, "Think, my Lord, what must be my reluctance to resign this fair hand to your Lordship!"

In the same instant, Lord Orville took it of him; I colored violently, and made an effort to recover it. "You do me too much honor, Sir," cried he, (with an air of gallantry, pressing it to his lips before he let it go) "however, I shall be happy to profit by it, if this lady," (turning to Mrs. Mirvan) "will permit me to seek for her party."

To compel him thus to dance, I could not endure, and eagerly called out, "By no means,—not for the world!—I must beg—"

"Will you honor me, Madam, with your commands," cried my tormentor; "may I seek the lady's party?"

"No, Sir," answered I, turning from him.

"What shall be done, my dear," said Mrs. Mirvan.

"Nothing, Ma'am;—any thing, I mean—"

"But do you dance, or not? you see his Lordship waits."

"I hope not,—I beg that—I would not for the world—I am sure I ought to—to—"

I could not speak; but that confident man, determined to discover whether or not I had deceived him, said to Lord Orville, who stood suspended, "My Lord, this affair, which, at present, seems perplexed, I will briefly explain;—this lady proposed to me another dance,—nothing could have made me more happy—I only wished for your Lordship's permission, which, if now granted, will, I am persuaded, set everything right."

I glowed with indignation. "No, Sir—It is your absence, and that alone, can set every thing right."

"For Heaven's sake, my dear," (cried Mrs. Mirvan, who could no longer contain her surprise), "what does all this mean?—were you pre-engaged?—had Lord Orville—"

"No, Madam," cried I, "—only—only I did not know that gentleman,—and so—and so I thought—I intended—I—"

Overpowered by all that had passed, I had not strength to make my mortifying explanation;—my spirits quite failed me, and I burst into tears.

They all seemed shocked and amazed.

"What is the matter, my dearest love?" cried Mrs. Mirvan, with kindest concern.

"What have I done?" exclaimed my evil genius, and ran officiously for a glass of water.

However, a hint was sufficient for Lord Orville, who comprehended all I would have explained. He immediately led me to a seat, and said, in a low voice, "Be not distressed, I beseech you: I shall ever think my name honored by your making use of it."

This politeness relieved me. A general murmur had alarmed Miss Mirvan, who flew instantly to me; while Lord Orville the moment Mrs. Mirvan had taken the water, led my tormentor away.

"For Heaven's sake, dear Madam," cried I, "let me go home,—indeed I cannot stay here any longer."

"Let us all go," cried my kind Maria.

"But the Captain, what will he say?—I had better go home in a chair."<sup>5</sup>

Mrs. Mirvan consented, and I rose to depart. Lord Orville and that man both came to me. The first, with an attention I but ill merited from him, led me to a chair; while the other followed, pestering me with apologies. I wished to have made mine to Lord Orville, but was too much ashamed.

It was about one o'clock. Mrs. Mirvan's servants saw me home.

And now,—what again shall ever tempt me to an assembly? I dread to hear what you will think of me, my most dear and honored Sir: you will need your utmost partiality to receive me without displeasure.

This morning Lord Orville has sent to inquire after our healths: and Sir Clement Willoughby, for that, I find, is the name of my persecutor, has called: but I would not go down stairs till he was gone.

And now, my dear Sir, I can somewhat account for the strange, provoking, and ridiculous conduct of this Sir Clement last night; for Miss Mirvan says, he is the very man with whom she heard Lord Orville conversing at Mrs. Stanley's, when I was spoken of in so mortifying a manner. He was pleased to say he was glad to hear I was a fool, and therefore, I suppose, he concluded he might talk as much nonsense as he pleased to me: however, I am very indifferent as to his opinion;—but for Lord Orville,—if then he thought me an idiot, now, I am sure, he must suppose me both bold and presuming. Make use of his name!—what impertinence!—he can never know how it happened,—he can only imagine it was from an excess of vanity:—well, however, I shall leave this bad city tomorrow, and never again will I enter it.

The Captain intends to take us tonight to the Fantoccini.<sup>6</sup> I cannot bear that Captain; I can give you no idea how gross he is. I heartily rejoice that he was not present at the disagreeable conclusion of yesterday's adventure, for I am sure he would have contributed to my confusion; which might perhaps have diverted him, as he seldom or never smiles but at some other person's expense.

And here I conclude my London letters,—and without any regret, for I am too inexperienced and ignorant to conduct myself with propriety in this town, where every thing is new to me, and many things are unaccountable and perplexing.

Adieu, my dear Sir; Heaven restore me safely to you! I wish I was to go immediately to Berry Hill; yet the wish is ungrateful to Mrs. Mirvan, and therefore I will repress it. I shall write an account of the Fantoccini from Howard Grove. We have not been to half the public places that are now open, though I dare say you will think we have been to all. But they are almost as innumerable as the persons who fill them.

From The Journal and Letters

[FIRST JOURNAL ENTRY]

Poland Street, London, March 27, 1768<sup>1</sup>

To have some account of my thoughts, manners, acquaintance and actions, when the hour arrives at which time is more nimble than memory, is the reason which induces me to keep a journal: a journal in which I must confess my every thought, must open my whole heart! But a thing of this kind ought to be addressed to somebody—I must imagine myself to be talking—talking to the most intimate of friends—to one in whom I should take delight in confiding, and feel remorse in concealment: but who must this friend be?—to make choice of one to whom I can but half rely, would be to frustrate entirely the intention of my plan. The only one I could wholly, totally confide in, lives in the same house with me, and not only never has, but never will, leave me one secret to tell her.<sup>2</sup> To whom, then must I dedicate my wonderful, surprising and interesting adventures?—to whom dare I reveal my private opinion of my nearest relations? the secret thoughts of my dearest friends? my own hopes, fears, reflections and dislikes—Nobody!

To Nobody, then, will I write my Journal! since To Nobody can I be wholly unreserved—to Nobody can I reveal every thought, every wish of my heart, with the most unlimited confidence, the most unremitting sincerity to the end of my life! For what chance, what accident can end my connections with Nobody? No secret can I conceal from No—body, and to No—body can I be ever unreserved. Disagreement cannot stop our affection, Time itself has no power to end our friendship. The love, the esteem I entertain for Nobody, Nobody's self has not power to destroy. From Nobody I have nothing to fear, the secrets sacred to friendship, Nobody will not reveal, when the affair is doubtful, Nobody will not look towards the side least favourable.—

I will suppose you, then, to be my best friend; tho' God forbid you ever should! my dearest companion—and a romantick girl, for mere oddity may perhaps be more sincere—more tender—than if you were a friend in propria personae<sup>3</sup>—in as much as imagination often exceeds reality. In your breast my errors may create pity without exciting contempt; may raise your compassion, without eradicating your love.

From this moment, then, my dear girl—but why, permit me to ask, must a female be made Nobody? Ah! my dear, what were this world good for, were Nobody a female? And now I have done with perambulation.

[A YOUNG AND AGREEABLE INFIDEL]

Bath, June 1780

Miss White<sup>4</sup> is young and pleasing in her appearance, not pretty, but agreeable in her face, and soft, gentle and well bred in her manners. Our conversation, for some time, was upon the common Bath topics,—but when Mrs. Lambart left us,—called to receive more company, we went, insensibly, into graver matters.

As I soon found, by the looks and expressions of this young lady, that she was of a peculiar cast, I left all choice of subjects to herself, determined quietly to follow as she led. And very soon, and I am sure I know not how, we had for topics the follies and vices of mankind,—and indeed she spared not for lashing them!—The women she rather excused than defended, laying to the door of the men their faults and imperfections;—but the men, she said, were all bad,—all, in one word, and without exception, sensualists.

I stared much at a severity of speech for which her softness of manner had so ill prepared me,—and she, perceiving my surprise, said “I am sure I ought to apologise for speaking my opinion to you,—you, who have so just and so uncommon a knowledge of human nature,—I have long wished ardently to have the honour of conversing with you,—but your party has, altogether, been regarded as so formidable, that I have not had courage to approach it.”

I made, as what could I do else, disqualifying speeches, and she then led to discoursing of happiness and misery;—the latter she held to be the invariable lot of us all,—and “one word,” she added, “we have in our language, and in all other, for which there is never any essential necessity,—and that is pleasure.” And her eyes filled with tears as she spoke.

“How you amaze me!” cried I: “I have met with misanthropes before, but never with so complete a one,—and I can hardly think I hear right when I see how young you are.”

She then, in rather indirect terms, gave me to understand that she was miserable at home,—and in very direct terms that she was wretched abroad, and openly said that to affliction she was born, and in affliction she must die, for that the world was so vilely formed as to render happiness impossible for its inhabitants.

There was something in this freedom of repining that I could by no means approve, and as I found by all her manner that she had a disposition to even respect whatever I said, why I now grew very serious, and frankly told her that I could not think it consistent with either truth or religion to cherish such notions.

"One thing," answered she, "there is which I believe might make me happy,—but for that I have no inclination;—it is an amorous disposition. But that I do not possess; I can make myself no happiness by intrigue."

"I hope not, indeed!" cried I, almost confounded by her extraordinary notions and speeches,—“but surely there are worthier subjects of happiness attainable.”—

"No, I believe there are not,—and the reason the men are happier than us, is because they are more sensual."

"I would not think such thoughts," cried I, clasping my hands with an involuntary vehemence, "for worlds!"—

The Miss Caldwells then interrupted us, and seated themselves next to us,—but Miss White paid them little attention at first, and soon after none at all, but, in a low voice, continued her discourse with me; recurring to the same subject of happiness and misery, upon which, after again asserting the folly of ever hoping for the former, she made this speech—

"There may be, indeed, one moment of happiness,—which must be the finding one worthy of exciting a passion which one should dare own to himself! That would, indeed, be a moment worth living for! but that can never happen,—I am sure not to me,—the men are so low, so vicious,—so worthless!—no, there is not one such to be found."

* * *

"Well,—you are a most extraordinary character indeed! I must confess I have seen nothing like you!"

"I hope, however, I shall find something like myself,—and, like the magnet rolling in the dust, attract some metal as I go."

"That you may attract what you please, is of all things most likely;—but if you wait to be happy for a friend resembling yourself, I shall no longer wonder at your despondency."

"O!" cried she, raising her eyes in ecstasy, "could I find such a one!—male or female,—for sex would be indifferent to me, with such a one I would go to live directly."

I half laughed,—but was perplexed in my own mind whether to be sad or merry at such a speech.

"But then," she continued, "after making—should I lose such a friend—I would not survive!"

"Not survive?" repeated I; "what can you mean?"

She looked down, but said nothing.

"Surely you cannot mean," said I, very gravely indeed, "to put a violent end to your life?"

"I should not," said she, again looking up, "hesitate a moment."

I was quite thunderstruck,—and for some time could not say a word;—but when I did speak, it was in a style of exhortation so serious and earnest I am ashamed to write it to you lest you should think it too much.

She gave me an attention that was even respectful, but when I urged her to tell me by what right she thought herself entitled to rush unlicensed on Eternity,<sup>5</sup> she said—"By the right of believing I shall be extinct."

I really felt horror'd!

"Where, for heaven's sake," I cried, "where have you picked up such dreadful reasoning?"

"In Hume," said she;—"I have read his Essays<sup>6</sup> repeatedly."

"I am sorry to find they have power to do so much mischief; you should not have read them, at least, till a man equal to Hume in abilities had answered him. Have you read any more infidel writers?"

"Yes,—Bolingbroke,<sup>7</sup>—the divinest of all writers!"

"And do you read nothing upon the right side?"

"Yes,—the Bible, till I was sick to death of it, every Sunday evening to my mother."

"Have you read Beattie on the immutability of Truth?"<sup>8</sup>

"No."

"Give me leave, then, to recommend it to you. After Hume's Essays, you ought to read it. And even, for lighter reading, if you were to look at Mason's elegy on Lady Coventry,<sup>9</sup> it might be of no disservice to you."

* * *

This was the chief of our conversation,—which indeed made an impression upon me I shall not easily get rid of, a young and agreeable infidel is even a shocking sight,—and with her romantic, flighty and unguarded turn of mind, what could happen to her that could surprise?

Poor misguided girl!<sup>1</sup>

Separated as I have now so long—long been from my dearest father—brothers—sisters—nieces, and native friends, I would spare, at least, their kind hearts any grief for me but what they must inevitably feel in reflecting upon the sorrow of such an absence to one so tenderly attached to all her first and forever so dear and regretted ties—nevertheless, if they should hear that I have been dangerously ill from any hand but my own, they might have doubts of my perfect recovery which my own alone can obviate. And how can I hope they will escape hearing what has reached Seville to the south, and Constantinople to the east? from both I have had messages—yet nothing could urge me to this communication till I heard that M. de Boinville<sup>2</sup> had written it to his wife, without any precaution, because in ignorance of my plan of silence. Still I must hope it may never travel to my dearest father—But to you, my beloved Esther, who, living more in the world, will surely hear it ere long, to you I will write the whole history, certain that, from the moment you know any evil has befallen me your kind kind heart will be constantly anxious to learn its extent and its circumstances, as well as its termination.

About August, in the year 1810, I began to be annoyed by a small pain in my breast, which went on augmenting from week to week, yet, being rather heavy than acute, without causing me any uneasiness with respect to consequences: Alas, “what was the ignorance?” The most sympathizing of partners, however, was more disturbed: not a start, not a wry face, not a movement that indicated pain was unobserved, and he early conceived apprehensions to which I was a stranger. He pressed me to see some surgeon; I revolted from the idea, and hoped, by care and warmth, to make all succor unnecessary. Thus passed some months, during which Madame de Maisonneuve, my particularly intimate friend, joined with M. d’Arblay to press me to consent to an examination. I thought their fears groundless, and could not make so great a conquest over my repugnance. I relate this false confidence, now, as a warning to my dear Esther—my sisters and nieces, should any similar sensations excite similar alarm. M. d'Arblay now revealed his uneasiness to another of our kind friends, Mme. de Tracy, who wrote to me a long and eloquent letter upon the subject, that began to awaken very unpleasant surmises; and a conference with her ensued, in which her urgency and representations, aided by her long experience of disease, and most miserable existence by art, subdued me, and, most painfully and reluctantly, I ceased to object, and M. d'Arblay summoned a physician—M. Bourdois? Maria will cry;—No, my dear Maria, I would not give your beau frere<sup>3</sup> that trouble; not him, but Dr. Jouart, the physician of Miss Potts. Thinking but slightly of my statement, he gave me some directions that produced no fruit—on the contrary, I grew worse, and M. d'Arblay now would take no denial to my consulting M. Dubois, who had already attended and cured me in an abscess of which Maria, my dearest Esther, can give you the history. M. Dubois, the most celebrated surgeon of France, was then appointed accoucheur to the empress, and already lodged in the Tuilleries,<sup>4</sup> and in constant attendance: but nothing could slacken the ardour of M. d'Arblay to obtain the first advice. Fortunately for his kind wishes, M. Dubois had retained a partial regard for me from the time of his former attendance, and, when applied to through a third person, he took the first moment of liberty, granted by a promenade taken by the empress, to come to me. It was now I began to perceive my real danger, M. Dubois gave me a prescription to be pursued for a month, during which time he could not undertake to see me again, and pronounced nothing—but uttered so many charges to me to be tranquil, and to suffer no uneasiness, that I could not but suspect there was room for terrible inquietude. My alarm was increased by the nonappearance of M. d'Arblay after his departure. They had remained together some time in the book room, and M. d'Arblay did not return—till, unable to bear the suspense, I begged him to come back. He, also, sought then to tranquilize me—but in words only; his looks were shocking! his features, his whole face displayed the bitterest woe. I had not, therefore, much difficulty in telling myself what he endeavored not to tell me—that a small operation would be necessary to avert evil consequences!—Ah, my dearest Esther, for this I felt no courage—my dread and repugnance, from a thousand reasons besides the pain, almost shook all my faculties, and, for some time, I was rather confounded and stupified than affrighted.—Direful, however, was the effect of this interview; the pains became quicker and more violent, and the hardness of the spot affected increased. I took, but vainly, my proscription, and every symptom grew more serious.

* * *

A physician was now called in, Dr. Moreau, to hear if he could suggest any new means: but Dr. Larrey<sup>5</sup> had left him no resources untried. A formal consultation now was held, of Larrey, Ribe, and Moreau—and, in fine, I was formally condemned to an operation by all three. I was as much astonished as disappointed—for the poor breast was no where discoloured, and not much larger than its healthy neighbor. Yet I felt the evil to be deep, so deep, that I often thought if it could not be dissolved, it could only with life be extirpated. I called up, however, all the reason I possessed, or could assume, and told them that—if they saw no other alternative, I would not resist their opinion and experience:—the good Dr. Larrey, who, during his long attendance had conceived for me the warmest friendship, had now tears in his eyes; from my dread he had expected resistance.

* * *

All hope of escaping this evil now at an end, I could only console or employ my mind in considering how to render it less dreadful to M. d'Arblay. M. Dubois had pronounced "il faut s'attendre à souffrir, Je ne veux pas vous tromper—Vous souffrirez—vous souffrirez beaucoup!—"<sup>6</sup> M. Ribe had charged me to cry! to withhold or restrain myself might have seriously bad consequences, he said. M.

Moreau, in echoing this injunction, inquired whether I had cried or screamed at the birth of Alexander—Alas, I told him, it had not been possible to do otherwise; Oh then, he answered, there is no fear!—What terrible inferences were here to be drawn! I desired, therefore, that M. d'Arblay might be kept in ignorance of the day till the operation should be over. To this they agreed, except M. Larrey, with high approbation: M. Larrey looked dissentient, but was silent. M. Dubois protested he would not undertake to act, after what he had seen of the agitated spirits of M. d'Arblay if he were present: nor would he suffer me to know the time myself over night; I obtained with difficulty a promise of 4 hours warning, which were essential to me for sundry regulations.

From this time, I assumed the best spirits in my power, to meet the coming blow;—and support my too sympathizing partner.

* * *

Sundry necessary works and orders filled up my time entirely till one o'clock, when all was ready—but Dr. Moreau then arrived, with news that M. Dubois could not attend till three. Dr. Aumont went away—and the coast was clear. This, indeed, was a dreadful interval. I had no longer any thing to do—I had only to think—two hours thus spent seemed never-ending. I would fain have written to my dearest father—to you, my Esther—to Charlotte James—Charles—Amelia Lock—but my arm prohibited me: I strolled to the salon—I saw it fitted with preparations, and I recoiled—But I soon returned; to what effect disguise from myself what I must so soon know?—yet the sight of the immense quantity of bandages, compresses, sponges, lint—made me a little sick:—I walked backwards and forwards till I quieted all emotion, and became by degrees, nearly stupid—torpid, without sentiment or consciousness;—and thus I remained till the clock struck three. A sudden spirit of exertion then returned,—I defied my poor arm, no longer worth sparing, and took my long banished pen to write a few words to M. d'Arblay—and a few more for Alex, in case of a fatal result. These short billets I could only deposit safely, when the cabriolets<sup>7</sup>—one—two—three—four—succeeded rapidly to each other in stopping at the door. Dr. Moreau instantly entered my room, to see if I were alive. He gave me a wine cordial, and went to the salon. I rang for my maid and nurses,—but before I could speak to them, my room, without previous message, was entered by 7 men in black, Dr. Larrey, M. Dubois, Dr. Moreau, Dr. Aumont, Dr. Ribe, and a pupil of Dr. Larrey, and another of M. Dubois. I was now awakened from my stupor—and by a sort of indignation—Why so many? and without leave?—But I could not utter a syllable. M. Dubois acted as commander in chief. Dr. Larrey kept out of sight; M. Dubois ordered a bedstead into the middle of the room. Astonished, I turned to Dr. Larrey, who had promised that an arm chair would suffice; but he hung his head, and would not look at me. Two old mattresses M. Dubois then demanded, and an old sheet. I now began to tremble violently, more with distaste and horror of the preparations even than of the pain. These arranged to his liking, he desired me to mount the bedstead. I stood suspended, for a moment, whether I should not abruptly escape—I looked at the door, the windows—I felt desperate—but it was only for a moment, my reason then took the command, and my fears and feelings struggled vainly against it. I called to my maid—she was crying, and the two nurses stood, transfixed, at the door. “Let those women all go!” cried M. Dubois. This order recovered me my voice—“No,” I cried, “let them stay! qu’elles restent!” This occasioned a little dispute, that re-animated me—The maid, however, and one of the nurses ran off—I charged the other to approach, and she obeyed. M. Dubois now tried to issue his commands en militaire,<sup>8</sup> but I resisted all that were resistable—I was compelled, however, to submit to taking off my long robe de chambre,<sup>9</sup> which I had meant to retain—Ah, then, how did I think of my sisters!—not one, at so dreadful an instant, at hand, to protect—adjust—guard me—I regretted that I had refused Mme de Maisonneuve—Mme Chastel—no one upon whom I could rely—my departed angel!<sup>1</sup>—how did I think of her!—how did I long—long for my Esther—my Charlotte!—My distress was, I suppose, apparent, though not my wishes, for M. Dubois himself now softened, and spoke soothingly. “Can you,” I cried, “feel for an operation that, to you, must seem so trivial?"—"Trivial?" he repeated—taking up a bit of paper, which he tore, unconsciously, into a million pieces, "oui—c'est peu de chose—mais—"<sup>2</sup> he stammered, and could not go on. No one else attempted to speak, but I was softened myself, when I saw even M. Dubois grow agitated, while Dr. Larrey kept always aloof, yet a glance showed me he was pale as ashes. I knew not, positively, then, the immediate danger, but every thing convinced me danger was hovering about me, and that this experiment could alone save me from its jaws. I mounted, therefore, unbidden, the bedstead—and M. Dubois placed me upon the mattress, and spread a cambric handkerchief upon my face. It was transparent, however, and I saw, through it, that the bedstead was instantly surrounded by the 7 men and my nurse. I refused to be held; but when, bright through the cambric, I saw the glitter of polished steel—I closed my eyes. I would not trust to convulsive fear the sight of the terrible incision. A silence the most profound ensued, which lasted for some minutes, during which, I imagine, they took their orders by signs, and made their examination—Oh what a horrible suspension!—I did not breathe—and M. Dubois tried vainly to find any pulse. This pause, at length, was broken by Dr. Larrey, who in a voice of solemn melancholy, said "Qui me tiendra ce sein?"<sup>3</sup> —"

No one answered; at least not verbally; but this aroused me from my passively submissive state, for I feared they imagined the whole breast infected—feared it too justly,—for, again through the cambric, I saw the hand of M. Dubois held up, while his forefinger first described a straight line from top to bottom of the breast, secondly a cross, and thirdly a circle; intimating that the whole was to be taken off. Excited by this idea, I started up, threw off my veil, and, in answer to the demand "Qui me tiendra ce sein?" cried "C'est moi, Monsieur!"<sup>4</sup> and I held my hand under it, and explained the nature of my sufferings, which all sprang from one point, though they darted into every part. I was heard attentively, but in utter silence, and M. Dubois then, re-placed me as before, and, as before, spread my veil over my face. How vain, alas, my representation!

immediately again I saw the fatal finger describe the cross—and the circle—Hopeless, then, desperate, and self-given up, I closed once more my eyes, relinquishing all watching, all resistance, all interference, and sadly resolute to be wholly resigned.

My dearest Esther,—and all my dears to whom she communicates this doleful ditty, will rejoice to hear that this resolution once taken, was firmly adhered to, in defiance of a terror that surpasses all description, and the most torturing pain. Yet—when the dreadful steel was plunged into the breast—cutting through veins—arteries—flesh—nerves—I needed no injunctions not to restrain my cries. I began a scream that lasted unintermittingly during the whole time of the incision—and I almost marvel that it rings not in my ears still! so excruciating was the agony. When the wound was made, and the instrument was withdrawn, the pain seemed undiminished, for the air that suddenly rushed into those delicate parts felt like a mass of minute but sharp and forked poniards,<sup>5</sup> that were tearing the edges of the wound—but when again I felt the instrument—describing a curve—cutting against the grain, if I may so say, while the flesh resisted in a manner so forcible as to oppose and tire the hand of the operator, who was forced to change from the right to the left—then, indeed, I thought I must have expired. I attempted no more to open my eyes,—they felt as if hermetically shut, and so firmly closed, that the eyelids seemed indented into the cheeks. The instrument this second time withdrawn, I concluded the operation over,—Oh no! presently the terrible cutting was renewed—and worse than ever, to separate the bottom, the foundation of this dreadful gland from the parts to which it adhered—Again all description would be baffled—yet again all was not over,—Dr. Larrey rested but his own hand, and—Oh heaven!—I then felt the knife rackling<sup>6</sup> against the breast bone—scraping it!—This performed, while I yet remained in utterly speechless torture, I heard the voice of Mr. Larrey,—(all others guarded a dead silence) in a tone nearly tragic, desire every one present to pronounce if anything more remained to be done; or if he thought the operation complete. The general voice was yes,—but the finger of Mr. Dubois—which I literally felt elevated over the wound, though I saw nothing, and though he touched nothing, so indescribably sensitive was the spot—pointed to some further requisition<sup>7</sup>—and again began the scraping!—and, after this, Dr. Moreau thought he discerned a peccant atom—and still, and still, M. Dubois demanded atom after atom—My dearest Esther, not for days, not for weeks, but for months I could not speak of this terrible business without nearly again going through it! I could not think of it with impunity! I was sick, I was disordered by a single question—even now, 9 months after it is over, I have a head ache from going on with the account! and this miserable account, which I began 3 months ago, at least, I dare not revise, nor read, the recollection is still so painful.

To conclude, the evil was so profound, the case so delicate, and the precautions necessary for preventing a return so numerous, that the operation, including the treatment and the dressing, lasted 20 minutes! a time, for sufferings so acute, that was hardly supportable—However, I bore it with all the courage I could exert, and never moved, nor stopped them, nor resisted, nor remonstrated, nor spoke—except once or twice, during the dressings, to say “Ah Messieurs! que je vous plains!”<sup>8</sup> for indeed I was sensible to the feeling concern with which they all saw what I endured, though my speech was principally—very principally meant for Dr. Larrey. Except this, I uttered not a syllable, save, when so often they re-commenced, calling out “Avertissez moi, Messieurs! avertissez moi!”<sup>9</sup> Twice, I believe, I fainted; at least, I have two total chasms in my memory of this transaction, that impede my tying together what passed. When all was done, and they lifted me up that I might be put to bed, my strength was so totally annihilated, that I was obliged to be carried, and could not even sustain my hands and arms, which hung as if I had been lifeless; while my face, as the nurse has told me, was utterly colorless. This removal made me open my eyes—and I then saw my good Dr. Larrey, pale nearly as myself, his face streaked with blood, and its expression depicting grief, apprehension, and almost horror.

When I was in bed,—my poor M. d’Arblay—who ought to write you himself his own history of this morning—was called to me—and afterwards our Alex.—

[M. D'ARBLAY'S POSTSCRIPT]

No! No my dearest and ever more dear friends, I shall not make a fruitless attempt. No language could convey what I felt in the deadly course of these seven hours. Nevertheless, every one of you, my dearest dearest friends, can guess, must even know it. Alexandre had no less feeling, but showed more fortitude. He, perhaps, will be more able to describe to you, nearly at least, the torturing state of my poor heart and soul. Besides, I must own, to you, that these details which were, till just now, quite unknown to me, have almost killed me, and I am only able to thank God that this more than half angel has had the sublime courage to deny herself the comfort I might have offered her, to spare me, not the sharing of her excruciating pains, that was impossible, but the witnessing so terrific a scene, and perhaps the remorse to have rendered it more tragic. For I don't flatter myself I could have got through it—I must confess it.

Thank heaven! She is now surprisingly well, and in good spirits, and we hope to have many many still happy days. May that of peace soon arrive, and enable me to embrace better than with my pen my beloved and ever ever more dear friends of the town and country. Amen. Amen!<sup>1</sup>

WILLIAM COWPER

1731–1800

William Cowper found great success as a poet—he is among the most beloved writers of the period. Blake, Wordsworth, and Coleridge felt close to him, and so did many literary women. His personal life, however, was complicated, sometimes anguished and tumultuous. After attempting suicide in 1763, he believed that he was damned for having tried to commit the unforgivable sin, the “sin against the Holy Ghost.” From then on, a refugee from life, he looked for hope in Evangelicalism and found shelter first, in 1765, in the family of the clergyman Morley Unwin, and after Unwin’s death, with his widow, Mary Unwin, who cared for Cowper until her death in 1796. Their move to rural Olney (pronounced Own-y) in 1768 brought them under the influence of the strenuous and fervent Evangelical minister John Newton, author of “Amazing Grace.” With him Cowper wrote the famous Olney Hymns, still familiar to Methodists and other Nonconformists. But a second attack of his illness, in 1773, not only frustrated his planned marriage to Mary Unwin but left him for the rest of his life with the assurance that he had been cast out by God. He never again attended services, and the main purpose of his life thereafter was to divert his mind from numb despair by every possible innocent device. He gardened, he kept pets, he walked, he wrote letters (some of the best of the eighteenth century), he conversed, he read—and he wrote poetry.

When his poetry was published, it brought him a measure of fame that his modest nature could never have hoped for.

Cowper's major work is The Task (1785), undertaken at the bidding of Lady Austen, a friend who, when he complained that he had no subject, directed him to write about the sofa in his parlor. It began with a mock-heroic account of the development of the sofa from a simple stool, but it grew into a long meditative poem of more than five thousand lines. The poet describes his small world of country, village, garden, and parlor, and from time to time he glances toward the great world to condemn cities and worldliness, war and slavery, luxury and corruption. The tone is muted, the sensibility delicate, the language on the whole precise and clear. Contemporary readers responded powerfully, recognizing their own concerns in his pious and humorous musings.

[A LANDSCAPE DESCRIBED. RURAL SOUNDS]

150 Thou<sup>1</sup> knowest my praise of nature most sincere,
And that my raptures are not conjured up
To serve occasions of poetic pomp,
But genuine, and art partner of them all.
How oft upon yon eminence our pace
Has slackened to a pause, and we have borne 155 The ruffling wind, scarce conscious that it blew,
While admiration, feeding at the eye,
And still unsated, dwelt upon the scene.
Thence with what pleasure have we just discerned
The distant plow slow moving, and beside 160 His laboring team, that swerved not from the track,
The sturdy swain diminished to a boy!
Here Ouse,<sup>2</sup> slow winding through a level plain
Of spacious meads with cattle sprinkled o'er,
Conducts the eye along its sinuous course
165 Delighted. There, fast rooted in their bank,
Stand, never overlooked, our favorite elms,
That screen the herdsman's solitary hut;
While far beyond, and overthwart the stream
That, as with molten glass, inlays the vale,
170 The sloping land recedes into the clouds;
Displaying on its varied side the grace
Of hedgerow beauties numberless, square tower,
Tall spire, from which the sound of cheerful bells
Just undulates upon the listening ear,
175 Groves, heaths, and smoking villages, remote.
Scenes must be beautiful, which, daily viewed,
Please daily, and whose novelty survives
Long knowledge and the scrutiny of years—
Praise justly due to those that I describe.
180 Nor rural sights alone, but rural sounds,

Exhilarate the spirit, and restore
 The tone of languid Nature. Mighty winds,
 That sweep the skirt of some far-spreading wood
 Of ancient growth, make music not unlike 185 The dash of ocean on his winding shore,
 And lull the spirit while they fill the mind;
 Unnumbered branches waving in the blast,
 And all their leaves fast fluttering, all at once.
 Nor less composure waits upon the roar
 190 Of distant floods, or on the softer voice
 Of neighboring fountain, or of rills that slip
 Through the cleft rock, and, chiming as they fall
 Upon loose pebbles, lose themselves at length
 In matted grass, that with a livelier green
 195 Betrays the secret of their silent course.
 Nature inanimate employs sweet sounds,
 But animated nature sweeter still,
 To soothe and satisfy the human ear.
 Ten thousand warblers cheer the day, and one 200 The livelong night: nor these alone, whose notes
 Nice-fingered art<sup>3</sup> must emulate in vain,
 But cawing rooks, and kites that swim sublime
 In still repeated circles, screaming loud,
 The jay, the pie,<sup>o</sup> and even the boding owl
 205 That hails the rising moon, have charms for me.
 Sounds inharmonious in themselves and harsh,
 Yet heard in scenes where peace forever reigns,
 And only there, please highly for their sake.

[CRAZY KATE]

There often wanders one, whom better days
Saw better clad, in cloak of satin trimmed
535 With lace, and hat with splendid ribband bound.
A servingmaid was she, and fell in love
With one who left her, went to sea, and died.
Her fancy followed him through foaming waves
To distant shores; and she would sit and weep
540 At what a sailor suffers; fancy, too,
Delusive most where warmest wishes are,
Would oft anticipate his glad return,
And dream of transports she was not to know.
She heard the doleful tidings of his death—
545 And never smiled again! And now she roams
The dreary waste; there spends the livelong day,
And there, unless when charity forbids,
The livelong night. A tattered apron hides,
Worn as a cloak, and hardly hides, a gown
550 More tattered still; and both but ill conceal
A bosom heaved with never-ceasing sighs.
She begs an idle pin of all she meets,
And hoards them in her sleeve; but needful food,
Though pressed with hunger oft, or comelier clothes, 555 Though pinched with cold, asks never.—Kate is crazed!

[THE STRICKEN DEER]

I was a stricken deer, that left the herd
Long since; with many an arrow deep infixed
My panting side was charged, when I withdrew 110 To seek a tranquil death in distant shades.
There was I found by one who had himself
Been hurt by the archers. In his side he bore,
And in his hands and feet, the cruel scars.
With gentle force soliciting<sup>4</sup> the darts,
115 He drew them forth, and healed, and bade me live.
Since then, with few associates, in remote
And silent woods I wander, far from those
My former partners of the peopled scene;
With few associates, and not wishing more.
120 Here much I ruminate, as much I may,
With other views of men and manners now
Than once, and others of a life to come.
I see that all are wanderers, gone astray
Each in his own delusions; they are lost
125 In chase of fancied happiness, still wooed
And never won. Dream after dream ensues;
And still they dream that they shall still succeed,
And still are disappointed. Rings the world
With the vain stir. I sum up half mankind
130 And add two-thirds of the remaining half,
And find the total of their hopes and fears
Dreams, empty dreams.

[THE WINTER EVENING: A BROWN STUDY]

Come evening once again, season of peace,
Return sweet evening, and continue long!
Methinks I see thee in the streaky west,
245 With matron-step slow-moving, while the night
Treads on thy sweeping train; one hand employed
In letting fall the curtain of repose
On bird and beast, the other charged for man
With sweet oblivion of the cares of day;
250 Not sumptuously adorned, nor needing aid
Like homely featured night, of clustering gems;
A star or two just twinkling on thy brow
Suffices thee; save that the moon is thine
No less than hers, not worn indeed on high 255 With ostentatious pageantry, but set
With modest grandeur in thy purple zone,<sup>5</sup>
Resplendent less, but of an ampler round.<sup>6</sup>
Come then and thou shalt find thy votary calm,
Or make me so. Composure is thy gift.
260 And whether I devote thy gentle hours
To books, to music, or the poet's toil,
To weaving nets for bird-alluring fruit;
Or twining silken threads round ivory reels
When they command whom man was born to 265 please;<sup>7</sup>
I slight thee not, but make thee welcome still.
Just when our drawing rooms begin to blaze
With lights by clear reflection multiplied
From many a mirror, in which he of Gath,
270 Goliath,<sup>8</sup> might have seen his giant bulk
Whole without stooping, towering crest and all,
My pleasures too begin. But me perhaps
The glowing hearth may satisfy awhile

With faint illumination that uplifts
The shadow to the ceiling, there by fits 275 Dancing uncouthly to the quivering flame.
Not undelightful is an hour to me
So spent in parlor twilight; such a gloom
Suits well the thoughtful or unthinking mind,
The mind contemplative, with some new theme 280 Pregnant, or indisposed alike to all.
Laugh ye, who boast your more mercurial powers
That never feel a stupor, know no pause,
Nor need one. I am conscious,<sup>o</sup> and confess,
Fearless, a soul that does not always think.
285 Me oft has fancy ludicrous and wild
Soothed with a waking dream of houses, towers,
Trees, churches, and strange visages expressed
In the red cinders, while with poring eye
I gazed, myself creating what I saw.
290 Nor less amused have I quiescent watched
The sooty films that play upon the bars,<sup>9</sup>
Pendulous and foreboding, in the view
Of superstition prophesying still,
Though still deceived, some stranger's near 295 approach.<sup>1</sup>
'Tis thus the understanding takes repose
In indolent vacuity of thought,
And sleeps and is refreshed. Meanwhile the face
Conceals the mood lethargic with a mask
Of deep deliberation, as<sup>o</sup> the man
300 Were tasked to his full strength, absorbed and lost.
Thus oft reclined at ease, I lose an hour
At evening, till at length the freezing blast
That sweeps the bolted shutter, summons home
The recollected powers, and snapping short
305 The glassy threads with which the fancy weaves
Her brittle toys, restores me to myself.

How calm is my recess, and how the frost,
 Raging abroad, and the rough wind, endear
 The silence and the warmth enjoyed within.
 310 I saw the woods and fields at close of day,
 A variegated show; the meadows green,
 Though faded; and the lands where lately waved
 The golden harvest, of a mellow brown,
 Upturned so lately by the forceful share.<sup>o</sup>
 315 I saw far off the weedy fallows<sup>2</sup> smile
 With verdure not unprofitable, grazed
 By flocks fast feeding and selecting each
 His favorite herb; while all the leafless groves
 That skirt the horizon wore a sable hue,
 320 Scarce noticed in the kindred dusk of eve.
 Tomorrow brings a change, a total change!
 Which even now, though silently performed
 And slowly, and by most unfelt, the face
 Of universal nature undergoes.
 325 Fast falls a fleecy shower. The downy flakes, Descending and with never-ceasing lapse,<sup>3</sup>
 Softly alighting upon all below,
 Assimilate all objects. Earth receives
 Gladly the thickening mantle, and the green
 330 And tender blade that feared the chilling blast,
 Escapes unhurt beneath so warm a veil.

The Castaway

Obscurest night involved the sky,
The Atlantic billows roared,
When such a destined wretch as I,
Washed headlong from on board,
Of friends, of hope, of all bereft,
5 His floating home forever left.

No braver chief<sup>1</sup> could Albion boast
Than he with whom he went,
Nor ever ship left Albion's coast,
With warmer wishes sent.
10 He loved them both, but both in vain,
Nor him beheld, nor her again.

Not long beneath the whelming brine,
Expert to swim, he lay;
Nor soon he felt his strength decline,
15 Or courage die away;
But waged with death a lasting strife,
Supported by despair of life.

He shouted; nor his friends had failed
To check the vessel's course,
20 But so the furious blast prevailed,
That, pitiless perforce,
They left their outcast mate behind,
And scudded still before the wind.

Some succor yet they could afford;
And, such as storms allow,
25 The cask, the coop, the floated cord,

Delayed not to bestow.
But he (they knew) nor ship, nor shore,
Whate'er they gave, should visit more.

30 Nor, cruel as it seemed, could he
Their haste himself condemn,
Aware that flight, in such a sea,
Alone could rescue them;
Yet bitter felt it still to die

35 Deserted, and his friends so nigh.

He long survives, who lives an hour
In ocean, self-upheld;
And so long he, with unspent power,
His destiny repelled;

40 And ever, as the minutes flew,
Entreated help, or cried, "Adieu!"

At length, his transient respite past,
His comrades, who before
Had heard his voice in every blast,

45 Could catch the sound no more.
For then, by toil subdued, he drank
The stifling wave, and then he sank.

No poet wept him; but the page
Of narrative sincere,

50 That tells his name, his worth, his age,
Is wet with Anson's tear.
And tears by bards or heroes shed
Alike immortalize the dead.

55 I therefore purpose not, or dream,
Descanting on his fate,
To give the melancholy theme
A more enduring date:

60 But misery still delights to trace
Its semblance in another's case.

No voice divine the storm allayed,
No light propitious shone,
When, snatched from all effectual aid,
We perished, each alone;
65 But I beneath a rougher sea,
And whelmed in deeper gulfs than he.

OLAUDAH EQUIANO
ca. 1745–1797

Abolitionist Medallion. In 1787, the factory of master potter Josiah Wedgwood produced this jasperware medallion, a little over one inch in diameter, to advocate for the emerging abolitionist movement. Soon it became a fashionable ornament, adorning hairpins, necklaces, and other items worn by those wishing to signal their support for the parliamentary campaign in the late 1780s to end the British trade in enslaved Africans, which would not be successful until 1807.

The Interesting Narrative of the Life of Olaudah Equiano, or Gustavus Vassa, the African, Written by Himself, published in 1789, is the classic story of an eighteenth-century African's descent into slavery and rise to freedom. Equiano describes how he was raised in an Ibo village (in modern Nigeria), kidnapped by African raiders, and sold into slavery. Particularly powerful is his account of the horrors of the Middle Passage to Barbados in the Caribbean. There, an English naval officer took him to serve as a cabin boy and renamed him Gustavus Vassa, after a sixteenth-century Swedish hero who freed his people from the Danes (such names concealed the status of enslavement, because slavery was frowned on by the British Navy). During years at sea, as well as a period at a London school, Equiano acquired a basic education. He also underwent baptism, a ritual that many enslaved people expected to make them free. But his hopes were cruelly disappointed when, after six years' service, he was suddenly transferred to another enslaver for payment and shipped to the West Indies. There a Quaker merchant, Robert King, held him enslaved, employed him as a clerk and a seaman, and eventually allowed him, in 1766, to buy his freedom. Equiano went back to England, working first as a hairdresser and later voyaging all over the world, even taking part in an effort to find a passage to India by way of the North Pole. Equiano's recent biographer, Vincent Carretta, has raised doubts about the account that the Interesting Narrative gives of the early parts of Equiano's life: parish and British naval records indicate he was born not in Africa but in South Carolina and hence did not himself undergo the Middle Passage. Whether fact or fiction —scholars may never determine conclusively—his description of his days in Africa, abduction, and suffering in the enslaver's ship gives a voice to countless Africans who faced such experiences and dramatizes the undeniable realities of the trade to a White readership. Equiano's publication of his story was the culmination of his involvement in the abolitionist movement through the 1780s and was an important contribution to that movement, not only for its explicit arguments against the trade in enslaved people but also for his self-presentation as a humane, strong, intelligent, Christian man of African descent, and a free and eloquent British subject. The book went through many editions and made Equiano famous. He married an Englishwoman, fathered two daughters, and died in London in 1797.

The Interesting Narrative combines several literary genres. It is a captivity narrative, a spiritual autobiography, a travel memoir, an adventure story, and an abolitionist tract. The early chapters describe the healthy, cheerful, and virtuous life of Africans, contrasted with European inhumanity, and the later chapters show how much a Black man can achieve, when given a chance. Equiano does not disguise the strains of his position as he is pulled between different identities and different worlds. His main purpose, however, is clearly to force his readers to face the ordeals an enslaved person must endure—to live in his skin. If Aphra Behn's Oroonoko taught Europeans to sympathize with Africans, Equiano taught them that a Black man could speak for himself.

[ The Dedication to Parliament ]

To the Lords Spiritual and Temporal,<sup>1</sup> and the Commons of the Parliament of Great Britain. My Lords and Gentlemen,

Permit me, with the greatest deference and respect, to lay at your feet the following genuine narrative; the chief design of which is to excite in your august assemblies a sense of compassion for the miseries which the slave-trade has entailed on my unfortunate countrymen. By the horrors of that trade was I first torn away from all the tender connexions that were naturally dear to my heart; but these, through the mysterious ways of Providence, I ought to regard as infinitely more than compensated by the introduction I have thence obtained to the knowledge of the Christian religion, and of a nation which, by its liberal sentiments, its humanity, the glorious freedom of its government, and its proficiency in arts and sciences, has exalted the dignity of human nature.

I am sensible I ought to entreat your pardon for addressing to you a work so wholly devoid of literary merit; but, as the production of an unlettered African, who is actuated by the hope of becoming an instrument towards the relief of his suffering countrymen, I trust that such a man, pleading in such a cause, will be acquitted of boldness and presumption.

May the God of heaven inspire your hearts with peculiar benevolence on that important day when the question of abolition is to be discussed,<sup>2</sup> when thousands, in consequence of your determination, are to look for happiness or misery!

I am,

My Lords and Gentlemen,

Your most obedient,

And devoted humble servant,

Olaudah Equiano,

or

Gustavus Vassa.

Union-Street, Mary-le-bone,<sup>3</sup>

March 24, 1789.

[LIFE IN AFRICA]

I believe it is difficult for those who publish their own memoirs to escape the imputation of vanity; nor is this the only disadvantage under which they labor: it is also their misfortune, that what is uncommon is rarely, if ever, believed, and what is obvious we are apt to turn from with disgust, and to charge the writer with impertinence. People generally think those memoirs only worthy to be read or remembered which abound in great or striking events, those, in short, which in a high degree excite either admiration or pity: all others they consign to contempt and oblivion. It is therefore, I confess, not a little hazardous in a private and obscure individual,<sup>4</sup> and a stranger too, thus to solicit the indulgent attention of the public; especially when I own I offer here the history of neither a saint, a hero, nor a tyrant. I believe there are few events in my life, which have not happened to many: it is true the incidents of it are numerous; and, did I consider myself an European, I might say my sufferings were great: but when I compare my lot with that of most of my countrymen, I regard myself as a particular favorite of Heaven, and acknowledge the mercies of Providence in every occurrence of my life. If then the following narrative does not appear sufficiently interesting<sup>5</sup> to engage general attention, let my motive be some excuse for its publication. I am not so foolishly vain as to expect from it either immortality or literary reputation. If it affords any satisfaction to my numerous friends, at whose request it has been written, or in the smallest degree promotes the interests of humanity, the ends for which it was undertaken will be fully attained, and every wish of my heart gratified. Let it therefore be remembered, that, in wishing to avoid censure, I do not aspire to praise.

That part of Africa, known by the name of Guinea, to which the trade for slaves is carried on, extends along the coast above 3400 miles, from the Senegal to Angola, and includes a variety of kingdoms. Of these the most considerable is the kingdom of Benin, both as to extent and wealth, the richness and cultivation of the soil, the power of its king, and the number and warlike disposition of the inhabitants. It is situated nearly under the line,<sup>6</sup> and extends along the coast about 170 miles, but runs back into the interior part of Africa to a distance hitherto I believe unexplored by any traveler; and seems only terminated at length by the empire of Abyssinia,<sup>7</sup> near 1500 miles from its beginning. This kingdom is divided into many provinces or districts: in one of the most remote and fertile of which, called Eboe, I was born, in the year 1745, in a charming fruitful vale, named Essaka.<sup>8</sup> The distance of this province from the capital of Benin and the sea coast must be very considerable; for I had never heard of white men or Europeans, nor of the sea: and our subjection to the king of Benin was little more than nominal; for every transaction of the government, as far as my slender observation extended, was conducted by the chiefs or elders of the place.

* * *

We are almost a nation of dancers, musicians, and poets. Thus every great event, such as a triumphant return from battle, or other cause of public rejoicing, is celebrated in public dances, which are accompanied with songs and music suited to the occasion. The assembly is separated into four divisions, which dance either apart or in succession, and each with a character peculiar to itself. The first division contains the married men, who in their dances frequently exhibit feats of arms, and the representation of a battle. To these succeed the married women, who dance in the second division. The young men occupy the third; and the maidens the fourth. Each represents some interesting scene of real life, such as a great achievement, domestic employment, a pathetic story, or some rural sport; and as the subject is generally founded on some recent event, it is therefore ever new. This gives our dances a spirit and variety which I have scarcely seen elsewhere.<sup>9</sup> We have many musical instruments, particularly drums of different kinds, a piece of music which resembles a guitar, and another much like a stickado.<sup>1</sup> These last are chiefly used by betrothed virgins, who play on them on all grand festivals.

As our manners are simple, our luxuries are few. The dress of both sexes is nearly the same. It generally consists of a long piece of calico, or muslin, wrapped loosely round the body, somewhat in the form of a highland plaid.<sup>2</sup> This is usually dyed blue, which is our favorite color. It is extracted from a berry, and is brighter and richer than any I have seen in Europe. Besides this, our women of distinction wear golden ornaments; which they dispose with some profusion on their arms and legs. When our women are not employed with the men in tillage, their usual occupation is spinning and weaving cotton, which they afterwards dye, and make it into garments. They also manufacture earthen vessels, of which we have many kinds. Among the rest tobacco pipes, made after the same fashion, and used in the same manner, as those in Turkey.<sup>3</sup>

Our manner of living is entirely plain; for as yet the natives are unacquainted with those refinements in cookery which debase the taste: bullocks,<sup>4</sup> goats, and poultry supply the greatest part of their food. These constitute likewise the principal wealth of the country, and the chief articles of its commerce. The flesh is usually stewed in a pan; to make it savory we sometimes use also pepper, and other spices, and we have salt made of wood ashes. Our vegetables are mostly plantains, eadas,<sup>5</sup> yams, beans, and Indian corn. The head of the family usually eats alone; his wives and slaves have also their separate tables. Before we taste food we always wash our hands: indeed our cleanliness on all occasions is extreme; but on this it is an indispensable ceremony. After washing, libation is made, by pouring out a small portion of the food, in a certain place, for the spirits of departed relations, which the natives suppose to preside over their conduct, and guard them from evil. They are totally unacquainted with strong or spirituous liquors; and their principal beverage is palm wine. This is gotten from a tree of that name by tapping it at the top, and fastening a large gourd to it; and sometimes one tree will yield three or four gallons in a night. When just drawn it is of a most delicious sweetness; but in a few days it acquires a tartish and more spirituous flavor: though I never saw any one intoxicated by it. The same tree also produces nuts and oil. Our principal luxury is in perfumes; one sort of these is an odoriferous wood of delicious fragrance: the other a kind of earth; a small portion of which thrown into the fire diffuses a most powerful odor.<sup>6</sup> We beat this wood into powder, and mix it with palm oil; with which both men and women perfume themselves.

In our buildings we study convenience rather than ornament. Each master of a family has a large square piece of ground, surrounded with a moat or fence, or enclosed with a wall made of red earth tempered; which, when dry, is as hard as brick. Within this are his houses to accommodate his family and slaves; which, if numerous, frequently present the appearance of a village. In the middle stands the principal building, appropriated to the sole use of the master, and consisting of two apartments; in one of which he sits in the day with his family, the other is left apart for the reception of his friends. He has besides these a distinct apartment in which he sleeps, together with his male children. On each side are the apartments of his wives, who have also their separate day and night houses. The habitations of the slaves and their families are distributed throughout the rest of the enclosure. These houses never exceed one story in height: they are always built of wood, or stakes driven into the ground, crossed with wattles, and neatly plastered within, and without. The roof is thatched with reeds. Our day-houses are left open at the sides; but those in which we sleep are always covered, and plastered in the inside, with a composition mixed with cow-dung, to keep off the different insects, which annoy us during the night. The walls and floors also of these are generally covered with mats. Our beds consist of a platform, raised three or four feet from the ground, on which are laid skins, and different parts of a spongy tree called plantain. Our covering is calico or muslin, the same as our dress. The usual seats are a few logs of wood; but we have benches, which are generally perfumed, to accommodate strangers: these compose the greater part of our household furniture. Houses so constructed and furnished require but little skill to erect them. Every man is a sufficient architect for the purpose. The whole neighborhood afford their unanimous assistance in building them and in return receive and expect no other recompense than a feast.

As we live in a country where nature is prodigal of her favors, our wants are few and easily supplied; of course we have few manufactures. They consist for the most part of calicoes, earthenware, ornaments, and instruments of war and husbandry. But these make no part of our commerce, the principal articles of which, as I have observed, are provisions. In such a state money is of little use; however we have some small pieces of coin, if I may call them such. They are made something like an anchor; but I do not remember either their value or denomination. We have also markets, at which I have been frequently with my mother. These are sometimes visited by stout mahogany-colored men from the southwest of us: we call them Oye-Eboe, which term signifies red men living at a distance. They generally bring us firearms, gunpowder, hats, beads, and dried fish. The last we esteemed a great rarity, as our waters were only brooks and springs. These articles they barter with us for odoriferous woods and earth, and our salt of wood ashes. They always carry slaves through our land; but the strictest account is exacted of their manner of procuring them before they are suffered to pass. Sometimes indeed we sold slaves to them, but they were only prisoners of war, or such among us as had been convicted of kidnapping, or adultery, and some other crimes, which we esteemed heinous. This practice of kidnapping induces me to think, that, notwithstanding all our strictness, their principal business among us was to trepan<sup>2</sup> our people. I remember too they carried great sacks along with them, which not long after I had an opportunity of fatally seeing applied to that infamous purpose.

Our land is uncommonly rich and fruitful, and produces all kinds of vegetables in great abundance. We have plenty of Indian corn, and vast quantities of cotton and tobacco. Our pineapples grow without culture; they are about the size of the largest sugarloaf,<sup>8</sup> and finely flavored. We have also spices of different kinds, particularly pepper; and a variety of delicious fruits which I have never seen in Europe; together with gums of various kinds, and honey in abundance. All our industry is exerted to improve those blessings of nature. Agriculture is our chief employment; and everyone, even the children and women, are engaged in it. Thus we are all habituated to labor from our earliest years. Every one contributes something to the common stock; and as we are unacquainted with idleness, we have no beggars. The benefits of such a mode of living are obvious. The West India planters prefer the slaves of Benin or Eboe to those of any other part of Guinea, for their hardiness, intelligence, integrity, and zeal. Those benefits are felt by us in the general healthiness of the people, and in their vigor and activity; I might have added too in their comeliness. Deformity is indeed unknown amongst us, I mean that of shape. Numbers of the natives of Eboe now in London might be brought in support of this assertion: for, in regard to complexion, ideas of beauty are wholly relative. I remember while in Africa to have seen three negro children, who were tawny, and another quite white, who were universally regarded by myself, and the natives in general, as far as related to their complexions, as deformed. Our women too were in my eyes at least uncommonly graceful, alert, and modest to a degree of bashfulness; nor do I remember to have ever heard of an instance of incontinence<sup>9</sup> amongst them before marriage. They are also remarkably cheerful. Indeed cheerfulness and affability are two of the leading characteristics of our nation.

[ABDUCTION AND CAPTIVITY]

I hope the reader will not think I have trespassed on his patience in introducing myself to him with some account of the manners and customs of my country. They had been implanted in me with great care, and made an impression on my mind, which time could not erase, and which all the adversity and variety of fortune I have since experienced served only to rivet and record; for, whether the love of one's country be real or imaginary, or a lesson of reason, or an instinct of nature, I still look back with pleasure on the first scenes of my life, though that pleasure has been for the most part mingled with sorrow.

I have already acquainted the reader with the time and place of my birth. My father, besides many slaves, had a numerous family, of which seven lived to grow up, including myself and a sister, who was the only daughter. As I was the youngest of the sons, I became, of course, the greatest favorite with my mother, and was always with her; and she used to take particular pains to form my mind. I was trained up from my earliest years in the art of war; my daily exercise was shooting and throwing javelins; and my mother adorned me with emblems, after the manner of our greatest warriors. In this way I grew up till I was turned the age of eleven, when an end was put to my happiness in the following manner:—Generally when the grown people in the neighborhood were gone far in the fields to labor, the children assembled together in some of the neighbors' premises to play; and commonly some of us used to get up a tree to look out for any assailant, or kidnapper, that might come upon us; for they sometimes took those opportunities of our parents' absence to attack and carry off as many as they could seize. One day, as I was watching at the top of a tree in our yard, I saw one of those people come into the yard of our next neighbor but one, to kidnap, there being many stout young people in it. Immediately on this I gave the alarm of the rogue, and he was surrounded by the stoutest of them, who entangled him with cords, so that he could not escape till some of the grown people came and secured him. But alas! ere long it was my fate to be thus attacked, and to be carried off, when none of the grown people were nigh. One day, when all our people were gone out to their works as usual, and only I and my dear sister were left to mind the house, two men and a woman got over our walls, and in a moment seized us both, and, without giving us time to cry out, or make resistance, they stopped our mouths, and ran off with us into the nearest wood. Here they tied our hands, and continued to carry us as far as they could, till night came on, when we reached a small house, where the robbers halted for refreshment, and spent the night. We were then unbound, but were unable to take any food; and, being quite overpowered by fatigue and grief, our only relief was some sleep, which allayed our misfortune for a short time. The next morning we left the house, and continued travelling all the day. For a long time we had kept the woods, but at last we came into a road which I believed I knew. I had now some hopes of being delivered; for we had advanced but a little way before I discovered some people at a distance, on which I began to cry out for their assistance: but my cries had no other effect than to make them tie me faster and stop my mouth, and then they put me into a large sack. They also stopped my sister's mouth, and tied her hands; and in this manner we proceeded till we were out of the sight of these people. When we went to rest the following night they offered us some victuals; but we refused it; and the only comfort we had was in being in one another's arms all that night, and bathing each other with our tears. But alas! we were soon deprived of even the small comfort of weeping together. The next day proved a day of greater sorrow than I had yet experienced; for my sister and I were then separated, while we lay clasped in each other's arms. It was in vain that we besought them not to part us; she was torn from me, and immediately carried away, while I was left in a state of distraction not to be described. I cried and grieved continually; and for several days I did not eat anything but what they forced into my mouth. At length, after many days travelling, during which I had often changed masters, I got into the hands of a chieftain, in a very pleasant country. This man had two wives and some children, and they all used<sup>1</sup> me extremely well, and did all they could to comfort me; particularly the first wife, who was something like my mother. Although I was a great many days' journey from my father's house, yet these people spoke exactly the same language with us.

From the time I left my own nation I always found somebody that understood me till I came to the sea coast. The languages of different nations did not totally differ, nor were they so copious<sup>2</sup> as those of the Europeans, particularly the English. They were therefore easily learned; and, while I was journeying thus through Africa, I acquired two or three different tongues. In this manner I had been travelling for a considerable time, when one evening, to my great surprise, whom should I see brought to the house where I was but my dear sister! As soon as she saw me she gave a loud shriek, and ran into my arms—I was quite overpowered: neither of us could speak; but, for a considerable time, clung to each other in mutual embraces, unable to do anything but weep. Our meeting affected all who saw us; and indeed I must acknowledge, in honor of those sable destroyers of human rights,<sup>3</sup> that I never met with any ill treatment, or saw any offered to their slaves, except tying them, when necessary, to keep them from running away. When these people knew we were brother and sister they indulged us together; and the man, to whom I supposed we belonged, lay with us, he in the middle, while she and I held one another by the hands across his breast all night; and thus for a while we forgot our misfortunes in the joy of being together: but even this small comfort was soon to have an end; for scarcely had the fatal morning appeared, when she was again torn from me forever! I was now more miserable, if possible, than before. The small relief which her presence gave me from pain was gone, and the wretchedness of my situation was redoubled by my anxiety after her fate, and my apprehensions lest her sufferings should be greater than mine, when I could not be with her to alleviate them. Yes, thou dear partner of all my childish sports! thou sharer of my joys and sorrows! happy should I have ever esteemed myself to encounter every misery for you, and to procure your freedom by the sacrifice of my own. Though you were early forced from my arms, your image has been always rivetted in my heart, from which neither time nor fortune have been able to remove it; so that, while the thoughts of your sufferings have damped my prosperity, they have mingled with adversity and increased its bitterness. To that Heaven which protects the weak from the strong, I commit the care of your innocence and virtues, if they have not already received their full reward, and if your youth and delicacy have not long since fallen victims to the violence of the African trader, the pestilential stench of a Guinea ship, the seasoning<sup>4</sup> in the European colonies, or the lash and lust of a brutal and unrelenting overseer.

Thus I continued to travel, sometimes by land, sometimes by water, through different countries and various nations, till, at the end of six or seven months after I had been kidnapped, I arrived at the sea coast. It would be tedious and uninteresting to relate all the incidents which befell me during this journey, and which I have not yet forgotten; of the various hands I passed through, and the manners and customs of all the different people among whom I lived: I shall therefore only observe, that in all the places where I was the soil was exceedingly rich; the pumpkins, eadas, plantains, yams, &c. &c. were in great abundance, and of incredible size. There were also vast quantities of different gums, though not used for any purpose; and everywhere a great deal of tobacco. The cotton even grew quite wild; and there was plenty of redwood. I saw no mechanics<sup>5</sup> whatever in all the way, except such as I have mentioned. The chief employment in all these countries was agriculture, and both the males and females, as with us, were brought up to it, and trained in the arts of war. * * *

The first object which saluted my eyes when I arrived on the coast was the sea, and a slave ship, which was then riding at anchor, and waiting for its cargo. These filled me with astonishment, which was soon converted into terror when I was carried on board. I was immediately handled and tossed up to see if I were sound by some of the crew; and I was now persuaded that I had gotten into a world of bad spirits, and that they were going to kill me. Their complexions too differing so much from ours, their long hair, and the language they spoke, (which was very different from any I had ever heard) united to confirm me in this belief. Indeed such were the horrors of my views and fears at the moment, that, if ten thousand worlds had been my own, I would have freely parted with them all to have exchanged my condition with that of the meanest slave in my own country. When I looked round the ship too and saw a large furnace of copper boiling, and a multitude of black people of every description chained together, every one of their countenances expressing dejection and sorrow, I no longer doubted of my fate; and, quite overpowered with horror and anguish, I fell motionless on the deck and fainted. When I recovered a little I found some black people about me, who I believe were some of those who brought me on board, and had been receiving their pay; they talked to me in order to cheer me, but all in vain. I asked them if we were not to be eaten by those white men with horrible looks, red faces, and loose hair. They told me I was not; and one of the crew brought me a small portion of spirituous liquor in a wine glass; but, being afraid of him, I would not take it out of his hand. One of the blacks therefore took it from him and gave it to me, and I took a little down my palate, which, instead of reviving me, as they thought it would, threw me into the greatest consternation at the strange feeling it produced, having never tasted any such liquor before. Soon after this the blacks who brought me on board went off, and left me abandoned to despair. I now saw myself deprived of all chance of returning to my native country, or even the least glimpse of hope of gaining the shore, which I now considered as friendly; and I even wished for my former slavery in preference to my present situation, which was filled with horrors of every kind, still heightened by my ignorance of what I was to undergo. I was not long suffered to indulge my grief; I was soon put down under the decks, and there I received such a salutation in my nostrils as I had never experienced in my life; so that, with the loathsomeness of the stench, and crying together, I became so sick and low that I was not able to eat, nor had I the least desire to taste any thing. I now wished for the last friend, death, to relieve me; but soon, to my grief, two of the white men offered me eatables; and, on my refusing to eat, one of them held me fast by the hands, and laid me across I think the windlass, and tied my feet, while the other flogged me severely. I had never experienced any thing of this kind before; and although, not being used to the water, I naturally feared that element the first time I saw it, yet nevertheless, could I have got over the nettings,<sup>6</sup> I would have jumped over the side, but I could not; and, besides, the crew used to watch us very closely who were not chained down to the decks, lest we should leap into the water; and I have seen some of these poor African prisoners most severely cut for attempting to do so, and hourly whipped for not eating. This indeed was often the case with myself. In a little time after, amongst the poor chained men, I found some of my own nation, which in a small degree gave ease to my mind. I inquired of these what was to be done with us; they gave me to understand we were to be carried to these white people's country to work for them. I then was a little revived, and thought, if it were no worse than working, my situation was not so desperate: but still I feared I should be put to death, the white people looked and acted, as I thought, in so savage a manner; for I had never seen among any people such instances of brutal cruelty; and this not only shewn towards us blacks, but also to some of the whites themselves. One white man in particular I saw, when we were permitted to be on deck, flogged so unmercifully with a large rope near the foremast, that he died in consequence of it; and they tossed him over the side as they would have done a brute. This made me fear these people the more; and I expected nothing less than to be treated in the same manner. I could not help expressing my fears and apprehensions to some of my countrymen: I asked them if these people had no country, but lived in this hollow place (the ship): they told me they did not, but came from a distant one. "Then," said I, "how comes it in all our country we never heard of them?" They told me because they lived so very far off. I then asked where were their women? had they any like themselves? I was told they had: "and why," said I, "do we not see them?" they answered, because they were left behind. I asked how the vessel could go? they told me they could not tell; but that there were cloths put upon the masts by the help of the ropes I saw, and then the vessel went on; and the white men had some spell or magic they put in the water when they liked in order to stop the vessel. I was exceedingly amazed at this account, and really thought they were spirits. I therefore wished much to be from amongst them, for I expected they would sacrifice me: but my wishes were vain; for we were so quartered that it was impossible for any of us to make our escape. While we stayed on the coast I was mostly on deck; and one day, to my great astonishment, I saw one of these vessels coming in with the sails up. As soon as the whites saw it, they gave a great shout, at which we were amazed; and the more so as the vessel appeared larger by approaching nearer. At last she came to an anchor in my sight, and when the anchor was let go I and my countrymen who saw it were lost in astonishment to observe the vessel stop; and were now convinced it was done by magic. Soon after this the other ship got her boats out, and they came on board of us, and the people of both ships seemed very glad to see each other. Several of the strangers also shook hands with us black people, and made motions with their hands, signifying I suppose we were to go to their country; but we did not understand them. At last, when the ship we were in had got in all her cargo, they made ready with many fearful noises, and we were all put under deck, so that we could not see how they managed the vessel. But this disappointment was the least of my sorrow. The stench of the hold while we were on the coast was so intolerably loathsome, that it was dangerous to remain there for any time, and some of us had been permitted to stay on the deck for the fresh air; but now that the whole ship's cargo were confined together, it became absolutely pestilential. The closeness of the place, and the heat of the climate, added to the number in the ship, which was so crowded that each had scarcely room to turn himself, almost suffocated us. This produced copious perspirations, so that the air soon became unfit for respiration, from a variety of loathsome smells, and brought on a sickness among the slaves, of which many died, thus falling victims to the improvident avarice, as I may call it, of their purchasers. This wretched situation was again aggravated by the galling of the chains, now become insupportable; and the filth of the necessary tubs,<sup>7</sup> into which the children often fell, and were almost suffocated. The shrieks of the women, and the groans of the dying, rendered the whole a scene of horror almost inconceivable. Happily perhaps for myself I was soon reduced so low here that it was thought necessary to keep me almost always on deck; and from<sup>8</sup> my extreme youth I was not put in fetters. In this situation I expected every hour to share the fate of my companions, some of whom were almost daily brought upon deck at the point of death, which I began to hope would soon put an end to my miseries. Often did I think many of the inhabitants of the deep much more happy than myself. I envied them the freedom they enjoyed, and as often wished I could change my condition for theirs. Every circumstance I met with served only to render my state more painful, and heighten my apprehensions, and my opinion of the cruelty of the whites. One day they had taken a number of fishes; and when they had killed and satisfied themselves with as many as they thought fit, to our astonishment who were on the deck, rather than give any of them to us to eat as we expected, they tossed the remaining fish into the sea again, although we begged and prayed for some as well as we could, but in vain; and some of my countrymen, being pressed by hunger, took an opportunity, when they thought no one saw them, of trying to get a little privately; but they were discovered, and the attempt procured them some very severe floggings.

One day, when we had a smooth sea and moderate wind, two of my wearied countrymen who were chained together (I was near them at the time), preferring death to such a life of misery, somehow made through the nettings and jumped into the sea; immediately another quite dejected fellow, who, on account of his illness, was suffered to be out of irons, also followed their example; and I believe many more would very soon have done the same if they had not been prevented by the ship's crew, who were instantly alarmed. Those of us that were the most active were in a moment put down under the deck, and there was such a noise and confusion amongst the people of the ship as I never heard before, to stop her, and get the boat out to go after the slaves. However two of the wretches were drowned, but they got the other, and afterwards flogged him unmercifully for thus attempting to prefer death to slavery. In this manner we continued to undergo more hardships than I can now relate, hardships which are inseparable from this accursed trade. Many a time we were near suffocation from the want of fresh air, which we were often without for whole days together. This, and the stench of the necessary tubs, carried off many. During our passage I first saw flying fishes, which surprised me very much: they used frequently to fly across the ship, and many of them fell on the deck. I also now first saw the use of the quadrant; I had often with astonishment seen the mariners make observations with it, and I could not think what it meant. They at last took notice of my surprise; and one of them, willing to increase it, as well as to gratify my curiosity, made me one day look through it. The clouds appeared to me to be land, which disappeared as they passed along. This heightened my wonder; and I was now more persuaded than ever that I was in another world, and that every thing about me was magic. At last we came in sight of the island of Barbados,<sup>9</sup> at which the whites on board gave a great shout, and made many signs of joy to us. We did not know what to think of this; but as the vessel drew nearer we plainly saw the harbor, and other ships of different kinds and sizes; and we soon anchored amongst them off Bridge Town. Many merchants and planters now came on board, though it was in the evening. They put us in separate parcels,<sup>1</sup> and examined us attentively. They also made us jump, and pointed to the land, signifying we were to go there. We thought by this we should be eaten by these ugly men, as they appeared to us; and, when soon after we were all put down under the deck again, there was much dread and trembling among us, and nothing but bitter cries to be heard all the night from these apprehensions, insomuch that at last the white people got some old slaves from the land to pacify us. They told us we were not to be eaten, but to work, and were soon to go on land, where we should see many of our country people. This report eased us much; and sure enough, soon after we were landed, there came to us Africans of all languages. We were conducted immediately to the merchant's yard, where we were pent up altogether like so many sheep in a fold, without regard to sex or age. As every object was new to me, every thing I saw filled me with surprise. What struck me first was that the houses were built with stories, and in every other respect different from those in Africa; but I was still more astonished on seeing people on horseback. I did not know what this could mean; and indeed I thought these people were full of nothing but magical arts. While I was in this astonishment one of my fellow prisoners spoke to a countryman of his about the horses, who said they were the same kind they had in their country. I understood them, though they were from a distant part of Africa, and I thought it odd I had not seen any horses there; but afterwards, when I came to converse with different Africans, I found they had many horses amongst them, and much larger than those I then saw. We were not many days in the merchant's custody before we were sold after their usual manner, which is this:—On a signal given (as the beat of a drum) the buyers rush at once into the yard where the slaves are confined, and make a choice of that parcel they like best. The noise and clamor with which this is attended, and the eagerness visible in the countenances of the buyers, serve not a little to increase the apprehensions of the terrified Africans, who may well be supposed to consider them as the ministers of that destruction to which they think themselves devoted.<sup>2</sup> In this manner, without scruple, are relations and friends separated, most of them never to see each other again. I remember in the vessel in which I was brought over, in the men's apartment, there were several brothers, who, in the sale, were sold in different lots; and it was very moving on this occasion to see and hear their cries at parting. O, ye nominal Christians! might not an African ask you, learned you this from your God, who says unto you, Do unto all men as you would men should do unto you? Is it not enough that we are torn from our country and friends to toil for your luxury and lust of gain? Must every tender feeling be likewise sacrificed to your avarice? Are the dearest friends and relations, now rendered more dear by their separation from their kindred, still to be parted from each other, and thus prevented from cheering the gloom of slavery with the small comfort of being together and mingling their sufferings and sorrows? Why are parents to lose their children, brothers their sisters, or husbands their wives? Surely this is a new refinement in cruelty, which, while it has no advantage to atone for it, thus aggravates distress, and adds fresh horrors even to the wretchedness of slavery.

[A FREE MAN]<sup>3</sup>

Every day now brought me nearer my freedom, and I was impatient till we proceeded again to sea, that I might have an opportunity of getting a sum large enough to purchase it. I was not long ungratified; for, in the beginning of the year 1766, my master bought another sloop, named the Nancy, the largest I had ever seen. She was partly laden, and was to proceed to Philadelphia; our Captain had his choice of three, and I was well pleased he chose this, which was the largest; for, from his having a large vessel, I had more room, and could carry a larger quantity of goods with me. Accordingly, when we had delivered our old vessel, the Prudence, and completed the lading of the Nancy, having made near three hundred per cent, by four barrels of pork I brought from Charlestown, I laid in as large a cargo as I could, trusting to God's providence to prosper my undertaking. With these views I sailed for Philadelphia. On our passage, when we drew near the land, I was for the first time surprised at the sight of some whales, having never seen any such large sea monsters before; and as we sailed by the land one morning I saw a puppy whale close by the vessel; it was about the length of a wherry boat, and it followed us all the day till we got within the Capes. We arrived safe and in good time at Philadelphia, and I sold my goods there chiefly to the Quakers. They always appeared to be a very honest discreet sort of people, and never attempted to impose on me; I therefore liked them, and ever after chose to deal with them in preference to any others.

One Sunday morning while I was here, as I was going to church, I chanced to pass a meeting house. The doors being open, and the house full of people, it excited my curiosity to go in. When I entered the house, to my great surprise, I saw a very tall woman standing in the midst of them, speaking in an audible voice something which I could not understand. Having never seen anything of this kind before, I stood and stared about me for some time, wondering at this odd scene. As soon as it was over I took an opportunity to make inquiry about the place and people, when I was informed they were called Quakers.<sup>4</sup> I particularly asked what that woman I saw in the midst of them had said, but none of them were pleased to satisfy me; so I quitted them, and soon after, as I was returning, I came to a church crowded with people; the church-yard was full likewise, and a number of people were even mounted on ladders, looking in at the windows. I thought this a strange sight, as I had never seen churches, either in England or the West Indies, crowded in this manner before. I therefore made bold to ask some people the meaning of all this, and they told me the Rev. Mr. George Whitfield<sup>5</sup> was preaching. I had often heard of this gentleman, and had wished to see and hear him; but I had never before had an opportunity. I now therefore resolved to gratify myself with the sight, and I pressed in amidst the multitude. When I got into the church I saw this pious man exhorting the people with the greatest fervor and earnestness, and sweating as much as I ever did while in slavery on Montserrat beach. I was very much struck and impressed with this; I thought it strange I had never seen divines exert themselves in this manner before, and I was no longer at a loss to account for the thin congregations they preached to.

When we had discharged our cargo here, and were loaded again, we left this fruitful land once more, and set sail for Montserrat. My traffic had hitherto succeeded so well with me, that I thought, by selling my goods when we arrived at Montserrat, I should have enough to purchase my freedom. But, as soon as our vessel arrived there, my master came on board, and gave orders for us to go to St. Eustatia,<sup>6</sup> and discharge our cargo there, and from thence proceed for Georgia. I was much disappointed at this; but thinking, as usual, it was of no use to murmur at the decrees of fate, I submitted without repining, and we went to St. Eustatia. After we had discharged our cargo there we took in a live cargo, as we call a cargo of slaves. Here I sold my goods tolerably well; but, not being able to lay out all my money in this small island to as much advantage as in many other places, I laid out only part, and the remainder I brought away with me neat.<sup>7</sup> We sailed from hence for Georgia, and I was glad when we got there, though I had not much reason to like the place from my last adventure in Savannah;<sup>8</sup> but I longed to get back to Montserrat and procure my freedom, which I expected to be able to purchase when I returned. As soon as we arrived here I waited on my careful doctor, Mr. Brady, to whom I made the most grateful acknowledgments in my power for his former kindness and attention during my illness.

While we were here an odd circumstance happened to the Captain and me, which disappointed us both a good deal. A silversmith, whom we had brought to this place some voyages before, agreed with the Captain to return with us to the West Indies, and promised at the same time to give the Captain a great deal of money, having pretended to take a liking to him, and being, as we thought, very rich. But while we stayed to load our vessel this man was taken ill in a house where he worked, and in a week's time became very bad. The worse he grew the more he used to speak of giving the Captain what he had promised him, so that he expected something considerable from the death of this man, who had no wife or child, and he attended him day and night. I used also to go with the Captain, at his own desire, to attend him; especially when we saw there was no appearance of his recovery; and, in order to recompense me for my trouble, the Captain promised me ten pounds, when he should get the man's property. I thought this would be of great service to me, although I had nearly money enough to purchase my freedom, if I should get safe this voyage to Montserrat. In this expectation I laid out above eight pounds of my money for a suit of superfine clothes to dance with at my freedom, which I hoped was then at hand. We still continued to attend this man, and were with him even on the last day he lived, till very late at night, when we went on board. After we were got to bed, about one or two o'clock in the morning, the Captain was sent for, and informed the man was dead. On this he came to my bed, and, waking me, informed me of it, and desired me to get up and procure a light, and immediately go to him. I told him I was very sleepy, and wished he would take somebody else with him, or else, as the man was dead, and could want no farther attendance, to let all things remain as they were till next morning. "No, no," said he, "we will have the money tonight, I cannot wait till tomorrow; so let us go." Accordingly I got up and struck a light, and away we both went and saw the man as dead as we could wish. The Captain said he would give him a grand burial, in gratitude for the promised treasure; and desired that all the things belonging to the deceased might be brought forth. Among others, there was a nest of trunks of which he had kept the keys whilst the man was ill, and when they were produced we opened them with no small eagerness and expectation; and as there were a great number within one another, with much impatience we took them one out of the other. At last, when we came to the smallest, and had opened it, we saw it was full of papers, which we supposed to be notes; at the sight of which our hearts leapt for joy; and that instant the Captain, clapping his hands, cried out, "Thank God, here it is." But when we took up the trunk, and began to examine the supposed treasure and long-looked-for bounty, (alas! alas! how uncertain and deceitful are all human affairs!) what had we found! While we were embracing a substance we grasped an empty nothing. The whole amount that was in the nest of trunks was only one dollar and a half; and all that the man possessed would not pay for his coffin. Our sudden and exquisite joy was now succeeded by as sudden and exquisite pain; and my Captain and I exhibited, for some time, most ridiculous figures—pictures of chagrin and disappointment! We went away greatly mortified, and left the deceased to do as well as he could for himself, as we had taken so good care of him when alive for nothing. We set sail once more for Montserrat, and arrived there safe; but much out of humor with our friend the silversmith. When we had unladen the vessel, and I had sold my venture, finding myself master of about forty-seven pounds, I consulted my true friend, the Captain, how I should proceed in offering my master the money for my freedom. He told me to come on a certain morning, when he and my master would be at breakfast together. Accordingly, on that morning I went, and met the Captain there, as he had appointed.

When I went in I made my obeisance to my master, and with my money in my hand, and many fears in my heart, I prayed him to be as good as his offer to me, when he was pleased to promise me my freedom as soon as I could purchase it. This speech seemed to confound him; he began to recoil; and my heart that instant sank within me. "What," said he, "give you your freedom? Why, where did you get the money? Have you got forty pounds sterling?" "Yes, sir," I answered. "How did you get it?" replied he. I told him, very honestly. The Captain then said he knew I got the money very honestly and with much industry, and that I was particularly careful. On which my master replied, I got money much faster than he did; and said he would not have made me the promise he did if he had thought I should have got money so soon. "Come, come," said my worthy Captain, clapping my master on the back, "Come, Robert" (which was his name), "I think you must let him have his freedom; you have laid your money out very well; you have received good interest for it all this time, and here is now the principal at last. I know Gustavus has earned you more than an hundred a-year, and he will still save you money, as he will not leave you:—Come, Robert, take the money." My master then said, he would not be worse than his promise; and, taking the money, told me to go to the Secretary at the Register Office, and get my manumission<sup>9</sup> drawn up. These words of my master were like a voice from heaven to me: in an instant all my trepidation was turned into unutterable bliss; and I most reverently bowed myself with gratitude, unable to express my feelings, but by the overflowing of my eyes, while my true and worthy friend, the Captain, congratulated us both with a peculiar degree of heartfelt pleasure. As soon as the first transports of my joy were over, and that I had expressed my thanks to these my worthy friends in the best manner I was able, I rose with a heart full of affection and reverence, and left the room, in order to obey my master's joyful mandate of going to the Register Office. As I was leaving the house I called to mind the words of the Psalmist, in the 126th Psalm, and like him, "I glorified God in my heart, in whom I trusted." These words had been impressed on my mind from the very day I was forced from Deptford<sup>1</sup> to the present hour, and I now saw them, as I thought, fulfilled and verified. My imagination was all rapture as I flew to the Register Office, and in this respect, like the apostle Peter<sup>2</sup> (whose deliverance from prison was so sudden and extraordinary, that he thought he was in a vision), I could scarcely believe I was awake. Heavens! who could do justice to my feelings at this moment! Not conquering heroes themselves, in the midst of a triumph—Not the tender mother who had just regained her long-lost infant, and presses it to her heart—Not the weary hungry mariner, at the sight of the desired friendly port—Not the lover, when he once more embraces his beloved mistress, after she had been ravished from his arms!—All within my breast was tumult, wildness, and delirium! My feet scarcely touched the ground, for they were winged with joy, and, like Elijah, as he rose to Heaven,<sup>3</sup> they “were with lightning sped as I went on.” Every one I met I told of my happiness, and blazed about the virtue of my amiable master and captain.

When I got to the office and acquainted the Register with my errand he congratulated me on the occasion, and told me he would draw up my manumission for half price, which was a guinea. I thanked him for his kindness; and having received it and paid him, I hastened to my master to get him to sign it, that I might be fully released. Accordingly he signed the manumission that day, so that, before night, I who had been a slave in the morning, trembling at the will of another, was become my own master, and completely free. I thought this was the happiest day I had ever experienced; and my joy was still heightened by the blessings and prayers of the sable race, particularly the aged, to whom my heart had ever been attached with reverence.

As the form of my manumission has something peculiar in it, and expresses the absolute power and dominion one man claims over his fellow, I shall beg leave to present it before my readers at full length:

Montserrat.—To all men unto whom these presents shall come: I Robert King, of the parish of St. Anthony in the said island, merchant, send greeting: Know ye, that I the aforesaid Robert King, for and in consideration of the sum of seventy pounds current money of the said island,<sup>4</sup> to me in hand paid, and to the intent that a negro man-slave, named Gustavus Vassa, shall and may become free, have manumitted, emancipated, enfranchised, and set free, and by these presents do manumit, emancipate, enfranchise, and set free, the aforesaid negro man-slave, named Gustavus Vassa, for ever, hereby giving, granting, and releasing unto him, the said Gustavus Vassa, all right, title, dominion, sovereignty, and property, which, as lord and master over the aforesaid Gustavus Vassa, I had, or now I have, or by any means whatsoever I may or can hereafter possibly have over him the aforesaid negro, for ever. In witness whereof I the above-said Robert King have unto these presents set my hand and seal, this tenth day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty-six.

ROBERT KING

Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of Terrylegay, Montserrat.

Registered the within manumission at full length, this eleventh day of July, 1766, in liber D.<sup>5</sup>

TERRYLEGAY, REGISTER.

In short, the fair as well as black people immediately styled me by a new appellation, to me the most desirable in the world, which was Freeman, and at the dances I gave my Georgia superfine blue clothes made no indifferent appearance, as I thought. Some of the sable females, who formerly stood aloof, now began to relax and appear less coy; but my heart was still fixed on London, where I hoped to be ere long. So that my worthy captain and his owner, my late master, finding that the bent of my mind was towards London, said to me, "We hope you won't leave us, but that you will still be with the vessels." Here gratitude bowed me down; and none but the generous mind can judge of my feelings, struggling between inclination and duty. However, notwithstanding my wish to be in London, I obediently answered my benefactors that I would go in the vessel, and not leave them; and from that day I was entered on board as an able-bodied sailor, at thirty-six shillings per month, besides what perquisites I could make.<sup>6</sup> My intention was to make a voyage or two, entirely to please these my honored patrons; but I determined that the year following, if it pleased God, I would see Old England once more, and surprise my old master, Capt. Pascal, who was hourly in my mind; for I still loved him, notwithstanding his usage of me,<sup>7</sup> and I pleased myself with thinking of what he would say when he saw what the Lord had done for me in so short a time, instead of being, as he might perhaps suppose, under the cruel yoke of some planter. With these kind of reveries I used often to entertain myself, and shorten the time till my return; and now, being as in my original free African state, I embarked on board the Nancy, after having got all things ready for our voyage. In this state of serenity we sailed for St. Eustatia;<sup>8</sup> and, having smooth seas and calm weather, we soon arrived there: after taking our cargo on board, we proceeded to Savannah in Georgia, in August, 1766. While we were there, as usual, I used to go for the cargo up the rivers in boats; and on this business I have been frequently beset by alligators, which were very numerous on that coast, and I have shot many of them when they have been near getting into our boats; which we have with great difficulty sometimes prevented, and have been very much frightened at them. I have seen a young one sold in Georgia alive for six pence. During our stay at this place, one evening a slave belonging to Mr. Read, a merchant of Savannah, came near our vessel, and began to use me very ill. I entreated him, with all the patience I was master of, to desist, as I knew there was little or no law for a free negro here; but the fellow, instead of taking my advice, persevered in his insults, and even struck me. At this I lost all temper, and I fell on him and beat him soundly. The next morning his master came to our vessel as we lay alongside the wharf, and desired me to come ashore that he might have me flogged all round the town, for beating his negro slave. I told him he had insulted me, and had given the provocation, by first striking me. I had told my captain also the whole affair that morning, and wished him to have gone along with me to Mr. Read, to prevent bad consequences; but he said that it did not signify, and if Mr. Read said anything he would make matters up, and had desired me to go to work, which I accordingly did. The Captain being on board when Mr. Read came, he told him I was a free man; and when Mr. Read applied to him to deliver me up, he said he knew nothing of the matter. I was astonished and frightened at this, and thought I had better keep where I was than go ashore and be flogged round the town, without judge or jury. I therefore refused to stir; and Mr. Read went away, swearing he would bring all the constables in the town, for he would have me out of the vessel. When he was gone, I thought his threat might prove too true to my sorrow; and I was confirmed in this belief, as well by the many instances I had seen of the treatment of free negroes, as from a fact that had happened within my own knowledge here a short time before. There was a free Black man, a carpenter, that I knew, who, for asking a gentleman that he worked for for the money he had earned, was put into jail; and afterwards this oppressed man was sent from Georgia, with false accusations, of an intention to set the gentleman's house on fire, and run away with his slaves. I was therefore much embarrassed, and very apprehensive of a flogging at least. I dreaded, of all things, the thoughts of being striped,<sup>9</sup> as I never in my life had the marks of any violence of that kind. At that instant a rage seized my soul, and for a little I determined to resist the first man that should offer to lay violent hands on me, or basely use me without a trial; for I would sooner die like a free man, than suffer myself to be scourged by the hands of ruffians, and my blood drawn like a slave. The captain and others, more cautious, advised me to make haste and conceal myself; for they said Mr. Read was a very spiteful man, and he would soon come on board with constables and take me. At first I refused this counsel, being determined to stand my ground; but at length, by the prevailing entreaties of the captain and Mr. Dixon, with whom he lodged, I went to Mr. Dixon's house, which was a little out of town, at a place called Yea-ma-chra.<sup>1</sup> I was but just gone when Mr. Read, with the constables, came for me, and searched the vessel; but, not finding me there, he swore he would have me dead or alive. I was secreted about five days; however, the good character<sup>2</sup> which my captain always gave me as well as some other gentlemen who also knew me procured me some friends. At last some of them told my captain that he did not use me well, in suffering me thus to be imposed upon, and said they would see me redressed, and get me on board some other vessel. My captain, on this, immediately went to Mr. Read, and told him, that ever since I eloped from the vessel his work had been neglected, and he could not go on with her loading, himself and mate not being well; and, as I had managed things on board for them, my absence must retard his voyage, and consequently hurt the owner; he therefore begged of him to forgive me, as he said he never had any complaint of me before, for the many years that I had been with him. After repeated entreaties, Mr. Read said I might go to hell, and that he would not meddle with me; on which my captain came immediately to me at his lodging, and, telling me how pleasantly matters had gone on, he desired me to go on board. Some of my other friends then asked him if he had got the constable's warrant from them; the captain said, No. On this I was desired by them to stay in the house; and they said they would get me on board of some other vessel before the evening. When the captain heard this he became almost distracted. He went immediately for the warrant, and, after using every exertion in his power, he at last got it from my hunters; but I had all the expenses to pay. After I had thanked all my friends for their attention, I went on board again to my work, of which I had always plenty.

[LETTER TO THE QUEEN]

March the 21st, 1788, I had the honor of presenting the Queen with a petition on behalf of my African brethren, which was received most graciously by her Majesty:<sup>3</sup>

To the QUEEN's most Excellent Majesty
Madam,

Your Majesty's well-known benevolence and humanity emboldens me to approach your royal presence, trusting that the obscurity of my situation will not prevent your Majesty from attending to the sufferings for which I plead.

Yet I do not solicit your royal pity for my own distress; my sufferings, although numerous, are in a measure forgotten. I supplicate your Majesty's compassion for millions of my African countrymen, who groan under the lash of tyranny in the West Indies.

The oppression and cruelty exercised to the unhappy negroes there, have at length reached the British legislature, and they are now deliberating on its redress;<sup>4</sup> even several persons of property in slaves in the West Indies have petitioned parliament against its continuance, sensible that it is as impolitic as it is unjust—and what is inhuman must ever be unwise.

Your Majesty's reign has been hitherto distinguished by private acts of benevolence and bounty; surely the more extended the misery is, the greater claim it has to your Majesty's compassion, and the greater must be your Majesty's pleasure in administering to its relief. I presume, therefore, gracious Queen, to implore your interposition with your royal consort, in favor of the wretched Africans; that, by your Majesty's benevolent influence, a period<sup>5</sup> may now be put to their misery; and that they may be raised from the condition of brutes, to which they are at present degraded, to the rights and situation of freemen, and admitted to partake of the blessings of your Majesty's happy government; so shall your Majesty enjoy the heartfelt pleasure of procuring happiness to millions, and be rewarded in the grateful prayers of themselves, and of their posterity.

And may the all-bountiful Creator shower on your Majesty, and the royal family, every blessing that this world can afford, and every fulness of joy which divine revelation has promised us in the next.

I am your Majesty's most dutiful and devoted servant to command,

Gustavus Vassa,

The Oppressed Ethiopian.<sup>6</sup>

This bibliography consists of a list of suggested general readings on English literature. Bibliographies for the authors and topical clusters in The Norton Anthology of English Literature are available online at the NAEL student site.

Histories of England and of English Literature

Even the most distinguished of the comprehensive general histories written in past generations have come to seem outmoded. Innovative research in social, cultural, and political history has made it difficult to write a single coherent account of England from the Middle Ages to the present, let alone to accommodate in a unified narrative the complex histories of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the other nations where writing in English has flourished. Readers who wish to explore the historical matrix out of which the works of literature collected in this anthology emerged are advised to consult the studies of particular periods listed in the appropriate sections of this bibliography. The multivolume Oxford History of England (1934–65) and New Oxford History of England (1992–2009) are useful, as are the three-volume Peoples of the British Isles: A New History, by Stanford E. Lehmberg, Samantha A. Meigs, and Thomas William Heyck (3rd ed., 1992); the nine-volume Cambridge Cultural History of Britain, ed. Boris Ford (1992); the three-volume Cambridge Social History of Britain, 1750–1950, ed. F. M. L. Thompson (1990); and the multivolume Penguin History of Britain, gen. ed. David Cannadine (1996–). For Britain's imperial history, readers can consult the five-volume Oxford History of the British Empire, ed. Wm. Roger Louis (1998–99), as well as Gender and Empire, ed. Philippa Levine (2004). Also of interest is Lisa Lowe, The Intimacies of Four

Continents (2015). Given the cultural centrality of London, readers may find particular interest in The London Encyclopaedia, ed. Ben Weinreb et al. (3rd ed., 2008); Roy Porter, London: A Social History (1994); and Jerry White, London in the Nineteenth Century: "A Human Awful Wonder of God" (2007) and London in the Twentieth Century: A City and Its People (2001).

Similar observations may be made about literary history. In the light of such initiatives as women's studies, New Historicism, and postcolonialism, the range of authors deemed significant has expanded, along with the geographical and conceptual boundaries of literature in English. Attempts to capture in a unified account the great sweep of literature from Beowulf to the early twenty-first century have largely given way to studies of individual genres, carefully delimited time periods, and specific authors. Among the large-scale literary surveys, The Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, ed. Dominic Head (3rd ed., 2006), is useful, as is the nine-volume Penguin History of Literature (1987–94) and the multivolume Oxford History of Poetry in English (2022–). The Feminist Companion to Literature in English: Women Writers from the Middle Ages to the Present, ed. Virginia Blain, Isobel Grundy, and Patricia Clements (1990), is an important resource, and the editorial materials in the two-volume The Norton Anthology of Literature by Women: The Traditions in English, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (3rd ed., 2007), constitute a concise history and set of biographies of women authors since the Middle Ages. Annals of English Literature, 1475–1950 (2nd ed., 1961), lists important publications year by year, together with the significant literary events for each year. Seven volumes have been published in The Oxford English Literary History, gen. eds. Jonathan Bate and Colin Burrow (2002–): Laura Ashe, 1000–1350: Conquest and Transformation; James Simpson, 1350–1547: Reform and Cultural Revolution; Margaret J. M. Ezell, 1645–1714: The Later Seventeenth Century; Philip Davis, 1830–1880: The Victorians; Chris Baldick, 1830–1880: The Modern Movement (1910–1940); Randall Stevenson, 1960–2000: The Last of England?; and Bruce King, 1948–2000: The Internationalization of English.

Helpful treatments and surveys of English meter, rhyme, and stanza forms are Paul Fussell Jr., Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (rev. ed., 1979); Donald Wesling, The Chances of Rhyme: Device and Modernity (1980); Charles O. Hartman, Free Verse: An Essay on Prosody (1980); Derek Attridge, Poetic Rhythm: An Introduction (1995); Robert Pinsky, The Sounds of Poetry: A Brief Guide (1998); The Making of a Poem: A Norton Anthology of Poetic Forms, ed. Mark Strand and Eavan Boland (2000); John Hollander, Rhyme's Reason: A Guide to English Verse (3rd ed., 2001); Poems, Poets, Poetry: An Introduction and Anthology, ed. Helen Vendler (3rd ed., 2010); The Lyric Theory Reader: A Critical Anthology, ed. Virginia Jackson and Yopie Prins (2014); and Jonathan Culler, Theory of the Lyric (2015).

On the development and functioning of the novel as a form, see Ian Watt, The Rise of the Novel: Studies in Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding (1957); Gérard Genette, Narrative Discourse: An Essay in Method (1970; trans. 1980); Theory of the Novel: A Historical Approach, ed. Michael McKeon (2000); The Novel, ed. Franco Moretti (2 vols.; 2001–03, trans. 2006); McKeon, The Origins of the English Novel, 1600–1740 (15th anniversary ed., 2002); The Cambridge History of the English Novel, ed. Robert L. Caserio and Clement Hawes (2012); A Companion to the English Novel, ed. Stephen Arata et al. (2015); and the ten volumes to date of The Oxford History of the Novel in English (2012–). On women novelists and readers, see Nancy Armstrong, Desire and Domestic Fiction: A Political History of the Novel (1987), and Catherine Gallagher, Nobody's Story: The Vanishing Acts of Women Writers in the Marketplace, 1670–1820 (1994).

On the history of playhouse design, see Richard Leacroft, The Development of the English Playhouse: An Illustrated Survey of Theatre Building in England from Medieval to Modern Times (1988). For a survey of the plays that have appeared on these and other stages, see Allardyce Nicoll, British Drama, rev. J. C. Trewin (6th ed., 1978); the eight-volume The Revels History of Drama in English, gen. eds. Clifford Leech and T. W. Craik (1975–83); Alfred Harbage, Annals of English Drama, 975–1700, rev. S. Schoenbaum and Sylvia Wagonheim (3rd ed., 1989); and the three volumes of The Cambridge History of British Theatre, ed. Jane Milling, Peter Thomson, Joseph Donohue, and Baz Kershaw (2004).

On some of the key intellectual currents that are at once reflected in and shaped by literature and contemporary literary criticism, Arthur O. Lovejoy's classic studies The Great Chain of Being (1936) and Essays in the History of Ideas (1948) remain valuable, along with such works as Georg Simmel, The Philosophy of Money (1900; trans. 1907; 3rd enl. ed., 2004); Ernst Cassirer, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms (4 vols., 1923–95; trans. 1953–96); Arthur O. Lovejoy and George Boas, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Antiquity (1935); Norbert Elias, The Civilizing Process (2 vols., 1939; trans. 1979–82); Simone de Beauvoir, The Second Sex (2 vols., 1949; trans. 1953, new trans. 2009); Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (1952; trans. 1957, new trans. 2008); Ernst Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Mediaeval Political Theology (1957; new eds. 1997, 2016); Hannah Arendt, The Human Condition (1958; 2nd ed., 1998); Gaston Bachelard, The Poetics of Space (1958; trans. 1969, new ed. 1994); Richard Popkin, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (1960; rev. ed., 1964; rev. and expanded as The History of Scepticism: From Savonarola to Bayle, 2003); Hans Blumenberg, The Legitimacy of the Modern Age (1966; trans. 1983); M. ## Reference Works

The single most important tool for the study of literature in English is the Oxford English Dictionary (1884–1924; 2nd ed., 1989; 3rd ed. in process). The most current edition, updated quarterly, is available online to subscribers. The OED is written on historical principles: that is, it attempts not only to describe current word use but also to record the history and development of the language from its origins before the Norman Conquest to the present. It thus provides, for familiar as well as archaic and obscure words, the widest possible range of meanings and uses, organized chronologically and illustrated with quotations. The OED can be searched as a conventional dictionary arranged a–z and also by subject, usage, region, origin, and timeline (the first appearance of a word). Resources available for early forms of English include the online Old English and Middle English dictionaries at Lexilogos (https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english\_old.htm and https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english\_middle.htm); also valuable are the Dictionary of Old English (1986–) and the Middle English Dictionary (1952; digitized 2008). Beyond the OED there are many other valuable dictionaries, such as The American Heritage Dictionary (5th ed., 50th anniversary printing, 2018); The Oxford Dictionary of Abbreviations (1992); T. F. Hoad, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of English Etymology (1993); Bas Aarts, Sylvia Chalker, and Edmund Weiner, The Oxford Dictionary of English Grammar (2nd ed., 2014); Morton S. Freeman, A New Dictionary of Eponyms (1997); The Oxford Essential Dictionary of Foreign Terms in English (1999); The Oxford Dictionary of Idioms, ed. Judith Siefring (2nd ed., 2004); P. H. Matthews, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Linguistics (3rd ed., 2014); Tom McArthur, The Oxford Guide to World English (2002); and The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Proverbs, ed. Jennifer Speake (4th ed., 2003). Other valuable reference works include The Cambridge Encyclopedia of the English Language, ed. David Crystal (3rd ed., 2018); The Concise Oxford Companion to the English Language, ed. Tom McArthur (1998); Fowler's Concise Dictionary of Modern English Usage, ed. Jeremy Butterfield (3rd ed., 2016); and the numerous guides to specialized vocabularies, slang, regional dialects, and the like.

There is a steady flow of new editions of most major and many minor writers in English, along with the publication of critical appraisals and scholarship. James L. Harner's Literary Research Guide: An Annotated List of Reference Sources in English Literary Studies (6th ed., 2014; available online at www.mlalrg.org/public) offers thorough, evaluative annotations of a wide range of sources. For the historical record of scholarship and critical discussion, The New Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. George

Watson (5 vols., 1969–77), and the third edition in process, The Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. Joanne Shattock (1 vol. to date, 2000–), are useful. The MLA International Bibliography (also online) is a key resource for following critical discussion of literatures in English. Ranging from 1926 to the present, it includes journal articles, essays, chapters from collections, books, and dissertations, and covers folklore, linguistics, and film. The Annual Bibliography of English Language and Literature (ABELL), compiled by the Modern Humanities Research Association, lists monographs, periodical articles, critical editions of literary works, book reviews, and collections of essays published anywhere in the world; unpublished doctoral dissertations are covered for the period 1920–99 (available online to subscribers directly and as part of Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>).

For compact biographies of English authors, see the multivolume Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (DNB), ed. H. C. G. Matthew and Brian Harrison (2004); since 2004 the DNB has been extended online with updates (now monthly). Handy reference books of authors, works, and various literary terms and allusions include many volumes in the Cambridge Companion and Oxford Companion series: e.g., The Cambridge Companion to Narrative, ed. David Herman (2007); The Oxford Companion to English Literature, ed. Dinah Birch (7th ed., 2009); and The Cambridge Companion to Allegory, ed. Rita Copeland and Peter Struck (2010). The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, editor-in-chief Roland Greene (4th ed., 2012), is available online to subscribers in Oxford Reference. Handbooks that define and illustrate literary concepts and terms include The Penguin Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory, ed. J. A. Cuddon and M. A. R. Habib (5th ed., 2015); William Harmon, A Handbook to Literature (12th ed., 2011); Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. Frank Lentricchia and Thomas McLaughlin (2nd ed., 1995); and M. H. Abrams and Geoffrey Galt Harpham, A Glossary of Literary Terms (11th ed., 2014). Also useful are Richard A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms (2nd ed., 1991); Arthur Quinn, Figures of Speech: 60 Ways to Turn a Phrase (1982); the

Barnhart Concise Dictionary of Etymology, ed. Robert K. Barnhart (1995); and George A. Kennedy, A New History of Classical Rhetoric (1994).

On Greek and Roman backgrounds, see The Cambridge History of Classical Literature—vol. 1, Greek Literature, ed. P. E. Easterling and Bernard M. W. Knox (1985), and vol. 2, Latin Literature, ed. E. J. Kenney and W. V. Clausen (1982), both available to subscribers online; The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, ed. M. C. Howatson (3rd ed., 2011); Gian Biagio Conte, Latin Literature: A History (1987; trans. 1994); The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. Simon Hornblower, Antony Spawforth, and Esther Eidinow (4th ed., 2012); Richard Rutherford, Classical Literature: A Concise History (2005); and Mark P. O. Morford, Robert J. Lenardon, and Michael Sham, Classical Mythology (11th ed., 2018). The Loeb Classical Library of Greek and Roman texts with facing-page English translations is now available online to subscribers at www.loebclassics.com.

Digital resources in the humanities continue to grow rapidly. Among the many useful electronic resources for the study of English literature are enormous digital archives, available to subscribers: Early English Books Online (EEBO), <http://eebo.chadwyck.com/home>; Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>; and Eighteenth Century Collections Online (ECCO), www.gale.com/primary-sources/eighteenth-century-collections-online. There are also numerous free sites of variable quality. Many of the best of these are period- or author-specific and hence are listed in the period/author bibliographies on the NAEL website. Among the general sites, one of the most useful and wide-ranging is Voice of the Shuttle (<http://vos.ucsb.edu>), which includes links to Bartleby.com and Project Gutenberg.

Literary Criticism and Theory

The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism comprises nine volumes (1989–2013): Classical Criticism, ed. George A. Kennedy; The Middle

Ages, ed. Alastair Minnis and Ian Johnson; The Renaissance, ed. Glyn P. Norton; The Eighteenth Century, ed. H. B. Nisbet and Claude Rawson; Romanticism, ed. Marshall Brown; The Nineteenth Century, c. 1830–1914, ed. M. A. R. Habib; Modernism and the New Criticism, ed. A. Walton Litz, Louis Menand, and Lawrence Rainey; From Formalism to Poststructuralism, ed. Raman Selden; and Twentieth-Century Historical, Philosophical and Psychological Perspectives, ed. Christa Knellwolf and Christopher Norris. See also M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp: Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition (1953); William K. Wimsatt Jr. and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History (1957); René Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750–1950 (8 vols., 1955–92); Frank Lentricchia, After the New Criticism (1980); J. Hillis Miller, On Literature (2002); and John Frow, Character and Person (2014). Raman Selden, Peter Widdowson, and Peter Brooker have written A Reader's Guide to Contemporary Literary Theory (6th ed., 2017). Other useful resources include The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Michael Groden, Martin Kreiswirth, and Imre Szeman (2nd ed., 2005); Literary Theory: An Anthology, ed. Julie Rivkin and Michael Ryan (3rd ed., 2017); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, gen. ed. Vincent B. Leitch (3rd ed., 2018).

Modern approaches to English literature and literary theory were shaped by certain landmark works: William Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930; 3rd ed., 1953), Some Versions of Pastoral (1935), and The Structure of Complex Words (1951; 3rd ed., 1977); T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays (1932; 3rd ed., 1951) and On Poetry and Poets (1957); F. R. Leavis, Revaluation: Tradition and Development in English Poetry (1936) and The Great Tradition: George Eliot, Henry James, Joseph Conrad (1948); Erich Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (1946; trans. 1953); Lionel Trilling, The Liberal Imagination: Essays on Literature and Society (1950); William K. Wimsatt Jr., The Verbal Icon: Studies in the Meaning of Poetry (1954); Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays (1957); Wayne C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961; 2nd ed., 1983); and W. Jackson Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1970). René Wellek and Austin Warren, Theory of Literature (3rd ed., 1963), is a useful introduction to the variety of scholarly and critical approaches to literature up to the time of its publication. Jonathan Culler's Literary Theory: A Very Short Introduction (2nd ed., 2011), discusses recurrent issues and debates. On the discipline of criticism, see John Guillory's Professing Criticism: Essays on the Organization of Literary Study (2022); Rita Felski's The Limits of Critique (2015) is a critical assessment of contemporary criticism.

Beginning in the late 1960s, interest in literary theory as a specific field markedly intensified. Certain forms of literary study had already been influenced by the work of the Russian linguist Roman Jakobson and the Russian formalist Viktor Shklovsky—and, still more, by conceptions that derived or claimed to derive from Marx and Engels—but the full impact of these theories was not felt until what became known as the “theory revolution” of the 1970s and ’80s. For Marxist literary criticism, see Georg Lukács, Theory of the Novel: A Historico-philosophical Essay on the Forms of Great Epic Literature (1920; trans. 1971), The Historical Novel (1937; trans. 1962), and Studies in European Realism: A Sociological Survey of the Writings of Balzac, Stendhal, Zola, Tolstoy, Gorki, and Others (trans. 1950); Walter Benjamin's essays from the 1920s and ’30s, represented in Illuminations (1955; trans. 1968) and Reflections: Essays, Aphorisms, Autobiographical Writings (1975; trans. 1978); Mikhail Bakhtin's essays from the 1930s represented in The Dialogic Imagination: Four Essays (trans. 1981) and Rabelais and His World (1965; trans. 1968); Selections from the Prison Notebooks of Antonio Gramsci, ed. and trans. Quintin Hoare and Geoffrey Nowell Smith (1971); Raymond Williams, Marxism and Literature (1977); Tony Bennett, Formalism and Marxism (1979; 2nd ed., 2003); Fredric Jameson, The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act (1981); and Terry Eagleton, Literary Theory: An Introduction (1983; anniversary ed., 2008) and The Ideology of the Aesthetic (1990).

Structural linguistics and anthropology gave rise to a flowering of structuralist literary criticism; convenient introductions include Robert Scholes, Structuralism in Literature: An Introduction (1974), and Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics: Structuralism, Linguistics and the Study of Literature (new ed., 2002). Poststructuralist challenges to this approach are epitomized in such influential works as Jacques Derrida, Writing and Difference (1967; trans. 1978), and Paul de Man, Blindness and Insight: Essays in the Rhetoric of Contemporary Criticism (1971; 2nd ed., 1983). Poststructuralism is discussed in Jonathan Culler, On Deconstruction: Theory and Criticism after Structuralism (1982; 25th anniversary ed., 2007); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Fredric Jameson, Postmodernism; or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991); John McGowan, Postmodernism and Its Critics (1991); and Beyond Structuralism: The Speculations of Theory and the Experience of Reading, ed. Wendell V. Harris (1996). A figure who greatly influenced both structuralism and poststructuralism is Roland Barthes, in Mythologies (1957; trans. 1972, new trans. 2012) and S/Z (1970; trans. 1974). Among other influential contributions to literary theory are the psychoanalytic approach in Harold Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence: A Theory of Poetry (1973; 2nd ed., 1997), and the reader-response approach in Stanley Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980). For a retrospect on these decades, see Terry Eagleton, After Theory (2003).

Influenced by these theoretical currents but not restricted to them, modern feminist literary criticism was fashioned by such works as Patricia Meyer Spacks, The Female Imagination (1975); Ellen Moers, Literary Women (1976; new ed., 1986); Elaine Showalter, A Literature of Their Own: British Women Novelists from Brontë to Lessing (1977; expanded ed., 1999); and Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination (1979). Subsequent studies include Jane Gallop, The Daughter's Seduction: Feminism and Psychoanalysis (1982); Luce Irigaray, This Sex Which Is Not One (1977; trans. 1985); Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics (1987; new ed., 2006); Barbara Johnson, A World of Difference (1987); Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, No Man's Land: The Place of the Woman Writer in the Twentieth Century (3 vols., 1988–94); Judith Butler, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity (1990; 2nd ed., 1999); and the critical views sampled in The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature, and Theory, ed. Elaine Showalter (1985); Feminist Literary Theory: A Reader, ed. Mary Eagleton (1986; 3rd ed., 2011); and Feminisms: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Robyn R. Warhol and Diane Price Herndl (1991; rev. in 2009 as Feminisms Redux: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism); The Hélène Cixous Reader, ed. Susan Sellers (1994); The Cambridge Companion to Feminist Literary Theory, ed. Ellen Rooney (2006); and Feminist Literary Theory and Criticism: A Norton Reader, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (2007).

Just as feminist critics used poststructuralist and psychoanalytic methods to place literature in conversation with gender theory, a new school emerged placing literature in conversation with critical race theory. Comprehensive introductions include Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings That Formed the Movement, ed. Kimberlé Crenshaw et al. (1995); and Richard Delgado and Jean Stefancic, Critical Race Theory: An Introduction (3rd ed., 2017); and The Routledge Companion to Race and Ethnicity, ed. Stephen M. Caliendo and Charlton D. McIlwain (2nd ed., 2021). For an important precursor in cultural studies, see Stuart Hall et al., Policing the Crisis: Mugging, the State and Law and Order (1978; 2nd ed., 2013). Seminal works include Henry Louis Gates Jr., The Signifying Monkey: A Theory of African-American Literary Criticism (1988; 25th anniversary ed., 2014); Patricia Williams, The Alchemy of Race and Rights (1991); Toni Morrison, Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination (1992); Cornel West, Race Matters (1993; 25th anniversary ed., 2017); Gene Andrew Jarrett, Representing the Race: A New Political History of African American Literature (2011); Fred Moten, Black and Blur (2017); and Saidiya V. Hartman,

Wayward Lives, Beautiful Experiments: Intimate Histories of Social Upheaval (2019). Other important works include Kathleen Davis, Periodization and Sovereignty: How Ideas of Feudalism and Secularization Govern the Politics of Time (2008; rpt. 2017); Alexander G. Weheliye, Habeas Viscus: Racializing Assemblages, Biopolitics, and Black Feminist Theories of the Human (2014); Christina Sharpe, In the Wake: On Blackness and Being (2016); and Geraldine Heng, The Invention of Race in the European Middle Ages (2018). Helpful anthologies and collections of essays have emerged in recent decades, such as The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris (1997), and also their Concise Oxford Companion to African American Literature (2001); Unchained Voices: An Anthology of Black Authors in the English-Speaking World of the Eighteenth Century, ed. Vincent Carretta (1996; updated 2003); The Cambridge Companion to Jewish American Literature, ed. Hana Wirth-Nesher and Michael P. Kramer (2003); A Companion to African American Literature, ed. Gene Andrew Jarrett (2010); The Routledge Companion to Anglophone Caribbean Literature, ed. Michael A. Bucknor and Alison Donnell (2011); The Routledge Companion to Latino/a Literature, ed. Suzanne Bost and Frances R. Aparicio (2013); The Routledge Companion to Asian American and Pacific Islander Literature, ed. Rachel C. Lee (2014); The Cambridge Companion to Asian American Literature, ed. Crystal Parikh and Daniel Y. Kim (2015); and The Cambridge Companion to British Black and Asian Literature, 1945–2010, ed. Deirdre Osborne (2016).

Gay literature and queer studies are represented in collections including Inside/Out: Lesbian Theories, Gay Theories, ed. Diana Fuss (1991); The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader, ed. Henry Abelove, Michèle Aina Barale, and David Halperin (1993); The Columbia Anthology of Gay Literature: Readings from Western Antiquity to the Present Day, ed. Byrne R. S. Fone (1998); The Cambridge History of Gay and Lesbian Literature, ed. E. L. McCallum and Mikko Tuhkanen (2014); and The Cambridge Companion to Lesbian Literature, ed. Jodie Medd (2015), and by such books as Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick,

Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire (1985; 30th anniversary ed., 2015) and Epistemology of the Closet (1990; updated ed., 2008); Diana Fuss, Essentially Speaking: Feminism, Nature, and Difference (1989); Terry Castle, The Apparitional Lesbian: Female Homosexuality and Modern Culture (1993); Leo Bersani, Homos (1995); Gregory Woods, A History of Gay Literature: The Male Tradition (1998); David Halperin, How to Do the History of Homosexuality (2002); Judith Halberstam, In a Queer Time and Place: Transgender Bodies, Subcultural Lives (2005); Heather Love, Feeling Backward: Loss and the Politics of Queer History (2007); and Brian Glavey, The Wallflower Avant-garde: Modernism, Sexuality, and Queer Ekphrasis (2016).

New Historicism is represented in Stephen Greenblatt, Learning to Curse: Essays in Early Modern Culture (1990; new ed., 2007); New Historical Literary Study: Essays on Reproducing Texts, Representing History, ed. Jeffrey N. Cox and Larry J. Reynolds (1993); The New Historicism Reader, ed. H. Aram Veeser (1994); and Catherine Gallagher and Stephen Greenblatt, Practicing New Historicism (2000). The related social and historical dimension of texts is discussed in Jerome McGann, Critique of Modern Textual Criticism (1983), and Scholarly Editing: A Guide to Research, ed. D. C. Greetham (1995). Characteristic of New Historicism is an expansion of the field of literary interpretation still further in cultural studies; for a broad sampling of the range of interests, see Cultural Studies, ed. Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula A. Treichler (1992); A Cultural Studies Reader: History, Theory, Practice, ed. Jessica Munns and Gita Rajan (1995); and The Cultural Studies Reader, ed. Simon During (3rd ed., 2007).

This expansion of the field is similarly reflected in postcolonial studies: see Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (cited above) and The Wretched of the Earth (1961; trans. 1963, 60th anniversary ed. 2021); Edward Said, Orientalism (1978) and Culture and Imperialism (1993); Nation and Narration, ed. Homi K. Bhabha (1990); The Post-Colonial Studies Reader, ed. Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths and Helen Tiffin (2nd ed., 2006); and such influential books

Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Elleke Boehmer, Colonial and Postcolonial Literature: Migrant Metaphors (1995; 2nd ed., 2005); Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (2000; new ed., 2008); and Robert J. C. Young, Postcolonialism: An Historical Introduction (2001; anniversary ed., 2016). Useful collections include The Cambridge History of Postcolonial Literature, ed. Ato Quayson (2 vols., 2011–12); The Cambridge Companion to the Postcolonial Novel, ed. Ato Quayson (2016); and The Cambridge Companion to Postcolonial Poetry, ed. Jahan Ramazani (2017).

In the wake of the theory revolution, critics have focused on a wide array of topics, which can be only briefly surveyed here. One current of work, focusing on the history of emotion, is represented in Brian Massumi, Parables for the Virtual: Movement, Affect, Sensation (2002); Sianne Ngai, Ugly Feelings (2005); The Affect Theory Reader, ed. Melissa Gregg and Gregory J. Seigworth (2010); and Judith Butler, Senses of the Subject (2015). A somewhat related current, examining the special role of traumatic memory in literature, is exemplified in Trauma: Explorations in Memory, ed. Cathy Caruth (1995), and Dominic LaCapra, Writing History, Writing Trauma (2001; new ed., 2014). Work on the literary implications of cognitive science may be glimpsed in Introduction to Cognitive Cultural Studies, ed. Lisa Zunshine (2010). Interest in quantitative approaches to literature was sparked by Franco Moretti's Graphs, Maps, Trees: Abstract Models for Literary History (2005). For the field of digital humanities, see Moretti, Distant Reading (2013); Defining Digital Humanities: A Reader, ed. Melissa Terras, Julianne Nyhan, and Edward Vanhoutte (2013); and A New Companion to Digital Humanities, ed. Susan Schreibman, Ray Siemens, and John Unsworth (2016). For ecocriticism, or studies of literature and the environment, see The Ecocriticism Reader: Landmarks in Literary Ecology, ed. Cheryll Glotfelty and Harold Fromm (1996); Writing the Environment: Ecocriticism and Literature, ed. Richard Kerridge and

Neil Sammells (1998); Jonathan Bate, The Song of the Earth (2000); Lawrence Buell, The Future of Environmental Criticism: Environmental Crisis and Literary Imagination (2005); Timothy Morton, Ecology Without Nature: Rethinking Environmental Aesthetics (2007); Jane Bennett, Vibrant Matter: A Political Ecology of Things (2010); Rob Nixon, Slow Violence and the Environmentalism of the Poor (2011); The Oxford Handbook of Ecocriticism, ed. Greg Garrard (2014); and Anthropocene Reading: Literary History in Geologic Times, ed. Tobias Menely and Jesse Oak Taylor (2017). Related are the fields of animal studies and posthumanism, whose key works include Bruno Latour, We Have Never Been Modern (1991; trans. 1993); Steve Baker, The Postmodern Animal (2000); Cary Wolfe, Animal Rites: American Culture, the Discourse of Species, and Posthumanist Theory (2003) and What Is Posthumanism? (2009); Jacques Derrida, The Animal That Therefore I Am (2006; trans. 2008); Kari Weil, Thinking Animals: Why Animal Studies Now? (2012); Animals and the Human Imagination: A Companion to Animal Studies, ed. Aaron Gross and Anne Vallely (2012); and Critical Animal Studies: Thinking the Unthinkable, ed. John Sorenson (2014). The relationship between literature and law is central to such works as Interpreting Law and Literature: A Hermeneutic Reader, ed. Sanford Levinson and Steven Mailloux (1988); Law's Stories: Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law, ed. Peter Brooks and Paul Gewirtz (1996); Literature and Legal Problem Solving: Law and Literature as Ethical Discourse, ed. Paul J. Heald (1998); and New Directions in Law and Literature, ed. Elizabeth S. Anker and Bernadette Meyler (2017). Ethical questions in literature have been usefully explored by, among others, Geoffrey Galt Harpham in Getting It Right: Language, Literature, and Ethics (1992) and Derek Attridge in The Singularity of Literature (2004). Finally, some approaches to literature, such as formalism and literary biography, that seemed superseded in the theoretical ferment of the late twentieth century have had a resurgence. A renewed interest in form is evident in Susan Stewart, Poetry and the Fate of the Senses (2002); Reading for Form, ed. Susan J. Wolfson and Marshall Brown (2006); and Caroline Levine, Forms: Whole, Rhythm, Hierarchy,

Network (2015). Interest in the history of the book was spearheaded by D. F. McKenzie's Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts (1986), Jerome J. McGann's The Textual Condition (1991), and Roger Chartier's The Order of Books: Readers, Authors, and Libraries in Europe Between the Fourteenth and Eighteenth Centuries (1992; trans. 1994). See also The Practice and Representation of Reading in England, ed. James Raven, Helen Small, and Naomi Tadmor (1996); The Cambridge History of the Book in Britain (7 vols., 1999–2019); The Book History Reader, ed. David Finkelstein and Alistair McCleery (2nd ed., 2006); and The Cambridge Companion to the History of the Book, ed. Leslie Howsam (2015). Kirschenbaum, Track Changes: A Literary History of Word Processing (2016); and Jessica Pressman's Bookishness: Loving Books in a Digital Age (2020).

Anthologies representing a range of recent approaches include Modern Criticism and Theory, ed. David Lodge with Nigel Wood (2nd ed., 2000); Contemporary Literary Criticism, ed. Robert Con Davis and Ronald Schleifer (4th ed., 1998); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism (cited above).

Literary Terminology*

Using simple technical terms can sharpen our understanding and streamline our discussion of literary works. Some terms, such as the ones in section A, below, help us address the internal style, structure, form, and kind of works. Other terms, such as those in section B, provide insight into the material forms in which literary works have been produced.

In analyzing what they called “rhetoric,” ancient Greek and Roman writers determined the elements of what we call “style” and “structure.” Most of our literary terms are derived, via medieval and Renaissance intermediaries, from the Greek and Latin sources. In the definitions that follow, the etymology, or root, of the word is given when it helps illuminate the word’s current usage.

Many of the examples are drawn from texts in The Norton Anthology of English Literature.

Words boldfaced within definitions are themselves defined in this appendix. Some terms are defined within definitions; such words are italicized.

A. Terms of Style, Structure, Form, and Kind

accent (synonym “stress”): a term of rhythm. The special force devoted to the voicing of one syllable in a word over others. In the noun “accent,” for example, the accent, or stress, is on the first syllable.

act: the major subdivision of a play, usually divided into scenes.

aesthetics (from Greek, “to feel, apprehend by the senses”): the philosophy of artistic meaning as a distinct mode of apprehending

untranslatable truth, defined as an alternative to rational enquiry, which is purely abstract. Developed in the late eighteenth century by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant especially.

Alexandrine: a term of meter. In French verse a line of twelve syllables, and, by analogy, in English verse a line of six stresses. See hexameter.

allegory (Greek "saying otherwise"): saying one thing (the "vehicle" of the allegory) and meaning another (the allegory's "tenor"). Allegories may be momentary aspects of a work, as in metaphor ("John is a lion"), or, through extended metaphor, may constitute the basis of narrative, as in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress: this second meaning is the dominant one. See also symbol and type. Allegory is one of the most significant figures of thought.

alliteration (from Latin "litera," alphabetic letter): a figure of speech. The repetition of an initial consonant sound or consonant cluster in consecutive or closely positioned words. This pattern is often an inseparable part of the meter in Germanic languages, where the tonic, or accented syllable, is usually the first syllable. Thus all Old English poetry and some varieties of Middle English poetry use alliteration as part of their basic metrical practice. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 1: "Once the siege and assault of Troy had ceased" (see vol. A, p. 415). Otherwise used for local effects; Stevie Smith, "Pretty," lines 4–5: "And in the pretty pool the pike stalks / He stalks his prey . . ." (see vol. F, p. 589).

allusion: Literary allusion is a passing but illuminating reference within a literary text to another, well-known text (often biblical or classical). Topical allusions are also, of course, common in certain modes, especially satire.

anagnorisis (Greek "recognition"): the moment of protagonist's recognition in a narrative, which is also often the moment of moral understanding.

anapest: a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two unstressed (uu) syllables followed by one stressed (/). Thus, for example, "Illinois."

anaphora (Greek "carrying back"): a figure of speech. The repetition of words or groups of words at the beginning of consecutive sentences, clauses, or phrases. Blake, "London," lines 5–8: "In every cry of every Man, / In every Infant's cry of fear, / In every voice, in every ban . . ." (see vol. D, p. 137); Louise Bennett, "Jamaica Oman," lines 17–20: "Some backa man a push, some side-a / Man a hole him han, / Some a lick sense eena him head, / Some a guide him pon him plan!" (see vol. F, p. 724).

animal fable: a genre. A short narrative of speaking animals, followed by moralizing comment, written in a low style and gathered into a collection. Robert Henryson, "The Cock and the Jasper" (see vol. A, p. 679).

antithesis (Greek "placing against"): a figure of thought. The juxtaposition of opposed terms in clauses or sentences that are next to or near each other. Milton, Paradise Lost 1.777–80: "They but now who seemed / In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons / Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room / Throng numberless" (see vol. B, p. 1446).

apostrophe (from Greek "turning away"): a figure of thought. An address, often to an absent person, a force, or a quality. For example, a poet makes an apostrophe to a Muse when invoking her for inspiration.

apposition: a term of syntax. The repetition of elements serving an identical grammatical function in one sentence. The effect of this repetition is to arrest the flow of the sentence, but in doing so to add extra semantic nuance to repeated elements. This is an especially important feature of Old English poetic style. See, for example, Caedmon's Hymn (vol. A, p. 31), where the phrases

assonance (Latin “sounding to”): a figure of speech. The repetition of identical or near identical stressed vowel sounds in words whose final consonants differ, producing half-rhyme. Tennyson, “The Lady of Shalott,” line 100: “His broad clear brow in sunlight glowed” (see vol. E, p. 210).

aubade (originally from Spanish “alba,” dawn): a genre. A lover’s dawn song or lyric bewailing the arrival of the day and the necessary separation of the lovers; Donne, “The Sun Rising” (see vol. B, p. 886). Larkin recasts the genre in “Aubade” (see vol. F, p. 795).

autobiography (Greek “self-life writing”): a genre. A narrative of a life written by the subject; Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391). There are subgenres, such as the spiritual autobiography, narrating the author’s path to conversion and subsequent spiritual trials, as in Bunyan’s Grace Abounding.

ballad stanza: a verse form. Usually a quatrain in alternating iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter lines, rhyming abcb. See “Sir Patrick Spens” (vol. D, p. 38); Louise Bennett’s poems (vol. F, pp. 719–24); Eliot, “Sweeney among the Nightingales” (vol. F, p. 501); Larkin, “This Be The Verse” (vol. F, p. 795).

ballade: a verse form. A form consisting usually of three stanzas followed by a four-line envoi (French, “send off”). The last line of the first stanza establishes a refrain, which is repeated, or subtly varied, as the last line of each stanza. The form was derived from French medieval poetry; English poets, from the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries especially, used it with varying stanza forms. Chaucer, “The Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse” (see vol. A, p. 575).

bathos (Greek “depth”): a figure of thought. A sudden and sometimes ridiculous descent of tone; Pope, The Rape of the Lock 3.157–58: “Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast, / When husbands, or when lapdogs breathe their last” (see vol. C, p. 549).

beast epic: a genre. A continuous, unmoralized narrative, in prose or verse, relating the victories of the wholly unscrupulous but brilliant strategist Reynard the Fox over all adversaries. Chaucer arouses, only to deflate, expectations of the genre in The Nun’s Priest’s Tale (see vol. A, p. 556).

biography (Greek “life-writing”): a genre. A life as the subject of an extended narrative.

blank verse: a verse form. Unrhymed iambic pentameter lines. Blank verse has no stanzas, but is broken up into uneven units (verse paragraphs) determined by sense rather than form. First devised in English by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, in his translation of two books of Virgil’s Aeneid, this very flexible verse type became the standard form for dramatic poetry in the seventeenth century, as in most of Shakespeare’s plays. Milton and Wordsworth, among many others, also used it to create an English equivalent to classical epic.

blazon: strictly, a heraldic shield; in rhetorical usage, a topos whereby the individual elements of a beloved’s face and body are singled out for hyperbolic admiration. Spenser, Epithalamion, lines 167–84 (see vol. B, p. 459). For an inversion of the topos, see Shakespeare, Sonnet 130 (vol. B, p. 637).

burlesque (French and Italian “mocking”): a work that adopts the conventions of a genre with the aim less of comically mocking the genre than of satirically mocking the society so represented (see satire). Thus Pope’s Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537) does not mock classical epic so much as contemporary mores.

caesura (Latin “cut”) (plural “caesurae”): a term of meter. A pause or breathing space within a line of verse, generally occurring between syntactic units; Louise Bennett, “Colonization in Reverse,” lines 5–8: “By de hundred, by de tousan, / From country an from town, / By de ship-load, by de plane-load, / Jamaica is Englan boun” (see vol. F, p. 722), where the caesurae occur in lines 5 and 7.

canon (Greek “rule”): the group of texts regarded as worthy of special respect or attention by a given institution. Also, the group of texts regarded as definitely having been written by a certain author.

catastrophe (Greek “overturning”): the decisive turn in tragedy by which the plot is resolved and, usually, the protagonist dies.

catharsis (Greek “cleansing”): According to Aristotle, the effect of tragedy on its audience, through their experience of pity and terror, was a kind of spiritual cleansing, or catharsis.

character (Greek “stamp, impression”): a person, personified animal, or other figure represented in a literary work, especially in narrative and drama. The more a character seems to generate the action of a narrative, and the less he or she seems merely to serve a preordained narrative pattern, the “fuller,” or more “rounded,” a character is said to be. A “stock” character, common particularly in many comic genres, will perform a predictable function in different works of a given genre.

chiasmus (Greek “crosswise”): a figure of speech. The inversion of an already established sequence. This can involve verbal echoes: Pope, “Eloisa to Abelard,” line 104, “The crime was common, common be the pain” (see vol. C, p. 560); or it can be purely a matter of syntactic inversion: Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, line 8: “They pierce my thickets, through my grot they glide” (see vol. C, p. 575).

classical, classicism, classic: Each term can be widely applied, but in English literary discourse, “classical” primarily describes the works of either Greek or Roman antiquity. "Classicism" denotes the practice of art forms inspired by classical antiquity, in particular the observance of rhetorical norms of decorum and balance, as opposed to following the dictates of untutored inspiration, as in Romanticism. "Classic" denotes an especially famous work within a given canon.

climax (Greek "ladder"): a moment of great intensity and structural change, especially in drama. Also a figure of speech whereby a sequence of verbally linked clauses is made, in which each successive clause is of greater consequence than its predecessor. Bacon, Of Studies: "Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments, and for abilities. Their chief use for pastimes is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in judgement" (see vol. B, pp. 1165–66).

comedy: a genre. A term primarily applied to drama, and derived from ancient drama, in opposition to tragedy. Comedy deals with humorously confusing, sometimes ridiculous situations in which the ending is, nevertheless, happy. A comedy often ends in one or more marriages.

comic mode: Many genres (for example, romance, fabliau, comedy) involve a happy ending in which justice is done, the ravages of time are arrested, and that which is lost is found. Such genres participate in a comic mode.

connotation: To understand connotation, we need to understand denotation. While many words can denote the same concept—that is, have the same basic meaning—those words can evoke different associations, or connotations. Contrast, for example, the clinical-sounding term "depression" and the more colorful, musical, even poetic phrase "the blues."

consonance (Latin "sounding with"): a figure of speech. The repetition of final consonants in words or stressed syllables whose vowel sounds are different. Herbert, "Easter," line 13: "Consort, both heart and lute . . ." (see vol. B, p. 1181).

convention: a repeatedly recurring feature (in either form or content) of works, occurring in combination with other recurring formal features, which constitutes a convention of a particular genre.

couplet: a verse form. In English verse two consecutive, rhyming lines usually containing the same number of stresses. Chaucer first introduced the iambic pentameter couplet into English (Canterbury Tales); the form was later used in many types of writing, including drama; imitations and translations of classical epic (thus heroic couplet); essays; and satire (see Dryden and Pope). The distich (Greek "two lines") is a couplet usually making complete sense; Aemilia Lanyer, Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, lines 5–6: "Read it fair queen, though it defective be, / Your excellence can grace both it and me" (see vol. B, p. 923).

dactyl (Greek "finger," because of the finger's three joints): a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of one stressed followed by two unstressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Oregon."

decorum (Latin "that which is fitting"): a rhetorical principle whereby each formal aspect of a work should be in keeping with its subject matter and/or audience.

deixis (Greek "pointing"): relevant to point of view. Every work has, implicitly or explicitly, a "here" and a "now" from which it is narrated. Words that refer to or imply this point from which the voice of the work is projected (such as "here," "there," "this," "that," "now," "then") are examples of deixis, or "deictics." This technique is especially important in drama, where it is used to create a sense of the events happening as the spectator witnesses them.

denotation: A word has a basic, "prosaic" (factual) meaning prior to the associations it connotes (see connotation). The word

“steed,” for example, might call to mind a horse fitted with battle gear, to be ridden by a warrior, but its denotation is simply “horse.”

denouement (French “unknotting”): the point at which a narrative can be resolved and so ended.

dialogue (Greek “conversation”): a genre. Dialogue is a feature of many genres, especially in both the novel and drama. As a genre itself, dialogue is used in philosophical traditions especially (most famously in Plato’s Dialogues), as the representation of a conversation in which a philosophical question is pursued among various speakers.

diction, or “lexis” (from, respectively, Latin dictio and Greek lexis, each meaning “word”): the actual words used in any utterance—speech, writing, and, for our purposes here, literary works. The choice of words contributes significantly to the style of a given work.

didactic mode (Greek “teaching mode”): Genres in a didactic mode are designed to instruct or teach, sometimes explicitly (for example, sermons, philosophical discourses, georgic), and sometimes through the medium of fiction (for example, animal fable, parable).

diegesis (Greek for “narration”): a term that simply means “narration,” but is used in literary criticism to distinguish one kind of story from another. In a mimetic story, the events are played out before us (see mimesis), whereas in diegesis someone recounts the story to us. Drama is for the most part mimetic, whereas the novel is for the most part diegetic. In novels the narrator is not, usually, part of the action of the narrative; s/he is therefore extradiegetic.

dimeter (Greek “two measure”): a term of meter. A two-stress line, rarely used as the meter of whole poems, though used with great frequency in single poems by Skelton, for example, “The Tunning of Elinour Rumming” (see vol. B, p. 41). Otherwise used for single lines, as in Herbert, "Discipline," line 3: "O my God" (see vol. B, p. 1195).

discourse (Latin "running to and fro"): broadly, any nonfictional speech or writing; as a more specific genre, a philosophical meditation on a set theme.

dramatic irony: a feature of narrative and drama, whereby the audience knows that the outcome of an action will be the opposite of that intended by a character.

dramatic monologue (Greek "single speaking"): a genre. A poem in which the voice of a historical or fictional character speaks, unmediated by any narrator, to an implied though silent audience. See Tennyson, "Ulysses" (vol. E, p. 217); Browning, "The Bishop Orders His Tomb" (vol. E, p. 416); Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (vol. F, p. 498); Carol Ann Duffy, "Medusa" and "Mrs Lazarus" (vol. F, pp. 1161–63).

ecphrasis (Greek "speaking out"): a topos whereby a work of visual art is represented in a literary work. Auden, "Musée des Beaux Arts" (see vol. F, p. 677).

elegy: a genre. In classical literature elegy was a form written in elegiac couplets (a hexameter followed by a pentameter) devoted to many possible topics. In Ovidian elegy a lover meditates on the trials of erotic desire (for example, Ovid's Amores). The sonnet sequences of both Sidney and Shakespeare exploit this genre, and, while it was still practiced in classical tradition by Donne ("On His Mistress" [see vol. B, p. 901]), by the later seventeenth century the term came to denote the poetry of loss, especially through the death of a loved person. See Tennyson, In Memoriam (vol. E, p. 231); Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats" (see vol. F, p. 677); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. F, p. 977).

emblem (Greek "an insertion"): a figure of thought. A picture allegorically expressing a moral, or a verbal picture open to such

end-stopping: the placement of a complete syntactic unit within a complete poetic line, fulfilling the metrical pattern; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," line 42: "Earth, receive an honoured guest" (see vol. F, p. 679). Compare enjambment.

enjambment (French "striding," encroaching): The opposite of end-stopping, enjambment occurs when the syntactic unit does not end with the end of the poetic line and the fulfillment of the metrical pattern. When the sense of the line overflows its meter and, therefore, the line break, we have enjambment; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," lines 44–45: "Let the Irish vessel lie / Emptied of its poetry" (see vol. F, p. 679).

epic (synonym, heroic poetry): a genre. An extended narrative poem celebrating martial heroes, invoking divine inspiration, beginning in medias res (see order), written in a high style (including the deployment of epic similes; on high style, see register), and divided into long narrative sequences. Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid were the prime models for English writers of epic verse. Thus Milton, Paradise Lost (see vol. B, p. 1427); Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391); and Walcott, Omeros (see vol. F, p. 808). With its precise repertoire of stylistic resources, epic lent itself easily to parodic and burlesque forms, known as mock epic; thus Pope, The Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537).

epigram: a genre. A short, pithy poem wittily expressed, often with wounding intent. See Jonson, Epigrams (see vol. B, p. 1047).

epigraph (Greek "inscription"): a genre. Any formal statement inscribed on stone; also the brief formulation on a book's title page, or a quotation at the beginning of a poem, introducing the work's themes in the most compressed form possible.

epistle (Latin "letter"): a genre. The letter can be shaped as a literary form, involving an intimate address often between equals.

The Epistles of Horace provided a model for English writers from the sixteenth century. Thus Wyatt, "Mine Own John Poins" (see vol. B, p. 131), or Leapor, "An Epistle to a Lady" (vol. C, p. 771). Letters can be shaped to form the matter of an extended fiction, as the eighteenth-century epistolary novel (for example, Samuel Richardson's Pamela).

epitaph: a genre. A pithy formulation to be inscribed on a funeral monument. Thus Raleigh, "The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself" (see vol. B, p. 479).

epithalamion (Greek "concerning the bridal chamber"): a genre. A wedding poem, celebrating the marriage and wishing the couple good fortune. Thus Spenser, Epithalamion (see vol. B, p. 455).

epyllion (plural "epyllia") (Greek: "little epic"): a genre. A relatively short poem in the meter of epic poetry. See, for example, Marlowe, Hero and Leander (vol. B, p. 562).

essay (French "trial, attempt"): a genre. An informal philosophical meditation, usually in prose and sometimes in verse. The journalistic periodical essay was developed in the early eighteenth century. Thus Addison and Steele, periodical essays (see vol. C, p. 281); Pope, An Essay on Criticism (see vol. C, p. 521).

euphemism (Greek "sweet saying"): a figure of thought. The figure by which something distasteful is described in alternative, less repugnant terms (for example, "he passed away").

exegesis (Greek "leading out"): interpretation, traditionally of the biblical text, but, by transference, of any text.

exemplum (Latin "example"): an example inserted into a usually nonfictional writing (for example, sermon or essay) to give extra force to an abstract thesis.

fabliau (French “little story,” plural fabliaux): a genre. A short, funny, often bawdy narrative in low style (see register) imitated and developed from French models, most subtly by Chaucer; see The Miller’s Prologue and Tale (vol. A, p. 494).

farce (French “stuffing”): a genre. A play designed to provoke laughter through the often humiliating antics of stock characters. Congreve’s The Way of the World (see vol. C, p. 221) draws on this tradition.

figures of speech: Literary language often employs patterns perceptible to the eye and/or to the ear. Such patterns are called “figures of speech”; in classical rhetoric they were called “schemes” (from Greek schema, meaning “form, figure”).

figures of thought: Language can also be patterned conceptually, even outside the rules that normally govern it. Literary language in particular exploits this licensed linguistic irregularity. Synonyms for figures of thought are “trope” (Greek “twisting,” referring to the irregularity of use) and “conceit” (Latin “concept,” referring to the fact that these figures are perceptible only to the mind). Be careful not to confuse trope with topos (a common error).

first-person narration: relevant to point of view, a narrative in which the voice narrating refers to itself with forms of the first-person pronoun (“I,” “me,” “my,” etc., or possibly “we,” “us,” “our”), and in which the narrative is determined by the limitations of that voice. Thus Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein.

frame narrative: Some narratives, particularly collections of narratives, involve a frame narrative that explains the genesis of, and/or gives a perspective on, the main narrative or narratives to follow. Thus Chaucer, Canterbury Tales; Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein; or Conrad, Heart of Darkness.

free indirect style: relevant to point of view, a narratorial voice that manages, without explicit reference, to imply, and often implicitly to comment on, the voice of a character in the narrative itself. Virginia Woolf, "A Sketch of the Past," where the voice, although strictly that of the adult narrator, manages to convey the child's manner of perception: "—I begin: the first memory. This was of red and purple flowers on a black background—my mother's dress."

genre and mode: The style, structure, and, often, length of a work, when coupled with a certain subject matter, raise expectations that a literary work conforms to a certain genre (French "kind"). Good writers might upset these expectations, but they remain aware of the expectations and thwart them purposefully. Works in different genres may nevertheless participate in the same mode, a broader category designating the fundamental perspectives governing various genres of writing. For mode, see tragic, comic, satiric, and didactic modes. Genres are fluid, sometimes very fluid (for example, the novel); the word "usually" should be added to almost every account of the characteristics of a given genre!

georgic (Greek "farming"): a genre. Virgil's Georgics treat agricultural and occasionally scientific subjects, giving instructions on the proper management of farms. Unlike pastoral, which treats the countryside as a place of recreational idleness among shepherds, the georgic treats it as a place of productive labor.

hermeneutics (from the Greek god Hermes, messenger between the gods and humankind): the science of interpretation, first formulated as such by the German philosophical theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher in the early nineteenth century.

heroic poetry: see epic.

hexameter (Greek "six measure"): a term of meter. The hexameter line (a six-stress line) is the meter of classical Latin epic; while not imitated in that form for epic verse in English, some instances of the hexameter exist. See, for example, the last line of a homily (Greek "discourse"): a genre. A sermon, to be preached in church; Book of Homilies (see vol. B, p. 164). Writers of literary fiction sometimes exploit the homily, or sermon, as in Chaucer, The Pardoner's Tale (see vol. A, p. 540).

Spenserian stanza, Faerie Queene 1.1.2: "O help thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong" (vol. B, p. 269), or Yeats, "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," line 1: "I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree" (vol. F, p. 221).

homophone (Greek "same sound"): a figure of speech. A word that sounds identical to another word but has a different meaning ("bear" / "bare").

hyperbaton (Greek "overstepping"): a term of syntax. The rearrangement, or inversion, of the expected word order in a sentence or clause. Gray, "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," line 38: "If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise" (vol. C, p. 899). Poets can suspend the expected syntax over many lines, as in the first sentences of the Canterbury Tales (vol. A, p. 474) and of Paradise Lost (vol. B, p. 1428).

hyperbole (Greek "throwing over"): a figure of thought. Overstatement, exaggeration; Marvell, "To His Coy Mistress," lines 11–12: "My vegetable love should grow / Vaster than empires, and more slow" (see vol. B, p. 1271); Auden, "As I Walked Out One Evening," lines 9–12: "I'll love you, dear, I'll love you / Till China and Africa meet / And the river jumps over the mountain / And the salmon sing in the street" (see vol. F, p. 675).

hypermetrical (adj.; Greek "over measured"): a term of meter; the word describes a breaking of the expected metrical pattern by at least one extra syllable.

hypotaxis, or subordination (respectively Greek and Latin "ordering under"): a term of syntax. The subordination, by the use of subordinate clauses, of different elements of a sentence to a single main verb. Milton, Paradise Lost 9.513–15: “As when a ship by skillful steersman wrought / Nigh river’s mouth or foreland, where the wind / Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail; So varied he” (vol. B, p. 1586). The contrary principle to parataxis.

iamb: a term of rhythm. The basic foot of English verse; two syllables following the rhythmic pattern of unstressed followed by stressed and producing a rising effect. Thus, for example, “Vermont.”

imitation: the practice whereby writers strive ideally to reproduce and yet renew the conventions of an older form, often derived from classical civilization. Such a practice will be praised in periods of classicism (for example, the eighteenth century) and repudiated in periods dominated by a model of inspiration (for example, Romanticism).

irony (Greek “dissimulation”): a figure of thought. In broad usage, irony designates the result of inconsistency between a statement and a context that undermines the statement. “It’s a beautiful day” is unironic if it’s a beautiful day; if, however, the weather is terrible, then the inconsistency between statement and context is ironic. The effect is often amusing; the need to be ironic is sometimes produced by censorship of one kind or another. Strictly, irony is a subset of allegory: whereas allegory says one thing and means another, irony says one thing and means its opposite. For an extended example of irony, see Swift’s “Modest Proposal” (vol. C, p. 511). See also dramatic irony.

journal (French “daily”): a genre. A diary, or daily record of ephemeral experience, whose perspectives are concentrated on, and limited by, the experiences of single days. Thus Pepys, Diary (see vol. C, p. 74).

lai: a genre. A short narrative, often characterized by images of great intensity; a French term, and a form practiced by Marie de France (see vol. A, p. 159).

legend (Latin “requiring to be read”): a genre. A narrative of a celebrated, possibly historical, but mortal protagonist. To be distinguished from myth. Thus the “Arthurian legend” but the “myth of Proserpine.”

lexical set: Words that habitually recur together (for example, January, February, March, etc.; or red, white, and blue) form a lexical set.

litotes (from Greek “smooth”): a figure of thought. Strictly, understatement by denying the contrary; More, Utopia: “differences of no slight import” (see vol. B, p. 49). More loosely, understatement; Stevie Smith, “Sunt Leones,” lines 11–12: “And if the Christians felt a little blue— / Well people being eaten often do” (see vol. F, p. 585).

lullaby: a genre. A bedtime, sleep-inducing song for children, in simple and regular meter. Adapted by Auden, “Lullaby” (see vol. F, p. 671).

lyric (from Greek “lyre”): Initially meaning a song, “lyric” refers to a short poetic form, without restriction of meter, in which the expression of personal emotion, often by a voice in the first person, is given primacy over narrative sequence. Thus “The Wife’s Lament” (see vol. A, p. 126); Yeats, “The Wild Swans at Coole” (see vol. F, p. 229).

masque: a genre. Costly entertainments of the Stuart court, involving dance, song, speech, and elaborate stage effects, in which courtiers themselves participated.

metaphor (Greek “carrying across,” etymologically parallel to Latin “translation”): One of the most significant figures of thought, metaphor designates identification or implicit identification of one thing with another with which it is not literally identifiable. Blake, “London,” lines 11–12: “And the hapless Soldier’s sigh / Runs in blood down Palace walls” (see vol. D, p. 137).

meter: Verse (from Latin versus, turned) is distinguished from prose (from Latin prorsus, "straightforward") as a more compressed form of expression, shaped by metrical norms. Meter (Greek "measure") refers to the regularly recurring sound pattern of verse lines. The means of producing sound patterns across lines differ in different poetic traditions. Verse may be quantitative, or determined by the quantities of syllables (set patterns of long and short syllables), as in Latin and Greek poetry. It may be syllabic, determined by fixed numbers of syllables in the line, as in the verse of Romance languages (for example, French and Italian). It may be accentual, determined by the number of accents, or stresses in the line, with variable numbers of syllables, as in Old English and some varieties of Middle English alliterative verse. Or it may be accentual-syllabic, determined by the numbers of accents, but possessing a regular pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables, so as to produce regular numbers of syllables per line. Since Chaucer, English verse has worked primarily within the many possibilities of accentual-syllabic meter. The unit of meter is the foot. In English verse the number of feet per line corresponds to the number of accents in a line. For the types and examples of different meters, see monometer, dimeter, trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter. In the definitions below, "u" designates one unstressed syllable, and "/" one stressed syllable.

metonymy (Greek "change of name"): one of the most significant figures of thought. Using a word to denote another concept or other concepts, by virtue of habitual association. Thus "The Press," designating printed news media. Fictional names often work by associations of this kind. Closely related to synecdoche.

mimesis (Greek for "imitation"): A central function of literature and drama has been to provide a plausible imitation of the reality of the world beyond the literary work; mimesis is the representation and imitation of what is taken to be reality.

mise-en-abyme (French for “cast into the abyss”): Some works of art represent themselves in themselves; if they do so effectively, the represented artifact also represents itself, and so ad infinitum. The effect achieved is called “mise-en-abyme.” Hoccleve’s Complaint, for example, represents a depressed man reading about a depressed man. This sequence threatens to become a mise-en-abyme.

monometer (Greek “one measure”): a term of meter. An entire line with just one stress; Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 15, “most (u) grand (/)” (see vol. A, p. 415).

myth: a genre. The narrative of protagonists with, or subject to, superhuman powers. A myth expresses some profound foundational truth, often by accounting for the origin of natural phenomena. To be distinguished from legend. Thus the “Arthurian legend” but the “myth of Proserpine.”

novel: an extremely flexible genre in both form and subject matter. Usually in prose, giving high priority to narration of events, with a certain expectation of length, novels are preponderantly rooted in a specific, and often complex, social world; sensitive to the realities of material life; and often focused on one character or a small circle of central characters. By contrast with chivalric romance (the main European narrative genre prior to the novel), novels tend to eschew the marvelous in favor of a recognizable social world and credible action. The novel’s openness allows it to participate in all modes, and to be co-opted for a huge variety of subgenres. In English literature the novel dates from the late seventeenth century and has been astonishingly successful in appealing to a huge readership, particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The English and Irish tradition of the novel includes, for example, Fielding, Austen, the Brontë sisters, Dickens, George Eliot, Conrad, Woolf, Lawrence, and Joyce, to name but a few very great exponents of the genre.

novella: a genre. A short novel, often characterized by imagistic intensity. Conrad, Heart of Darkness (see vol. F, p. 70).

occupatio (Latin “taking possession”): a figure of thought. Denying that one will discuss a subject while actually discussing it; also known as “praeteritio” (Latin “passing by”). See Chaucer, Nun’s Priest’s Tale, lines 414–31 (see vol. A, p. 565).

ode (Greek “song”): a genre. A lyric poem in elevated, or high style (see register), often addressed to a natural force, a person, or an abstract quality. The Pindaric ode in English is made up of stanzas of unequal length, while the Horatian ode has stanzas of equal length. For examples of both types, see, respectively, Wordsworth, “Ode: Intimations of Immortality” (vol. D, p. 381); and Marvell, “An Horatian Ode” (vol. B, p. 1280), or Keats, “Ode on Melancholy” (vol. D, p. 973). For a fuller discussion, see the headnote to Jonson’s “Ode on Cary and Morison” (vol. B, p. 1057).

omniscient narrator (Latin “all-knowing narrator”): relevant to point of view. A narrator who, in the fiction of the narrative, has complete access to both the deeds and the thoughts of all characters in the narrative. Thus Thomas Hardy, “On the Western Circuit” (see vol. F, p. 36).

onomatopoeia (Greek “name making”): a figure of speech. Verbal sounds that imitate and evoke the sounds they denote. Hopkins, “Binsey Poplars,” lines 10–12 (about some felled trees): “O if we but knew what we do / When we delve [dig] or hew— / Hack and rack the growing green!” (see vol. E, p. 726).

order: A story may be told in different narrative orders. A narrator might use the sequence of events as they happened, and thereby follow what classical rhetoricians called the natural order; alternatively, the narrator might reorder the sequence of events, beginning the narration either in the middle or at the end of the sequence of events, thereby following an artificial order. If a narrator begins in the middle of events, he or she is said to begin in medias res (Latin "in the middle of the matter"). For a brief discussion of these concepts, see Spenser, Faerie Queene, "A Letter of the Authors" (vol. B, p. 265). Modern narratology makes a related distinction, between histoire (French "story") for the natural order that readers mentally reconstruct, and discours (French, here "narration") for the narrative as presented. See also plot and story.

ottava rima: a verse form. An eight-line stanza form, rhyming abababcc, using iambic pentameter; Yeats, "Sailing to Byzantium" (see vol. F, p. 234). Derived from the Italian poet Boccaccio, an eight-line stanza was used by fifteenth-century English poets for inset passages (for example, Christ's speech from the Cross in Lydgate's Testament, lines 754–897). The form in this rhyme scheme was used in English poetry for long narrative by, for example, Byron (Don Juan; see vol. D, p. 690).

oxymoron (Greek "sharp blunt"): a figure of thought. The conjunction of normally incompatible terms; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.63: "darkness visible" (see vol. B, p. 1429).

panegyric: a genre. Demonstrative, or epideictic (Greek "showing"), rhetoric was a branch of classical rhetoric. Its own two main branches were the rhetoric of praise on the one hand and of vituperation on the other. Panegyric, or eulogy (Greek "sweet speaking"), or encomium (plural encomia), is the term used to describe the speeches or writings of praise.

parable: a genre. A simple story designed to provoke, and often accompanied by, allegorical interpretation, most famously by Christ as reported in the Gospels.

paradox (Greek "contrary to received opinion"): a figure of thought. An apparent contradiction that requires thought to reveal an inner consistency. Chaucer, "Troilus's Song," line 12: "O sweete harm so quainte" (see vol. A, p. 574).

parataxis, or coordination (respectively Greek and Latin “ordering beside”): a term of syntax. The coordination, by the use of coordinating conjunctions, of different main clauses in a single sentence. Malory, Morte Darthur: “So Sir Lancelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantel, that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy” (see vol. A, p. 607). The opposite principle to hypotaxis.

parody: a work that uses the conventions of a particular genre with the aim of comically mocking a topos, a genre, or a particular exponent of a genre. Shakespeare parodies the topos of blazon in Sonnet 130 (see vol. B, p. 637).

pastoral (from Latin pastor, “shepherd”): a genre. Pastoral is set among shepherds, making often refined allusion to other apparently unconnected subjects (sometimes politics) from the potentially idyllic world of highly literary if illiterate shepherds. Pastoral is distinguished from georgic by representing recreational rural idleness, whereas the georgic offers instruction on how to manage rural labor. English writers had classical models in the Idylls of Theocritus in Greek and Virgil’s Eclogues in Latin. Pastoral is also called bucolic (from the Greek word for “herdsman”). Thus Spenser, Shepheardes Calender (see vol. B, p. 257).

pathetic fallacy: the attribution of sentiment to natural phenomena, as if they were in sympathy with human feelings. Thus Milton, Lycidas, lines 146–47: “With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head, / And every flower that sad embroidery wears” (see vol. B, p. 1404). For critique of the practice, see Ruskin (who coined the term), “Of the Pathetic Fallacy” (vol. E, p. 467).

pentameter (Greek “five measure”): a term of meter. In English verse, a five-stress line. Between the late fourteenth and the nineteenth centuries, this meter, frequently employing an iambic rhythm, was the basic line of English verse. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, and Wordsworth each, for example, deployed this very flexible line as their primary resource; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.128: "O Prince, O Chief of many thronèd Powers" (see vol. B, p. 1431).

performative: Verbal expressions have many different functions. They can, for example, be descriptive, or constative (if they make an argument), or performative, for example. A performative utterance is one that makes something happen in the world by virtue of its utterance. "I hereby sentence you to ten years in prison," if uttered in the appropriate circumstances, itself performs an action; it makes something happen in the world. By virtue of its performing an action, it is called a "performative." See also speech act.

peripeteia (Greek "turning about"): the sudden reversal of fortune (in both directions) in a dramatic work.

periphrasis (Greek "declaring around"): a figure of thought. Circumlocution; the use of many words to express what could be expressed in few or one; Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 39.1–4.

persona (Latin "sound through"): originally the mask worn in the Roman theater to magnify an actor's voice; in literary discourse persona (plural personae) refers to the narrator or speaker of a text, whose voice is coherent and whose person need have no relation to the person of the actual author of a text. Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (see vol. F, p. 498).

personification, or prosopopoeia (Greek "person making"): a figure of thought. The attribution of human qualities to nonhuman forces or objects; Keats, "Ode on a Grecian Urn," lines 1–2: "Thou still unvanish'd bride of quietness, / Thou foster-child of silence and slow time" (see vol. D, p. 971).

plot: the sequence of events in a story as narrated, as distinct from story, which refers to the sequence of events as we reconstruct them from the plot. See also order.

point of view: All of the many kinds of writing involve a point of view from which a text is, or seems to be, generated. The presence of such a point of view may be powerful and explicit, as in many novels, or deliberately invisible, as in much drama. In some genres, such as the novel, the narrator does not necessarily tell the story from a position we can predict; that is, the needs of a particular story, not the conventions of the genre, determine the narrator's position. In other genres, the narrator's position is fixed by convention; in certain kinds of love poetry, for example, the narrating voice is always that of a suffering lover. Not only does the point of view significantly inform the style of a work, but it also informs the structure of that work.

protagonist (Greek "first actor"): the hero or heroine of a drama or narrative.

pun: a figure of thought. A sometimes irresolvable doubleness of meaning in a single word or expression; Shakespeare, Sonnet 135, line 1: "Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will" (see vol. B, p. 637).

quatrain: a verse form. A stanza of four lines, usually rhyming abcb, abab, or abba. Of many possible examples, see Crashaw, "On the Wounds of Our Crucified Lord" (see vol. B, p. 1212).

refrain: usually a single line repeated as the last line of consecutive stanzas, sometimes with subtly different wording and ideally with subtly different meaning as the poem progresses.

register: The register of a word is its stylistic level, which can be distinguished by degree of technicality but also by degree of formality. We choose our words from different registers according to context, that is, audience and/or environment. Thus a chemist in a laboratory will say "sodium chloride," a cook in a kitchen "salt." A formal register designates the kind of language used in polite society (for example, "Mr. President"), while an informal or colloquial register is used in less formal or more relaxed social situations (for example, “the boss”). In classical and medieval rhetoric, these registers of formality were called high style and low style. A middle style was defined as the style fit for narrative, not drawing attention to itself.

rhetoric: the art of verbal persuasion. Classical rhetoricians distinguished three areas of rhetoric: the forensic, to be used in law courts; the deliberative, to be used in political or philosophical deliberations; and the demonstrative, or epideictic, to be used for the purposes of public praise or blame. Rhetorical manuals covered all the skills required of a speaker, from the management of style and structure to delivery. These manuals powerfully influenced the theory of poetics as a separate branch of verbal practice, particularly in the matter of style.

rhyme: a figure of speech. The repetition of identical vowel sounds in stressed syllables whose initial consonants differ (“dead” / “head”). In poetry, rhyme often links the end of one line with another. Masculine rhyme: full rhyme on the final syllable of the line (“decays” / “days”). Feminine rhyme: full rhyme on syllables that are followed by unaccented syllables (“fountains” / “mountains”). Internal rhyme: full rhyme within a single line; Coleridge, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, line 7: “The guests are met, the feast is set” (see vol. D, p. 475). Rhyme riche: rhyming on homophones; Chaucer, General Prologue, lines 17–18: “seeke” / “seke.” Off rhyme (also known as half rhyme, near rhyme, or slant rhyme): differs from perfect rhyme in changing the vowel sound and/or the concluding consonants expected of perfect rhyme; Byron, “They say that Hope is Happiness,” lines 5–7: “most” / “lost.” Pararhyme: stressed vowel sounds differ but are flanked by identical or similar consonants; Owen, “Miners,” lines 9–11: “simmer” / “summer” (see vol. F, p. 169).

rhyme royal: a verse form. A stanza of seven iambic pentameter lines, rhyming ababbcc; first introduced by Chaucer and called “royal” because the form was used by James I of Scotland for his Kingis Quair in the early fifteenth century. Chaucer, “Troilus’s Song” (see vol. A, p. 574).

rhythm: Rhythm is not absolutely distinguishable from meter. One way of making a clear distinction between these terms is to say that rhythm (from the Greek “to flow”) denotes the patterns of sound within the feet of verse lines and the combination of those feet. Very often a particular meter will raise expectations that a given rhythm will be used regularly through a whole line or a whole poem. Thus in English verse the pentameter regularly uses an iambic rhythm. Rhythm, however, is much more fluid than meter, and many lines within the same poem using a single meter will frequently exploit different rhythmic possibilities. For examples of different rhythms, see iamb, trochee, anapest, spondee, and dactyl.

romance: a genre. From the twelfth to the sixteenth century, the main form of European narrative, in either verse or prose, was that of chivalric romance. Romance, like the later novel, is a very fluid genre, but romances are often characterized by (i) a tripartite structure of social integration, followed by disintegration, involving moral tests and often marvelous events, itself the prelude to reintegration in a happy ending, frequently of marriage; and (ii) aristocratic social milieux. Thus Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (see vol. A, p. 415); Spenser’s (unfinished) Faerie Queene (vol. B, p. 263). The immensely popular, fertile genre was absorbed, in both domesticated and undomesticated form, by the novel. For an adaptation of romance, see Chaucer, Wife of Bath’s Tale (vol. A, p. 512).

sarcasm (Greek “flesh tearing”): a figure of thought. A wounding expression, often expressed ironically; Boswell, Life of Johnson: Johnson [asked if any man of the modern age could have written the epic poem Fingal] replied, “Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children” (see vol. C, p. 891).

satire (Latin for “a bowl of mixed fruits”): a genre. In Roman literature (for example, Juvenal), the communication, in the form of a letter between equals, complaining of the ills of contemporary society. The genre in this form is characterized by a first-person narrator exasperated by social ills; the letter form; a high frequency of contemporary reference; and the use of invective in low-style language. Pope practices the genre thus in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (see vol. C, p. 573). Wyatt’s “Mine Own John Poins” (see vol. B, p. 131) draws ultimately on a gentler, Horatian model of the genre.

satiric mode: Works in a very large variety of genres are devoted to the more or less savage attack on social ills. Thus Swift’s travel narrative Gulliver’s Travels (see vol. C, p. 377), his essay “A Modest Proposal” (vol. C, p. 511), and Gay’s Beggar’s Opera (vol. C, p. 587), to look no further than the eighteenth century, are all within a satiric mode.

scene: a subdivision of an act, itself a subdivision of a dramatic performance and/or text. The action of a scene usually occurs in one place.

sensibility (from Latin, “capable of being perceived by the senses”): as a literary term, an eighteenth-century concept derived from moral philosophy that stressed the social importance of fellow feeling and particularly of sympathy in social relations. The concept generated a literature of “sensibility,” such as the sentimental novel (the most famous of which was Goethe’s Sorrows of the Young Werther [1774]), or sentimental poetry, such as Cowper’s passage on the stricken deer in The Task (see vol. C, p. 1076).

short story: a genre. Generically similar to, though shorter and more concentrated than, the novel; often published as part of a collection. Thus Mansfield, “The Daughters of the Late Colonel” (see vol. F, p. 542).

simile (Latin “like”): a figure of thought. Comparison, usually using the word “like” or “as,” of one thing with another so as to produce sometimes surprising analogies. Donne, “The Storm,” lines 29–30: “Sooner than you read this line did the gale, / Like shot, not feared till felt, our sails assail.” Frequently used, in extended form, in epic poetry; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.338–46 (see vol. B, p. 1436).

soliloquy (Latin “single speaking”): a topos of drama, in which a character, alone or thinking to be alone on stage, speaks so as to give the audience access to his or her private thoughts.

sonnet: a verse form. A form combining a variable number of units of rhymed lines to produce a fourteen-line poem, usually in rhyming iambic pentameter lines. In English there are two principal varieties: the Petrarchan sonnet, formed by an octave (an eight-line stanza, often broken into two quatrains having the same rhyme scheme, typically abba abba) and a sestet (a six-line stanza, typically cdecde or cdcdcd); and the Shakespearean sonnet, formed by three quatrains (abab cdcd efef) and a couplet (gg). The declaration of a sonnet can take a sharp turn, or “volta,” often at the decisive formal shift from octave to sestet in the Petrarchan sonnet, or in the final couplet of a Shakespearean sonnet, introducing a trenchant counterstatement. Derived from Italian poetry, and especially from the poetry of Petrarch, the sonnet was first introduced to English poetry by Wyatt, and initially used principally for the expression of unrequited erotic love, though later poets used the form for many other purposes. See Wyatt, “Whoso List to Hunt” (vol. B, p. 123); Sidney, Astrophil and Stella (vol. B, p. 541); Shakespeare, Sonnets (vol. B, p. 624); Wordsworth, “London, 1802” (vol. D, p. 390); McKay, “If We Must Die” (vol. F, p. 576); Heaney, “Clearances” (vol. F, p. 977).

speech act: Words and deeds are often distinguished, but words are often (perhaps always) themselves deeds. Utterances can perform different speech acts, such as promising, declaring, casting a spell, encouraging, persuading, denying, lying, and so on. See also performative.

Spenserian stanza: a verse form. The stanza developed by Spenser for The Faerie Queene; nine iambic lines, the first eight of which are pentameters, followed by one hexameter, rhyming ababbcbcc. See also, for example, Shelley, Adonais (vol. D, p. 851), and Keats, The Eve of St. Agnes (vol. D, p. 953).

spondee: a term of meter. A two-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two stressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Utah."

stanza (Italian "room"): groupings of two or more lines, though "stanza" is usually reserved for groupings of at least four lines. Stanzas are often joined by rhyme, often in sequence, where each group shares the same metrical pattern and, when rhymed, rhyme scheme. Stanzas can themselves be arranged into larger groupings. Poets often invent new verse forms, or they may work within established forms.

story: a narrative's sequence of events, which we reconstruct from those events as they have been recounted by the narrator (i.e., the plot). See also order.

stream of consciousness: usually a first-person narrative that seems to give the reader access to the narrator's mind as it perceives or reflects on events, prior to organizing those perceptions into a coherent narrative. Thus (though generated from a third-person narrative) Joyce, Ulysses, "Penelope" (see vol. F, p. 452).

style (from Latin for "writing instrument"): In literary works the manner in which something is expressed contributes substantially to its meaning. The expressions "sun," "mass of helium at the center of the solar system," "heaven's golden orb" all designate "sun," but do so in different manners, or styles, which produce different meanings. The manner of a literary work is its "style," the effect of which is its sublime: As a concept generating a literary movement, the sublime refers to the realm of experience beyond the measurable, and so beyond the rational, produced especially by the terrors and grandeur of natural phenomena. Derived especially from the first-century Greek treatise On the Sublime, sometimes attributed to Longinus, the notion of the sublime was in the later eighteenth century a spur to Romanticism.

syllable: the smallest unit of sound in a pronounced word. The syllable that receives the greatest stress is called the tonic syllable.

symbol (Greek “token”): a figure of thought. Something that stands for something else, and yet seems necessarily to evoke that other thing. In Neoplatonic, and therefore Romantic, theory, to be distinguished from allegory thus: whereas allegory involves connections between vehicle and tenor agreed by convention or made explicit, the meanings of a symbol are supposedly inherent to it.

synecdoche (Greek “to take with something else”): a figure of thought. Using a part to express the whole, or vice versa; for example, “all hands on deck.” Closely related to metonymy.

syntax (Greek “ordering with”): Syntax designates the rules by which sentences are constructed in a given language. Discussion of meter is impossible without some reference to syntax, since the overall effect of a poem is, in part, always the product of a subtle balance of meter and sentence construction. Syntax is also essential to the understanding of prose style, since prose writers, deprived of the full shaping possibilities of meter, rely all the more heavily on syntactic resources. A working command of syntactical practice requires an understanding of the parts of speech (nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs, conjunctions, pronouns, prepositions, and interjections), since writers exploit syntactic possibilities by using particular combinations and concentrations of the parts of speech.

taste (from Italian “touch”): Although medieval monastic traditions used eating and tasting as a metaphor for reading, the concept of taste as a personal ideal to be cultivated by, and applied to, the appreciation and judgment of works of art in general was developed in the eighteenth century.

tercet: a verse form. A stanza or group of three lines, used in larger forms such as terza rima, the Petrarchan sonnet, and the villanelle.

terza rima: a verse form. A sequence of rhymed tercets linked by rhyme thus: aba bcb cdc, etc. first used extensively by Dante in The Divine Comedy, the form was adapted in English iambic pentameters by Wyatt and revived in the nineteenth century. See Wyatt, “Mine Own John Poins” (vol. B, p. 131); Shelley, “Ode to the West Wind” (vol. D, p. 802); and Morris, “The Defence of Guinevere” (vol. E, p. 657). For modern adaptations see Eliot, lines 78–149 (though unrhymed) of “Little Gidding” (vol. F, pp. 523–25); Heaney, “Station Island” (vol. F, p. 975); Walcott, Omeros (vol. F, p. 808).

tetrameter (Greek “four measure”): a term of meter. A line with four stresses. Coleridge, Christabel, line 31: “She stole along, she nothing spoke” (see vol. D, p. 495).

theme (Greek “proposition”): In literary criticism the term designates what the work is about; the theme is the concept that unifies a given work of literature.

third-person narration: relevant to point of view. A narration in which the narrator recounts a narrative of characters referred to explicitly or implicitly by third-person pronouns ("he," "she," etc.), without the limitation of a first-person narration. Thus Johnson, The History of Rasselas.

topographical poem (Greek "place writing"): a genre. A poem devoted to the meditative description of particular places.

topos (Greek "place," plural topoi): a commonplace in the content of a given kind of literature. Originally, in classical rhetoric, the topoi were tried-and-tested stimuli to literary invention: lists of standard headings under which a subject might be investigated. In medieval narrative poems, for example, it was commonplace to begin with a description of spring. Writers did, of course, render the commonplace uncommon, as in Chaucer's spring scene at the opening of The Canterbury Tales (see vol. A, p. 474).

tradition (from Latin "passing on"): A literary tradition is whatever is passed on or revived from the past in a single literary culture, or drawn from others to enrich a writer's culture. "Tradition" is fluid in reference, ranging from small to large referents: thus it may refer to a relatively small aspect of texts (for example, the tradition of iambic pentameter), or it may, at the other extreme, refer to the body of texts that constitute a canon.

tragedy: a genre. A dramatic representation of the fall of kings or nobles, beginning in happiness and ending in catastrophe. Later transferred to other social milieux. The opposite of comedy; thus Shakespeare, Othello (see vol. B, p. 640).

tragic mode: Many genres (epic poetry, legendary chronicles, tragedy, the novel) either do or can participate in a tragic mode, by representing the fall of noble protagonists and the irreparable ravages of human society and history.

tragicomedy: a genre. A play in which potentially tragic events turn out to have a happy, or comic, ending. Thus Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

translation (Latin “carrying across”): the rendering of a text written in one language into another.

trimeter (Greek “three measure”): a term of meter. A line with three stresses. Herbert, “Discipline,” line 1: “Throw away thy rod” (see vol. B, p. 1195).

triplet: a verse form. A tercet rhyming on the same sound. Pope inserts triplets among heroic couplets to emphasize a particular thought; see Essay on Criticism, 315–17 (vol. C, p. 521).

trochee: a term of rhythm. A two-syllable foot following the pattern, in English verse, of stressed followed by unstressed syllable, producing a falling effect. Thus, for example, “Texas.”

type (Greek “impression, figure”): a figure of thought. In Christian allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament, pre-Christian figures were regarded as “types,” or foreshadowings, of Christ or the Christian dispensation. Typology has been the source of much visual and literary art in which the parallelisms between old and new are extended to nonbiblical figures; thus the virtuous plowman in Piers Plowman becomes a type of Christ.

unities: According to a theory supposedly derived from Aristotle’s Poetics, the events represented in a play should have unity of time, place, and action: that the play take up no more time than the time of the play, or at most a day; that the space of action should be within a single city; and that there should be no subplot. See Johnson, The Preface to Shakespeare (vol. C, p. 876).

vernacular (from Latin verna, “servant”): the language of the people, as distinguished from learned and arcane languages. From the later Middle Ages especially, the “vernacular” languages and literatures of Europe distinguished themselves from the learned languages and literatures of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

verse form: The terms related to meter and rhythm describe the shape of individual lines. Lines of verse are combined to produce larger groupings, called verse forms. These larger groupings are in the first instance stanzas. The combination of a certain meter and stanza shape constitutes the verse form, of which there are many standard kinds.

villanelle: a verse form. A fixed form of usually five tercets and a quatrain employing only two rhyme sounds altogether, rhyming aba for the tercets and abaa for the quatrain, with a complex pattern of two refrains. Derived from a French fixed form. Thomas, "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night" (see vol. F, p. 693).

wit: Originally a synonym for "reason" in Old and Middle English, "wit" became a literary ideal in the Renaissance as brilliant play of the full range of mental resources. For eighteenth-century writers, the notion necessarily involved pleasing expression, as in Pope's definition of true wit as "Nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed" (Essay on Criticism, lines 297–98; see vol. C, p. 527). Romantic theory of the imagination deprived wit of its full range of apprehension, whence the word came to be restricted to its modern sense, as the clever play of mind that produces laughter.

zeugma (Greek "a yoking"): a figure of thought. A figure whereby one word applies to two or more words in a sentence, and in which the applications are surprising, either because one is unusual, or because the applications are made in very different ways; Pope, Rape of the Lock 3.7–8, in which the word "take" is used in two senses: "Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey, / Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea" (see vol. C, p. 546).

B: Publishing History, Censorship

By the time we read texts in published books, they have already been treated—that is, changed by authors, editors, and printers—in many ways. Although there are differences across history, in each period literary works are subject to pressures of many kinds, which apply before, while, and after an author writes. The pressures might be financial, as in the relations of author and patron; commercial, as in the marketing of books; and legal, as in, during some periods, the negotiation through official and unofficial censorship. In addition, texts in all periods undergo technological processes, as they move from the material forms in which an author produced them to the forms in which they are presented to readers. Some of the terms below designate important material forms in which books were produced, disseminated, and surveyed across the historical span of this anthology. Others designate the skills developed to understand these processes. The anthology's introductions to individual periods discuss the particular forms these phenomena took in different eras.

bookseller: In England, and particularly in London, commercial bookmaking and -selling enterprises came into being in the early fourteenth century. These were loose organizations of artisans who usually lived in the same neighborhoods (around St. Paul's Cathedral in London). A bookseller or dealer would coordinate the production of hand-copied books for wealthy patrons (see patronage), who would order books to be custom-made. After the introduction of printing in the late fifteenth century, authors generally sold the rights to their work to booksellers, without any further royalties. Booksellers, who often had their own shops, belonged to the Stationers' Company. This system lasted into the eighteenth century. In 1710, however, authors were for the first time granted copyright, which tipped the commercial balance in their favor, against booksellers.

censorship: The term applies to any mechanism for restricting what can be published. Historically, the reasons for imposing censorship are heresy, sedition, blasphemy, libel, or obscenity. External censorship is imposed by institutions having legislative sanctions at their disposal. Thus the pre-Reformation Church imposed the Constitutions of Archbishop Arundel of 1409, aimed at repressing the Lollard “heresy.” After the Reformation, some key events in the history of censorship are as follows: 1547, when anti-Lollard legislation and legislation made by Henry VIII concerning treason by writing (1534) were abolished; the Licensing Order of 1643, which legislated that works be licensed, through the Stationers’ Company, prior to publication; and 1695, when the last such Act stipulating prepublication licensing lapsed. Postpublication censorship continued in different periods for different reasons. Thus, for example, British publication of D. H. Lawrence’s Lady Chatterley’s Lover (1928) was obstructed (though unsuccessfully) in 1960, under the Obscene Publications Act of 1959. Censorship can also be international: although not published in Iran, Salman Rushdie’s Satanic Verses (1988) was censored in that country, where the leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, proclaimed a fatwa (religious decree) promising the author’s execution. Very often censorship is not imposed externally, however: authors or publishers can censor work in anticipation of what will incur the wrath of readers or the penalties of the law. Victorian and Edwardian publishers of novels, for example, urged authors to remove potentially offensive material, especially for serial publication in popular magazines.

codex: the physical format of most modern books and medieval manuscripts, consisting of a series of separate leaves gathered into quires and bound together, often with a cover. In late antiquity, the codex largely replaced the scroll, the standard form of written documents in Roman culture.

copy text: the particular text of a work used by a textual editor as the basis of an edition of that work.

copyright: the legal protection afforded to authors for control of their work’s publication, in an attempt to ensure due financial reward. Some key dates in the history of copyright in the United Kingdom are as follows: 1710, when a statute gave authors the exclusive right to publish their work for fourteen years, and fourteen years more if the author were still alive when the first term had expired; 1842, when the period of authorial control was extended to forty-two years; and 1911, when the term was extended yet further, to fifty years after the author's death. In 1995 the period of protection was harmonized with the laws in other European countries to be the life of the author plus seventy years. In the United States no works first published before 1923 are in copyright. Works published since 1978 are, as in the United Kingdom, protected for the life of the author plus seventy years.

folio: the leaf formed by both sides of a single page. Each folio has two sides: a recto (the front side of the leaf, on the right side of a double-page spread in an open codex), and a verso (the back side of the leaf, on the left side of a double-page spread). Modern book pagination follows the pattern 1, 2, 3, 4, while medieval manuscript pagination follows the pattern 1r, 1v, 2r, 2v. "Folio" can also designate the size of a printed book. Books come in different shapes, depending originally on the number of times a standard sheet of paper is folded. One fold produces a large volume, a folio book; two folds produce a quarto, four an octavo, and six a very small duodecimo. Generally speaking, the larger the book, the grander and more expensive. Shakespeare's plays were, for example, first printed in quartos, but were gathered into a folio edition in 1623.

foul papers: versions of a work before an author has produced, if she or he has, a final copy (a "fair copy") with all corrections removed.

incunabulum (plural "incunabula"): any printed book produced in Europe before 1501. Famous incunabula include the Gutenberg Bible, printed in 1455.

manuscript (Latin, "written by hand"): Any text written physically by hand is a manuscript. Before the introduction of printing with moveable type in 1476, all texts in England were produced and reproduced by hand, in manuscript. This is an extremely labor-intensive task, using expensive materials (for example, vellum, or parchment); the cost of books produced thereby was, accordingly, very high. Even after the introduction of printing, many texts continued to be produced in manuscript. This is obviously true of letters, for example, but until the eighteenth century, poetry written within aristocratic circles was often transmitted in manuscript copies.

paleography (Greek “ancient writing”): the art of deciphering, describing, and dating forms of handwriting.

parchment: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also vellum.

patronage, patron (Latin “protector”): Many technological, legal, and commercial supports were necessary before professional authorship became possible. Although some playwrights (for example, Shakespeare) made a living by writing for the theater, other authors needed, principally, the large-scale reproductive capacities of printing and the security of copyright to make a living from writing. Before these conditions obtained, many authors had another main occupation, and most authors had to rely on patronage. In different periods, institutions or individuals offered material support, or patronage, to authors. Thus in Anglo-Saxon England, monasteries afforded the conditions of writing to monastic authors. Between the twelfth and the seventeenth centuries, the main source of patronage was the royal court. Authors offered patrons prestige and ideological support in return for financial support. Even as the conditions of professional authorship came into being at the beginning of the eighteenth century, older forms of direct patronage were not altogether displaced until the middle of the century.

periodical: Whereas journalism, strictly, applies to daily writing (from French jour, “day”), periodical writing appears at larger, but still frequent, intervals, characteristically in the form of the essay. Periodicals were developed especially in the eighteenth century.

printing: Printing, or the mechanical reproduction of books using moveable type, was invented in Germany in the mid-fifteenth century by Johannes Gutenberg; it quickly spread throughout Europe. William Caxton brought printing into England from the Low Countries in 1476. Much greater powers of reproduction at much lower prices transformed every aspect of literary culture.

publisher: the person or company responsible for the commissioning and publicizing of printed matter. In the early period of printing, publisher, printer, and bookseller were often the same person. This trend continued in the ascendancy of the Stationers' Company, between the middle of the sixteenth and the end of the seventeenth centuries. Toward the end of the seventeenth century, these three functions began to separate, leading to their modern distinctions.

quire: When medieval manuscripts were assembled, a few loose sheets of parchment or paper would first be folded together and sewn along the fold. This formed a quire (also known as a "gathering" or "signature"). Folded in this way, four large sheets of parchment would produce eight smaller manuscript leaves. Multiple quires could then be bound together to form a codex.

royalties: an agreed-upon proportion of the price of each copy of a work sold, paid by the publisher to the author, or an agreed-upon fee paid to the playwright for each performance of a play.

scribe: In manuscript culture, the scribe is the copyist who reproduces a text by hand.

scriptorium (plural "scriptoria"): a place for producing written documents and manuscripts.

serial publication: generally referring to the practice, especially common in the nineteenth century, of publishing novels a few chapters at a time, in periodicals.

Stationers' Company: The Stationers' Company was an English guild incorporating various tradesmen, including printers, publishers, and booksellers, skilled in the production and selling of books. It was formed in 1403, received its royal charter in 1557, and served as a means both of producing and of regulating books. Authors would sell the manuscripts of their books to individual stationers, who incurred the risks and took the profits of producing and selling the books. The stationers entered their rights over given books in the Stationers' Register. They also regulated the book trade and held their monopoly by licensing books and by being empowered to seize unauthorized books and imprison resisters. This system of licensing broke down in the social unrest of the Civil War and Interregnum (1640–60), and it ended in 1695. Even after the end of licensing, the Stationers' Company continued to be an intrinsic part of the copyright process, since the 1710 copyright statute directed that copyright had to be registered at Stationers' Hall.

subscription: An eighteenth-century system of bookselling somewhere between direct patronage and impersonal sales. A subscriber paid half the cost of a book before publication and half on delivery. The author received these payments directly. The subscriber's name appeared in the prefatory pages.

textual criticism: Works in all periods often exist in many subtly or not so subtly different forms. This is especially true with regard to manuscript textual reproduction, but it also applies to printed texts. Textual criticism is the art, developed from the fifteenth century in Italy but raised to new levels of sophistication from the eighteenth century, of deciphering different historical states of texts. This art involves the analysis of textual variants, often with the aim of distinguishing authorial from scribal forms.

variants: differences that appear among different manuscripts or printed editions of the same text.

vellum: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also parchment.

watermark: the trademark of a paper manufacturer, impressed into the paper but largely invisible unless held up to light.

Geographic Nomenclature

The British Isles refers to the prominent group of islands off the northwest coast of Europe, especially to the two largest, Great Britain and Ireland. At present these comprise two sovereign states: the Republic of Ireland, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland—known for short as the United Kingdom or the U.K. Most of the smaller islands are part of the U.K. but a few, like the Isle of Man and the tiny Channel Islands, are largely independent. The U.K. is often loosely referred to as “Britain” or “Great Britain” and is sometimes called simply, if inaccurately, “England.” For obvious reasons, the latter usage is rarely heard among the inhabitants of the other countries of the U.K.—Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (sometimes called Ulster). England is by far the most populous part of the kingdom, as well as the seat of its capital, London.

From the first to the fifth century C.E. most of what is now England and Wales was a province of the Roman Empire called Britain (in Latin, Britannia). After the fall of Rome, much of the island was invaded and settled by peoples from northern Germany and Denmark speaking what we now call Old English. These peoples are known as the Angles and the Saxons (the word England is related to Angles). By the time of the Norman Conquest (1066) most of the kingdoms founded by the Angles, the Saxons, and the subsequent Viking invaders had coalesced into the kingdom of England, which, in the latter Middle Ages, conquered and largely absorbed the neighboring Celtic kingdom of Wales. In 1603 James VI of Scotland inherited the island’s other throne as James I of England, and for the next hundred years—except for the two decades of Puritan rule—Scotland (both its English-speaking Lowlands and its Gaelic-speaking Highlands) and England (with Wales) were two kingdoms under a single king. In 1707 the Act of Union brought them together as the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Ireland, where English rule had begun in the twelfth century and been tightened in the sixteenth, was incorporated by the 1800–1801 Act of Union into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. With the division of Ireland and the establishment of the Irish Free State after World War I, this name was modified to its present form, and in 1949 the Irish Free State became the Republic of Ireland, or Éire. In 1999 Scotland elected a separate parliament it had relinquished in 1707, and Wales elected an assembly it lost in 1409; neither Scotland nor Wales ceased to be part of the United Kingdom.

The British Isles are further divided into counties, which in Great Britain are also known as shires. This word, with its vowel shortened in pronunciation, forms the suffix in the names of many counties, such as Yorkshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire.

The Latin names Britannia (Britain), Caledonia (Scotland), and Hibernia (Ireland) are sometimes used in poetic diction; so too is Britain's ancient Celtic name, Albion. Because of its accidental resemblance to albus (Latin for “white”), Albion is especially associated with the chalk cliffs that seem to gird much of the English coast like defensive walls.

The British Empire took its name from the British Isles because it was created not only by the English but also by the Irish, Scots, and Welsh, as well as by civilians and servicemen from other constituent countries of the empire. Some of the empire's overseas colonies, or crown colonies, were populated largely by settlers of European origin and their descendants. These predominantly White settler colonies, such as Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, were allowed significant self-government in the nineteenth century and recognized as dominions in the early twentieth century. The White dominions became members of the Commonwealth of Nations, also called the Commonwealth, the British Commonwealth, and “the Old Commonwealth” at different times, an association of sovereign states under the symbolic leadership of the British monarch.

Other overseas colonies of the empire had mostly Indigenous populations (or, in the Caribbean, the descendants of enslaved people, indentured servants, and others). These colonies were granted political independence after World War II, later than the dominions, and have often been referred to since as postcolonial nations. In South and Southeast Asia, India and Pakistan gained independence in 1947, followed by other countries including Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), Burma (now Myanmar), Malaya (now Malaysia), and Singapore. In West and East Africa, the Gold Coast was decolonized as Ghana in 1957, Nigeria in 1960, Sierra Leone in 1961, Uganda in 1962, Kenya in 1963, and so forth, while in southern Africa, the White minority government of South Africa was already independent in 1931, though majority rule did not come until 1994. In the Caribbean, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago became independent in 1962, followed by Barbados in 1966, and other islands of the British West Indies in the 1970s and '80s. Other regions from which nations emerged out of British colonial rule included Central America (British Honduras, now Belize), South America (British Guiana, now Guyana), the Pacific islands (Fiji), and Europe (Cyprus, Malta). After decolonization, many of these nations chose to remain within a newly conceived Commonwealth and are sometimes referred to as "New Commonwealth" countries. Some nations, such as Ireland, Pakistan, and South Africa, withdrew from the Commonwealth, though South Africa and Paki stan eventually rejoined, and others, such as Burma (now Myanmar), gained independence outside the Commonwealth. Britain's last major overseas colony, Hong Kong, was returned to Chinese sovereignty in 1997, but while Britain retains only a handful of dependent territories, such as Bermuda and Montserrat, the scope of the Commonwealth remains vast, with approximately 30 percent of the world's population.

British Money

One of the most dramatic changes to the system of British money came in 1971. In the system previously in place, the pound consisted of 20 shillings, each containing 12 pence, making 240 pence to the pound. Since 1971, British money has been calculated on the decimal system, with 100 pence to the pound. Britons' experience of paper money did not change very drastically: as before, 5- and 10-pound notes constitute the majority of bills passing through their hands (in addition, 20- and 50-pound notes have been added). But the shift necessitated a whole new way of thinking about and exchanging coins and marked the demise of the shilling, one of the fundamental units of British monetary history. Many other coins, still frequently encountered in literature, had already passed. These include the groat, worth 4 pence (the word "groat" is often used to signify a trifling sum); the angel (which depicted the archangel Michael triumphing over a dragon), valued at 10 shillings; the mark, worth in its day two-thirds of a pound or 13 shillings 4 pence; and the sovereign, a gold coin initially worth 22 shillings 6 pence, later valued at 1 pound, last circulated in 1932. One prominent older coin, the guinea, was worth a pound and a shilling; though it has not been minted since 1813, a very few quality items or prestige awards (like the purse in a horse race) may still be quoted in guineas. (The table below includes some other obsolete coins.) Colloquially, a pound was (and is) called a quid; a shilling a bob; sixpence, a tanner; a copper could refer to a penny, a half-penny, or a farthing ( $\frac{1}{4}$  penny).

Throughout its tenure as a member of the European Union (1973–2020), Britain contemplated but did not make the change to the EU's common currency, the Euro, reflecting many Britons' strong identification of their country with its rich commercial history and view of their currency as a national symbol.

Even more challenging than sorting out the values of obsolete coins is calculating for any given period the purchasing power of money, which fluctuates over time by its very nature. As difficult as it is to generalize, it is clear that money used to be worth much more than it is currently. During the early Middle Ages, the most valuable circulating coin was the silver penny: four would buy a sheep. Beyond long-term inflationary trends, prices varied from times of plenty to those marked by poor harvests; from peacetime to wartime; from the country to the metropolis (life in London has always been very expensive); and wages varied according to the availability of labor (wages would sharply rise, for instance, during the devastating Black Death in the fourteenth century). The following chart provides a glimpse of some actual prices of given periods and their changes across time, though all the variables mentioned above prevent them from being definitive. Even from one year to the next, an added tax on gin or tea could drastically raise prices, and a lottery ticket could cost much more the night before the drawing than just a month earlier. Still, the prices quoted below do indicate important trends, such as the disparity of incomes in British society and the costs of basic commodities. In the chart on the following pages, the symbol £ is used for pound, s. for shilling, d. for a penny (from Latin denarius); a sum would normally be written £2.19.3—that is 2 pounds, 19 shillings, 3 pence. (This is Leopold Bloom's budget for the day depicted in Joyce's novel Ulysses [1922]; in the new currency, it would be about £2.96.)

The British Baronage

The English monarchy is in principle hereditary, though at times during the Middle Ages the rules were subject to dispute. As it stands now, authority passes from parent to eldest surviving child, to siblings in order of seniority if there are no children, and in default of direct descendants to collateral lines (cousins, nephews, nieces) in order of closeness. There have been breaks in the order of succession (1066, 1399, 1688), but so far as possible the usurpers have always sought to paper over the break with a legitimate, that is, hereditary, claim. When a queen succeeds to the throne and takes a husband, he does not become king unless he is in the line of blood succession; rather, he is named prince consort, as Albert was to Victoria. He may be the father of kings, but he is not one himself.

The original Saxon nobles were the king's thanes, ealdormen, or earls, who provided the king with military service and counsel in return for booty, gifts, or landed estates. William the Conqueror, arriving from France, where feudalism was fully developed, considerably expanded this group. In addition, as the king distributed the lands of his new kingdom, he also distributed dignities to men who became known collectively as "the baronage." "Baron" in its root meaning signifies simply "man," and barons were the king's men. As the title was common, a distinction was early made between greater and lesser barons, the former gradually assuming loftier and more impressive titles. The first English "duke" was created in 1337; the title of "marquess," or "marquis" (pronounced "markwis"), followed in 1385, and "viscount" ("vyekount") in 1440. Though "earl" is the oldest title of all, an earl now comes between a marquess and a viscount in order of dignity and precedence, and the old term "baron" now designates a rank just below viscount. "Baronets" were created in 1611 as a means of raising revenue for the crown (the title could be purchased for about £1,000); they are marginal nobility and have never sat in the House of Lords.

Kings and queens are addressed as “Your Majesty,” princes and princesses as “Your Highness,” the other hereditary nobility as “My Lord” or “Your Lordship.” Peers receive their titles either by inheritance (like Lord Byron, the sixth baron of that line) or from the monarch (like Alfred, Lord Tennyson, created 1st Baron Tennyson by Victoria). The children, even of a duke, are commoners unless they are specifically granted some other title or inherit their father’s title from him. A peerage can be forfeited by act of attainder, as for example when a lord is convicted of treason; and, when forfeited, or lapsed for lack of a successor, can be bestowed on another family. Thus in 1605 Robert Cecil was made first Earl of Salisbury in the third creation, the first creation dating from 1149, the second from 1337, the title having been in abeyance since 1539. Titles descend by right of succession and do not depend on tenure of land; thus, a title does not always indicate where a lord dwells or holds power. Indeed, noble titles do not always refer to a real place at all. At Prince Edward’s marriage in 1999, the queen created him Earl of Wessex, although the old kingdom of Wessex has had no political existence since 1066, and the name was all but forgotten until it was resurrected by Thomas Hardy as the setting of his novels. (This is perhaps but one of many ways in which the world of the aristocracy increasingly resembles the realm of literature.)

Scottish peers sat in the parliament of Scotland, as English peers did in the parliament of England, till at the Act of Union (1707) Scottish peers were granted sixteen seats in the English House of Lords, to be filled by election. (In 1963, all Scottish lords were allowed to sit.) Similarly, Irish peers, when the Irish parliament was abolished in 1801, were granted the right to elect twenty-eight of their number to the House of Lords in Westminster. (Now that the Republic of Ireland is a separate nation, this no longer applies.) Women members (peeresses) were first allowed to sit in the House as nonhereditary Life Peers in 1958 (when that status was created for members of both genders); women first sat by their own hereditary right in 1963. Today the House of Lords still retains some power to influence or delay legislation, but its future is uncertain. In 1999, the hereditary peers (then amounting to 750) were reduced to 92 temporary members elected by their fellow peers. Holders of Life Peerages remain, as do senior bishops of the Church of England and high-court judges (the "Law Lords").

Below the peerage the chief title of honor is "knight." Knighthood, which is not hereditary, is generally a reward for services rendered. A knight (Sir John Black) is addressed, using his first name, as "Sir John"; his wife, using the last name, is "Lady Black"—unless she is the daughter of an earl or nobleman of higher rank, in which case she will be "Lady Arabella." The female equivalent of a knight bears the title of "Dame." Though the word knight itself comes from the Old English cniht, there is some doubt as to whether knighthood amounted to much before the arrival of the Normans. The feudal system required military service as a condition of land tenure, and a man who came to serve his king at the head of an army of tenants required a title of authority and badges of identity—hence the title of knighthood and the coat of arms. During the Crusades, when men were far removed from their land (or even sold it in order to go on crusade), more elaborate forms of fealty sprang up that soon expanded into orders of knighthood. The Templars, Hospitallers, Knights of the Teutonic Order, Knights of Malta, and Knights of the Golden Fleece were but a few of these companionships; not all of them were available at all times in England.

Gradually, with the rise of centralized government and the decline of feudal tenures, military knighthood became obsolete, and the rank largely honorific; sometimes, as under James I, it degenerated into a scheme of the royal government for making money. For hundreds of years after its establishment in the fourteenth century, the Order of the Garter was the only English order of knighthood, an exclusive courtly companionship. Then, during the late seventeenth, the eighteenth, and the nineteenth centuries, a number of additional orders were created, with names such as the Thistle, Saint Patrick, the Bath, Saint Michael, and Saint George, plus a number of special Victorian and Indian orders. They retain the terminology, ceremony, and dignity of knighthood, but the military implications are vestigial.

Although the British Empire now belongs to history, appointments to the Order of the British Empire continue to be conferred for services to that empire at home or abroad. Such honors (commonly referred to as "gongs") are granted by the monarch in New Year's and Birthday lists, but the decisions are now made by the government in power. In recent years there have been efforts to popularize and democratize the dispensation of honors, with recipients including celebrities of all types. But this does not prevent large sectors of British society from regarding both knighthood and the peerage as largely irrelevant to modern life.

Religions in Great Britain

In the late sixth century C.E., missionaries from Rome introduced Christianity to Britons—actually, reintroduced it, since it had briefly flourished in the southern parts of the British Isles during the Roman occupation, and even after the Roman withdrawal had persisted in the Celtic regions of Scotland and Wales. By the time the earliest poems included in The Norton Anthology of English Literature were composed (the seventh century), therefore, there had been a Christian presence in the British Isles for hundreds of years. The conversion of the Germanic occupiers of England can, however, be dated only from 597. Our knowledge of the religion of pre-Christian Britain is sketchy, but it is likely that vestiges of Germanic polytheism assimilated into, or coexisted with, the practice of Christianity: fertility rites were incorporated into the celebration of Easter resurrection, rituals commemorating the dead into All-Hallows Eve and All Saints Day, and elements of winter solstice festivals into the celebration of Christmas. The most durable polytheistic remains are the days of the week, each of which except “Saturday” derives from the name of a Germanic pagan god, and the word “Easter,” deriving, according to the great monastic scholar Bede (ca. 673–735), from the name of a Germanic pagan goddess, Eostre. In English literature such “folkloric” elements sometimes elicit romantic nostalgia. Geoffrey Chaucer’s “Wife of Bath” looks back to a magical time before the arrival of Christianity in which the land was “fulfild of fairye.” Hundreds of years later, the seventeenth-century writer Robert Herrick honors the amalgamation of Christian and pagan elements in agrarian British culture in such poems as “Corinna’s Gone A-Maying” and “The Hock Cart.”

Medieval Christianity was fairly uniform, if complex, across Western Europe—hence called “catholic,” or universally shared. The Church was composed of the so-called “regular” and “secular” orders, the regular orders being those who followed a rule in a community under an abbot or an abbess (that is, monks, nuns, friars, and canons), while the secular clergy of priests served parish communities under the governance of a bishop. In the unstable period from the sixth until the twelfth century, monasteries were the intellectual powerhouse of the Church. From the beginning of the thirteenth century, with the development of an urban Christian spirituality in Europe, friars dominated the recently invented institution of universities, as well as devoting themselves, in theory at least, to the urban poor.

The Catholic Church was also an international power structure. With its hierarchy of pope, cardinals, archbishops, and bishops, it offered a model of the centralized, bureaucratic state from the late eleventh century. That ecclesiastical power structure coexisted alongside a separate, often less centralized and feudal structure of lay authorities, with theoretically different and often competing spheres of social responsibilities. The sharing of lay and ecclesiastical authority in medieval England was sometimes a source of conflict. Chaucer's pilgrims are on their way to visit the memorial shrine to one victim of such exemplary struggle: Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, who opposed the policies of King Henry II, was assassinated by indirect suggestion of the king in 1170, and later made a saint. The Church, in turn, produced its own victims: Jews were subject to persecution in the late twelfth century in England, before being expelled in 1290. From the beginning of the fifteenth century, the English Church targeted Lollard heretics (see below) with capital punishment, for the first time.

As an international organization, the Church conducted its business in the universal language of Latin. Thus although in the period the largest segment of literate persons was made up of clerics, the clerical contribution to great literary writing in vernacular languages (for example, French and English) was, so far as we know, relatively modest, with some great exceptions in the later Middle Ages (for example, William Langland). Lay, vernacular writers of the period certainly reflect the importance of the Church as an institution and the pervasiveness of religion in the rituals that marked everyday life, as well as contesting institutional authority. From the late fourteenth century, indeed, England witnessed an active and articulate, proto-Protestant movement known as Lollardy, which attacked clerical hierarchy and promoted vernacular scriptures.

Beginning in 1517 the German monk Martin Luther, in Wittenberg, Germany, openly challenged many aspects of Catholic practice and by 1520 had completely repudiated the authority of the pope, setting in motion the Protestant Reformation. Luther argued that the Roman Catholic Church had strayed far from the pattern of Christianity laid out in scripture. He rejected Catholic doctrines for which no biblical authority was to be found, such as the belief in Purgatory, and translated the Bible into German, on the grounds that the importance of scripture for all Christians made its translation into the vernacular tongue essential. Luther was not the first to advance such views—Lollard followers of the Englishman John Wycliffe had translated the Bible in the late fourteenth century. But Luther, protected by powerful German rulers, was able to speak out without fear of punishment and convert others to his views, rather than suffer the persecution usually meted out to heretics. Soon other reformers were following in Luther's footsteps: of these, the Swiss Ulrich Zwingli and the French Jean Calvin would be especially influential for English religious thought.

At first England remained staunchly Catholic. Its king, Henry VIII, was so severe to heretics that the pope awarded him the title "Defender of the Faith," which British monarchs have retained to this day. In 1534, however, Henry rejected the authority of the pope to prevent his divorce from his queen, Catherine of Aragon, and his marriage to his mistress, Ann Boleyn. In doing so, Henry appropriated to himself ecclesiastical as well as secular authority. Thomas More, author of Utopia, was executed in 1535 for refusing to endorse Henry's right to govern the English church. Over the following six years, Henry consolidated his grip on the ecclesiastical establishment by dissolving the powerful, populous Catholic monasteries and redistributing their massive landholdings to his own lay followers. Yet Henry's church largely retained Catholic doctrine and liturgy. When Henry died and his young son, Edward, came to the throne in 1547, the English church embarked on a more Protestant path, a direction abruptly reversed when Edward died and his older sister Mary, the daughter of Catherine of Aragon, took the throne in 1553 and attempted to reintroduce Roman Catholicism. Mary's reign was also short, however, and her successor, Elizabeth I, the daughter of Ann Boleyn, was a Protestant. Elizabeth attempted to establish a "middle way" Christianity, compromising between Roman Catholic practices and beliefs and reformed ones.

The Church of England, though it laid claim to a national rather than pan-European authority, aspired like its predecessor to be the universal church of all English subjects. It retained the Catholic structure of parishes and dioceses and the Catholic hierarchy of bishops, though the ecclesiastical authority was now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Church's "Supreme Governor" was the monarch. Yet disagreement and controversy persisted. Some members of the Church of England wanted to retain many of the ritual and liturgical elements of Catholicism. Others, the Puritans, advocated a more thoroughgoing reformation. Most Puritans remained within the Church of England, but a minority, the "Separatists" or "Congregationalists," split from the established church altogether. These dissenters no longer thought of the ideal church as an organization to which everybody belonged; instead, they conceived it as a more exclusive group of likeminded people, one not necessarily attached to a larger body of believers.

In the seventeenth century, the succession of the Scottish king James to the English throne produced another problem. England and Scotland were separate nations, and in the sixteenth century Scotland had developed its own national Presbyterian church, or "kirk," under the leadership of the reformer John Knox. The kirk retained fewer Catholic liturgical elements than did the Church of England, and its authorities, or "presbyters," were elected by assemblies of their fellow clerics, rather than appointed by the king. James I and his son Charles I, especially the latter, wanted to bring the Scottish kirk into conformity with Church of England practices. The Scots violently resisted these efforts, with the collaboration of many English Puritans, in a conflict that eventually developed into the English Civil War in the mid-seventeenth century. The effect of these disputes is visible in the poetry of such writers as John Milton, Robert Herrick, Henry Vaughan, and Thomas Traherne, and in the prose of Thomas Browne, Lucy Hutchinson, and Dorothy Waugh. Just as in the mid-sixteenth century, when a succession of monarchs with different religious commitments destabilized the church, so the seventeenth century endured spiritual whiplash. King Charles I's highly ritualistic Church of England was violently overturned by the Puritan victors in the Civil War—until 1660, after the death of the Puritan leader, Oliver Cromwell, when the Church of England was restored along with the monarchy.

The religious and political upheavals of the seventeenth century produced Christian sects that de-emphasized the ceremony of the established church and rejected as well its top-down authority structure. Some of these groups were ephemeral, but the Baptists (founded in 1608 in Amsterdam by the English expatriate John Smyth) and Quakers, or Society of Friends (founded by George Fox in the 1640s), flourished outside the established church, sometimes despite cruel persecution. John Bunyan, a Baptist, wrote the Christian allegory Pilgrim's Progress while in prison. Some dissenters, like the Baptists, shared the reformed reverence for the absolute authority of scripture but interpreted the scriptural texts differently from their fellow Protestants. Others, like the Quakers, favored, even over the authority of the Bible, the "inner light" or voice of individual conscience, which they took to be the working of the Holy Spirit in the lives of individuals.

The Protestant dissenters were not England's only religious minorities. Despite crushing fines and the threat of imprisonment, a minority of Catholics under Elizabeth and James openly refused to give their allegiance to the new church, and others remained secret adherents to the old ways. John Donne was brought up in an ardently Catholic family, and several other writers converted to Catholicism as adults—Ben Jonson for a considerable part of his career, Elizabeth Carey and Richard Crashaw permanently, and at profound personal cost. In the eighteenth century, Catholics remained objects of suspicion as possible agents of sedition, especially after the "Glorious Revolution" in 1688 deposed the Catholic James II in favor of the Protestant William and Mary. Anti-Catholic prejudice affected John Dryden, a Catholic convert, as well as the lifelong Catholic Alexander Pope. By contrast, the English colony of Ireland remained overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, the fervor of its religious commitment at least partly inspired by resistance to English occupation. Starting in the reign of Elizabeth, England shored up its own authority in Ireland by encouraging Protestant immigrants from Scotland to settle in the north of Ireland, producing a virulent religious divide the effects of which are still felt today.

A small community of Jews had moved from France to London after 1066, when the Norman William the Conqueror came to the English throne. Although despised and persecuted by many Christians, they were allowed to remain as moneylenders to the Crown, until the thirteenth century, when the king developed alternative sources of credit. At this point, in 1290, the Jews were expelled from England. In 1655 Oliver Cromwell permitted a few to return, and in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries the Jewish population slowly increased, mainly by immigration from Germany. In the mid-eighteenth century some prominent Jews had their children brought up as Christians so as to facilitate their full integration into English society: thus the nineteenth-century writer and politician Benjamin Disraeli, although he and his father were members of the Church of England, was widely considered a Jew insofar as his ancestry was Jewish.

In the late seventeenth century, as the Church of England reasserted itself, Catholics, Jews, and dissenting Protestants found themselves subject to significant legal restrictions. The Corporation Act, passed in 1661, and the Test Act, passed in 1673, excluded all who refused to take communion in the Church of England from voting, attending university, or working in government or in the professions. Members of religious minorities, as well as Church of England communicants, paid mandatory taxes in support of Church of England ministers and buildings. In 1689 the dissenters gained the right to worship in public, but Jews and Catholics were not permitted to do so.

During the eighteenth century, political, intellectual, and religious history remained closely intertwined. The Church of England came to accommodate a good deal of variety. "Low church" services resembled those of the dissenting Protestant churches, minimizing ritual and emphasizing the sermon; the "high church" retained more elaborate ritual elements, yet its prestige was under attack on several fronts. Many Enlightenment thinkers subjected the Bible to rational critique and found it wanting: the philosopher David Hume, for instance, argued that the "miracles" described therein were more probably lies or errors than real breaches of the laws of nature. Within the Church of England, the "broad church" Latitudinarians welcomed this rationalism, advocating theological openness and an emphasis on ethics rather than dogma. More radically, the Unitarian movement rejected the divinity of Christ while professing to accept his ethical teachings. Taking a different tack, the preacher John Wesley, founder of Methodism, responded to the rationalists' challenge with a newly fervent call to evangelism and personal discipline; his movement was particularly successful in Wales. Revolutions in America and France at the end of the century generated considerable millenarian excitement and fostered more new religious ideas, often in conjunction with a radical social agenda. Many important writers of the Romantic period were indebted to traditions of protestant dissent: Unitarian and rationalist protestant ideas influenced William Hazlitt, Anna Barbauld, Mary Wollstonecraft, and the young Samuel Taylor Coleridge. William Blake created a highly idiosyncratic poetic mythology loosely indebted to radical strains of Christian mysticism. Others were even more heterodox: Lord Byron and Robert Burns, brought up as Scots Presbyterians, rebelled fiercely, and Percy Shelley's writing of an atheistic pamphlet resulted in his expulsion from Oxford.

Great Britain never erected an American-style "wall of separation" between church and state, but in practice religion and secular affairs grew more and more distinct during the nineteenth century. In consequence, members of religious minorities no longer seemed to pose a threat to the commonweal. A movement to repeal the Test Act failed in the 1790s, but a renewed effort resulted in the extension of the franchise to dissenting Protestants in 1828 and to Catholics in 1829. The numbers of Roman Catholics in England were swelled by immigration from Ireland, but there were also some prominent English adherents. Among writers, the converts John Newman and Gerard Manley Hopkins are especially important. The political participation and social integration of Jews presented a thornier challenge. Lionel de Rothschild, repeatedly elected to represent London in Parliament during the 1840s and 1850s, was not permitted to take his seat there because he refused to take his oath of office "on the true faith of a Christian"; finally, in 1858, the Jewish Disabilities Act allowed him to omit these words. Only in 1871, however, were Oxford and Cambridge opened to non-Anglicans.

Meanwhile geological discoveries and Charles Darwin's evolutionary theories increasingly cast doubt on the literal truth of the Creation story, and close philological analysis of the biblical text suggested that its origins were human rather than divine. By the end of the nineteenth century, many writers were bearing witness to a world in which Christianity no longer seemed fundamentally plausible. In his poetry and prose, Thomas Hardy depicts a world devoid of benevolent providence. Matthew Arnold's poem "Dover Beach" is in part an elegy to lost spiritual assurance, as the "Sea of Faith" goes out like the tide: "But now I only hear / Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar / Retreating." For Arnold, literature must replace religion as a source of spiritual truth, and intimacy between individuals substitute for the lost communal solidarity of the universal church.

The work of many twentieth-century writers shows the influence of a religious upbringing or a religious conversion in adulthood. T. S. Eliot and W. H. Auden embrace Anglicanism, William Butler Yeats spiritualism. James Joyce repudiates Irish Catholicism but remains obsessed with it. Yet religion, or lack of it, is a matter of individual choice and conscience, not social or legal mandate. Over the past several decades, church attendance has plummeted in Great Britain. Only about 46 percent of the population identified itself as "Christian" on the 2021 census. Meanwhile, immigration from former British colonies as well as other countries has swelled the ranks of religions once uncommon in the British Isles—Muslim, Sikh, Hindu, Buddhist—though the numbers of adherents remain small relative to the total population.

The Universe According to Ptolemy

Ptolemy was a Roman astronomer of Greek descent, born in Egypt during the second century C.E.; for nearly fifteen hundred years after his death his account of the design of the universe was accepted as standard. During that time, the basic pattern underwent many detailed modifications and was fitted out with many astrological and pseudoscientific trappings. But in essence Ptolemy's followers portrayed the earth as the center of the universe, with the sun, planets, and fixed stars set in transparent spheres orbiting around it. In this scheme of things, as modified for Christian usage, Hell was usually placed under the earth's surface at the center of the cosmic globe, while Heaven, the abode of the blessed spirits, was in the outermost, uppermost circle, the empyrean. But in 1543 the Polish astronomer Copernicus proposed an alternative hypothesis—that the earth rotates around the sun, not vice versa; and despite theological opposition, observations with the new telescope and careful mathematical calculations insured ultimate acceptance of the new view.

The map of the Ptolemaic universe below is a simplified version of a diagram in Peter Apian's Cosmography (1584). In such a diagram, the Firmament is the sphere that contained the fixed stars; the Crystalline Sphere, which contained no heavenly bodies, is a late innovation, included to explain certain anomalies in the observed movement of the heavenly bodies; and the Prime Mover is the sphere that, itself put into motion by God, imparts rotation around the earth to all the other spheres.

Milton, writing in the mid-seventeenth century, used two universes. The Copernican universe, though he alludes to it, was too large, formless, and unfamiliar to be the setting for the war between Heaven and Hell in Paradise Lost. He therefore used the Ptolemaic cosmos, but placed Heaven well outside this smaller earth-centered universe, Hell far beneath it, and assigned the vast middle space to Chaos.

General Bibliography

This bibliography consists of a list of suggested general readings on English literature. Bibliographies for the authors and topical clusters in The Norton Anthology of English Literature are available online at the NAEL student site.

Histories of England and of English Literature

Even the most distinguished of the comprehensive general histories written in past generations have come to seem outmoded. Innovative research in social, cultural, and political history has made it difficult to write a single coherent account of England from the Middle Ages to the present, let alone to accommodate in a unified narrative the complex histories of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the other nations where writing in English has flourished. Readers who wish to explore the historical matrix out of which the works of literature collected in this anthology emerged are advised to consult the studies of particular periods listed in the appropriate sections of this bibliography. The multivolume Oxford History of England (1934–65) and New Oxford History of England (1992–2009) are useful, as are the three-volume Peoples of the British Isles: A New History, by Stanford E. Lehmberg, Samantha A. Meigs, and Thomas William Heyck (3rd ed., 1992); the nine-volume Cambridge Cultural History of Britain, ed. Boris Ford (1992); the three-volume Cambridge Social History of Britain, 1750–1950, ed. F. M. L. Thompson (1990); and the multivolume Penguin History of Britain, gen. ed. David Cannadine (1996–). For Britain's imperial history, readers can consult the five-volume Oxford History of the British Empire, ed. Wm. Roger Louis (1998–99), as well as Gender and Empire, ed. Philippa Levine (2004). Also of interest is Lisa Lowe, The Intimacies of Four

Continents (2015). Given the cultural centrality of London, readers may find particular interest in The London Encyclopaedia, ed. Ben Weinreb et al. (3rd ed., 2008); Roy Porter, London: A Social History (1994); and Jerry White, London in the Nineteenth Century: "A Human Awful Wonder of God" (2007) and London in the Twentieth Century: A City and Its People (2001).

Similar observations may be made about literary history. In the light of such initiatives as women's studies, New Historicism, and postcolonialism, the range of authors deemed significant has expanded, along with the geographical and conceptual boundaries of literature in English. Attempts to capture in a unified account the great sweep of literature from Beowulf to the early twenty-first century have largely given way to studies of individual genres, carefully delimited time periods, and specific authors. Among the large-scale literary surveys, The Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, ed. Dominic Head (3rd ed., 2006), is useful, as is the nine-volume Penguin History of Literature (1987–94) and the multivolume Oxford History of Poetry in English (2022–). The Feminist Companion to Literature in English: Women Writers from the Middle Ages to the Present, ed. Virginia Blain, Isobel Grundy, and Patricia Clements (1990), is an important resource, and the editorial materials in the two-volume The Norton Anthology of Literature by Women: The Traditions in English, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (3rd ed., 2007), constitute a concise history and set of biographies of women authors since the Middle Ages. Annals of English Literature, 1475–1950 (2nd ed., 1961), lists important publications year by year, together with the significant literary events for each year. Seven volumes have been published in The Oxford English Literary History, gen. eds. Jonathan Bate and Colin Burrow (2002–): Laura Ashe, 1000–1350: Conquest and Transformation; James Simpson, 1350–1547: Reform and Cultural Revolution; Margaret J. M. Ezell, 1645–1714: The Later Seventeenth Century; Philip Davis, 1830–1880: The Victorians; Chris Baldick, 1830–1880: The Modern Movement (1910–1940); Randall Stevenson, 1960–2000: The Last of England?; and Bruce King, 1948–2000: The Internationalization of English.

Literature. See also The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. David Wallace (1999); The Cambridge History of Early Medieval English Literature, ed. Clare E. Lees (2013); The Cambridge History of Early Modern English Literature, ed. David Loewenstein and Janel Mueller (2002); The Cambridge History of English Literature, 1660–1780, ed. John Richetti (2005); The Cambridge History of English Romantic Literature, ed. James Chandler (2009); The Cambridge History of Victorian Literature, ed. Kate Flint (2012); and The Cambridge History of Twentieth-Century English Literature, ed. Laura Marcus and Peter Nicholls (2004).

Helpful treatments and surveys of English meter, rhyme, and stanza forms are Paul Fussell Jr., Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (rev. ed., 1979); Donald Wesling, The Chances of Rhyme: Device and Modernity (1980); Charles O. Hartman, Free Verse: An Essay on Prosody (1980); Derek Attridge, Poetic Rhythm: An Introduction (1995); Robert Pinsky, The Sounds of Poetry: A Brief Guide (1998); The Making of a Poem: A Norton Anthology of Poetic Forms, ed. Mark Strand and Eavan Boland (2000); John Hollander, Rhyme's Reason: A Guide to English Verse (3rd ed., 2001); Poems, Poets, Poetry: An Introduction and Anthology, ed. Helen Vendler (3rd ed., 2010); The Lyric Theory Reader: A Critical Anthology, ed. Virginia Jackson and Yopie Prins (2014); and Jonathan Culler, Theory of the Lyric (2015).

On the development and functioning of the novel as a form, see Ian Watt, The Rise of the Novel: Studies in Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding (1957); Gérard Genette, Narrative Discourse: An Essay in Method (1970; trans. 1980); Theory of the Novel: A Historical Approach, ed. Michael McKeon (2000); The Novel, ed. Franco Moretti (2 vols.; 2001–03, trans. 2006); McKeon, The Origins of the English Novel, 1600–1740 (15th anniversary ed., 2002); The Cambridge History of the English Novel, ed. Robert L. Caserio and Clement Hawes (2012); A Companion to the English Novel, ed. Stephen Arata et al. (2015); and the ten volumes to date of The Oxford History of the Novel in English (2012–). On women novelists and readers, see Nancy Armstrong, Desire and Domestic Fiction: A Political History of the Novel (1987), and Catherine Gallagher, Nobody's Story: The Vanishing Acts of Women Writers in the Marketplace, 1670–1820 (1994).

On the history of playhouse design, see Richard Leacroft, The Development of the English Playhouse: An Illustrated Survey of Theatre Building in England from Medieval to Modern Times (1988). For a survey of the plays that have appeared on these and other stages, see Allardyce Nicoll, British Drama, rev. J. C. Trewin (6th ed., 1978); the eight-volume The Revels History of Drama in English, gen. eds. Clifford Leech and T. W. Craik (1975–83); Alfred Harbage, Annals of English Drama, 975–1700, rev. S. Schoenbaum and Sylvia Wagonheim (3rd ed., 1989); and the three volumes of The Cambridge History of British Theatre, ed. Jane Milling, Peter Thomson, Joseph Donohue, and Baz Kershaw (2004).

On some of the key intellectual currents that are at once reflected in and shaped by literature and contemporary literary criticism, Arthur O. Lovejoy's classic studies The Great Chain of Being (1936) and Essays in the History of Ideas (1948) remain valuable, along with such works as Georg Simmel, The Philosophy of Money (1900; trans. 1907; 3rd enl. ed., 2004); Ernst Cassirer, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms (4 vols., 1923–95; trans. 1953–96); Arthur O. Lovejoy and George Boas, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Antiquity (1935); Norbert Elias, The Civilizing Process (2 vols., 1939; trans. 1979–82); Simone de Beauvoir, The Second Sex (2 vols., 1949; trans. 1953, new trans. 2009); Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (1952; trans. 1957, new trans. 2008); Ernst Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Mediaeval Political Theology (1957; new eds. 1997, 2016); Hannah Arendt, The Human Condition (1958; 2nd ed., 1998); Gaston Bachelard, The Poetics of Space (1958; trans. 1969, new ed. 1994); Richard Popkin, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (1960; rev. ed., 1964; rev. and expanded as The History of Scepticism: From Savonarola to Bayle, 2003); Hans Blumenberg, The Legitimacy of the Modern Age (1966; trans. 1983); M. H. Abrams, Natural Supernaturalism: Tradition and Revolution in Romantic Literature (1971); Michel Foucault, Madness and Civilization: A History of Insanity in the Age of Reason (1964; trans. 1965) and The Order of Things: An Archaeology of the Human Sciences (1966; trans. 1970); Jacques Derrida, Of Grammatology (1967; trans. 1976, 40th anniversary ed. 2016) and Dissemination (1972; trans. 1981); Martin Jay, The Dialectical Imagination: A History of the Frankfurt School and the Institute of Social Research, 1923–1950 (1973); Hayden White, Metahistory: The Historical Imagination in Nineteenth-Century Europe (1973); Roland Barthes, The Pleasure of the Text (1973; trans. 1975); Raymond Williams, Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society (1976; new ed., 2015); Pierre Bourdieu, Distinction: A Social Critique of the Judgement of Taste (1979; trans. 1984); Richard Rorty, Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature (1979; 39th anniversary ed., 2009); Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari, A Thousand Plateaus: Capitalism and Schizophrenia (1980; trans. 1987); Michel de Certeau, The Practice of Everyday Life (2 vols., 1980; trans. 1984–98); Jürgen Habermas, The Philosophical Discourse of Modernity: Twelve Lectures (1985; trans. 1987); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Homi Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Judith Butler, The Psychic Life of Power: Theories in Subjection (1997); Sigmund Freud, Writings on Art and Literature, ed. Neil Hertz (1997); and N. Katherine Hayles, How We Became Posthuman: Virtual Bodies in Cybernetics, Literature, and Informatics (1999).

Reference Works

The single most important tool for the study of literature in English is the Oxford English Dictionary (1884–1924; 2nd ed., 1989; 3rd ed. in process). The most current edition, updated quarterly, is available online to subscribers. The OED is written on historical principles: that is, it attempts not only to describe current word use but also to record the history and development of the language from its origins before the Norman Conquest to the present. It thus provides, for familiar as well as archaic and obscure words, the widest possible range of meanings and uses, organized chronologically and illustrated with quotations. The OED can be searched as a conventional dictionary arranged a–z and also by subject, usage, region, origin, and timeline (the first appearance of a word). Resources available for early forms of English include the online Old English and Middle English dictionaries at Lexilogos (https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english\_old.htm and https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english\_middle.htm); also valuable are the Dictionary of Old English (1986–) and the Middle English Dictionary (1952; digitized 2008). Beyond the OED there are many other valuable dictionaries, such as The American Heritage Dictionary (5th ed., 50th anniversary printing, 2018); The Oxford Dictionary of Abbreviations (1992); T. F. Hoad, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of English Etymology (1993); Bas Aarts, Sylvia Chalker, and Edmund Weiner, The Oxford Dictionary of English Grammar (2nd ed., 2014); Morton S. Freeman, A New Dictionary of Eponyms (1997); The Oxford Essential Dictionary of Foreign Terms in English (1999); The Oxford Dictionary of Idioms, ed. Judith Siefring (2nd ed., 2004); P. H. Matthews, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Linguistics (3rd ed., 2014); Tom McArthur, The Oxford Guide to World English (2002); and The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Proverbs, ed. Jennifer Speake (4th ed., 2003). Other valuable reference works include The Cambridge Encyclopedia of the English Language, ed. David Crystal (3rd ed., 2018); The Concise Oxford Companion to the English Language, ed. Tom McArthur (1998); Fowler's Concise Dictionary of Modern English Usage, ed. Jeremy Butterfield (3rd ed., 2016); and the numerous guides to specialized vocabularies, slang, regional dialects, and the like.

There is a steady flow of new editions of most major and many minor writers in English, along with the publication of critical appraisals and scholarship. James L. Harner's Literary Research Guide: An Annotated List of Reference Sources in English Literary Studies (6th ed., 2014; available online at www.mla.org/public) offers thorough, evaluative annotations of a wide range of sources. For the historical record of scholarship and critical discussion, The New Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. George

Watson (5 vols., 1969–77), and the third edition in process, The Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. Joanne Shattock (1 vol. to date, 2000–), are useful. The MLA International Bibliography (also online) is a key resource for following critical discussion of literatures in English. Ranging from 1926 to the present, it includes journal articles, essays, chapters from collections, books, and dissertations, and covers folklore, linguistics, and film. The Annual Bibliography of English Language and Literature (ABELL), compiled by the Modern Humanities Research Association, lists monographs, periodical articles, critical editions of literary works, book reviews, and collections of essays published anywhere in the world; unpublished doctoral dissertations are covered for the period 1920–99 (available online to subscribers directly and as part of Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>).

For compact biographies of English authors, see the multivolume Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (DNB), ed. H. C. G. Matthew and Brian Harrison (2004); since 2004 the DNB has been extended online with updates (now monthly). Handy reference books of authors, works, and various literary terms and allusions include many volumes in the Cambridge Companion and Oxford Companion series: e.g., The Cambridge Companion to Narrative, ed. David Herman (2007); The Oxford Companion to English Literature, ed. Dinah Birch (7th ed., 2009); and The Cambridge Companion to Allegory, ed. Rita Copeland and Peter Struck (2010). The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, editor-in-chief Roland Greene (4th ed., 2012), is available online to subscribers in Oxford Reference. Handbooks that define and illustrate literary concepts and terms include The Penguin Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory, ed. J. A. Cuddon and M. A. R. Habib (5th ed., 2015); William Harmon, A Handbook to Literature (12th ed., 2011); Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. Frank Lentricchia and Thomas McLaughlin (2nd ed., 1995); and M. H. Abrams and Geoffrey Galt Harpham, A Glossary of Literary Terms (11th ed., 2014). Also useful are Richard A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms (2nd ed., 1991); Arthur Quinn, Figures of Speech: 60 Ways to Turn a Phrase (1982); the

Barnhart Concise Dictionary of Etymology, ed. Robert K. Barnhart (1995); and George A. Kennedy, A New History of Classical Rhetoric (1994).

On Greek and Roman backgrounds, see The Cambridge History of Classical Literature—vol. 1, Greek Literature, ed. P. E. Easterling and Bernard M. W. Knox (1985), and vol. 2, Latin Literature, ed. E. J. Kenney and W. V. Clausen (1982), both available to subscribers online; The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, ed. M. C. Howatson (3rd ed., 2011); Gian Biagio Conte, Latin Literature: A History (1987; trans. 1994); The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. Simon Hornblower, Antony Spawforth, and Esther Eidinow (4th ed., 2012); Richard Rutherford, Classical Literature: A Concise History (2005); and Mark P. O. Morford, Robert J. Lenardon, and Michael Sham, Classical Mythology (11th ed., 2018). The Loeb Classical Library of Greek and Roman texts with facing-page English translations is now available online to subscribers at www.loebclassics.com.

Digital resources in the humanities continue to grow rapidly. Among the many useful electronic resources for the study of English literature are enormous digital archives, available to subscribers: Early English Books Online (EEBO), <http://eebo.chadwyck.com/home>; Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>; and Eighteenth Century Collections Online (ECCO), www.gale.com/primary-sources/eighteenth-century-collections-online. There are also numerous free sites of variable quality. Many of the best of these are period- or author-specific and hence are listed in the period/author bibliographies on the NAEL website. Among the general sites, one of the most useful and wide-ranging is Voice of the Shuttle (<http://vos.ucsb.edu>), which includes links to Bartleby.com and Project Gutenberg.

Literary Criticism and Theory

The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism comprises nine volumes (1989–2013): Classical Criticism, ed. George A. Kennedy; The Middle

Ages, ed. Alastair Minnis and Ian Johnson; The Renaissance, ed. Glyn P. Norton; The Eighteenth Century, ed. H. B. Nisbet and Claude Rawson; Romanticism, ed. Marshall Brown; The Nineteenth Century, c. 1830–1914, ed. M. A. R. Habib; Modernism and the New Criticism, ed. A. Walton Litz, Louis Menand, and Lawrence Rainey; From Formalism to Poststructuralism, ed. Raman Selden; and Twentieth-Century Historical, Philosophical and Psychological Perspectives, ed. Christa Knellwolf and Christopher Norris. See also M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp: Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition (1953); William K. Wimsatt Jr. and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History (1957); René Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750–1950 (8 vols., 1955–92); Frank Lentricchia, After the New Criticism (1980); J. Hillis Miller, On Literature (2002); and John Frow, Character and Person (2014). Raman Selden, Peter Widdowson, and Peter Brooker have written A Reader's Guide to Contemporary Literary Theory (6th ed., 2017). Other useful resources include The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Michael Groden, Martin Kreiswirth, and Imre Szeman (2nd ed., 2005); Literary Theory: An Anthology, ed. Julie Rivkin and Michael Ryan (3rd ed., 2017); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, gen. ed. Vincent B. Leitch (3rd ed., 2018).

Modern approaches to English literature and literary theory were shaped by certain landmark works: William Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930; 3rd ed., 1953), Some Versions of Pastoral (1935), and The Structure of Complex Words (1951; 3rd ed., 1977); T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays (1932; 3rd ed., 1951) and On Poetry and Poets (1957); F. R. Leavis, Revaluation: Tradition and Development in English Poetry (1936) and The Great Tradition: George Eliot, Henry James, Joseph Conrad (1948); Erich Auerbach, Mimesis: The Representation of Reality in Western Literature (1946; trans. 1953); Lionel Trilling, The Liberal Imagination: Essays on Literature and Society (1950); William K. Wimsatt Jr., The Verbal Icon: Studies in the Meaning of Poetry (1954); Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays (1957); Wayne C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961; 2nd ed., 1983); and W. Jackson Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1970). René Wellek and Austin Warren, Theory of Literature (3rd ed., 1963), is a useful introduction to the variety of scholarly and critical approaches to literature up to the time of its publication. Jonathan Culler's Literary Theory: A Very Short Introduction (2nd ed., 2011), discusses recurrent issues and debates. On the discipline of criticism, see John Guillory's Professing Criticism: Essays on the Organization of Literary Study (2022); Rita Felski's The Limits of Critique (2015) is a critical assessment of contemporary criticism.

Beginning in the late 1960s, interest in literary theory as a specific field markedly intensified. Certain forms of literary study had already been influenced by the work of the Russian linguist Roman Jakobson and the Russian formalist Viktor Shklovsky—and, still more, by conceptions that derived or claimed to derive from Marx and Engels—but the full impact of these theories was not felt until what became known as the “theory revolution” of the 1970s and '80s. For Marxist literary criticism, see Georg Lukács, Theory of the Novel: A Historico-philosophical Essay on the Forms of Great Epic Literature (1920; trans. 1971), The Historical Novel (1937; trans. 1962), and Studies in European Realism: A Sociological Survey of the Writings of Balzac, Stendhal, Zola, Tolstoy, Gorki, and Others (trans. 1950); Walter Benjamin's essays from the 1920s and '30s, represented in Illuminations (1955; trans. 1968) and Reflections: Essays, Aphorisms, Autobiographical Writings (1975; trans. 1978); Mikhail Bakhtin's essays from the 1930s represented in The Dialogic Imagination: Four Essays (trans. 1981) and Rabelais and His World (1965; trans. 1968); Selections from the Prison Notebooks of Antonio Gramsci, ed. and trans. Quintin Hoare and Geoffrey Nowell Smith (1971); Raymond Williams, Marxism and Literature (1977); Tony Bennett, Formalism and Marxism (1979; 2nd ed., 2003); Fredric Jameson, The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act (1981); and Terry Eagleton, Literary Theory: An Introduction (1983; anniversary ed., 2008) and The Ideology of the Aesthetic (1990).

Structural linguistics and anthropology gave rise to a flowering of structuralist literary criticism; convenient introductions include Robert Scholes, Structuralism in Literature: An Introduction (1974), and Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics: Structuralism, Linguistics and the Study of Literature (new ed., 2002). Poststructuralist challenges to this approach are epitomized in such influential works as Jacques Derrida, Writing and Difference (1967; trans. 1978), and Paul de Man, Blindness and Insight: Essays in the Rhetoric of Contemporary Criticism (1971; 2nd ed., 1983). Poststructuralism is discussed in Jonathan Culler, On Deconstruction: Theory and Criticism after Structuralism (1982; 25th anniversary ed., 2007); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Fredric Jameson, Postmodernism; or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991); John McGowan, Postmodernism and Its Critics (1991); and Beyond Structuralism: The Speculations of Theory and the Experience of Reading, ed. Wendell V. Harris (1996). A figure who greatly influenced both structuralism and poststructuralism is Roland Barthes, in Mythologies (1957; trans. 1972, new trans. 2012) and S/Z (1970; trans. 1974). Among other influential contributions to literary theory are the psychoanalytic approach in Harold Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence: A Theory of Poetry (1973; 2nd ed., 1997), and the reader-response approach in Stanley Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980). For a retrospect on these decades, see Terry Eagleton, After Theory (2003).

Influenced by these theoretical currents but not restricted to them, modern feminist literary criticism was fashioned by such works as Patricia Meyer Spacks, The Female Imagination (1975); Ellen Moers, Literary Women (1976; new ed., 1986); Elaine Showalter, A Literature of Their Own: British Women Novelists from Brontë to Lessing (1977; expanded ed., 1999); and Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination (1979). Subsequent studies include Jane Gallop, The Daughter's Seduction: Feminism and Psychoanalysis (1982); Luce Irigaray, This Sex Which Is Not One (1977; trans. 1985); Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics (1987; new ed., 2006); Barbara Johnson, A World of Difference (1987); Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, No Man's Land: The Place of the Woman Writer in the Twentieth Century (3 vols., 1988–94); Judith Butler, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity (1990; 2nd ed., 1999); and the critical views sampled in The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature, and Theory, ed. Elaine Showalter (1985); Feminist Literary Theory: A Reader, ed. Mary Eagleton (1986; 3rd ed., 2011); and Feminisms: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Robyn R. Warhol and Diane Price Herndl (1991; rev. in 2009 as Feminisms Redux: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism); The Hélène Cixous Reader, ed. Susan Sellers (1994); The Cambridge Companion to Feminist Literary Theory, ed. Ellen Rooney (2006); and Feminist Literary Theory and Criticism: A Norton Reader, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (2007).

Just as feminist critics used poststructuralist and psychoanalytic methods to place literature in conversation with gender theory, a new school emerged placing literature in conversation with critical race theory. Comprehensive introductions include Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings That Formed the Movement, ed. Kimberlé Crenshaw et al. (1995); and Richard Delgado and Jean Stefancic, Critical Race Theory: An Introduction (3rd ed., 2017); and The Routledge Companion to Race and Ethnicity, ed. Stephen M. Caliendo and Charlton D. McIlwain (2nd ed., 2021). For an important precursor in cultural studies, see Stuart Hall et al., Policing the Crisis: Mugging, the State and Law and Order (1978; 2nd ed., 2013). Seminal works include Henry Louis Gates Jr., The Signifying Monkey: A Theory of African-American Literary Criticism (1988; 25th anniversary ed., 2014); Patricia Williams, The Alchemy of Race and Rights (1991); Toni Morrison, Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination (1992); Cornel West, Race Matters (1993; 25th anniversary ed., 2017); Gene Andrew Jarrett, Representing the Race: A New Political History of African American Literature (2011); Fred Moten, Black and Blur (2017); and Saidiya V. Hartman,

Wayward Lives, Beautiful Experiments: Intimate Histories of Social Upheaval (2019). Other important works include Kathleen Davis, Periodization and Sovereignty: How Ideas of Feudalism and Secularization Govern the Politics of Time (2008; rpt. 2017); Alexander G. Weheliye, Habeas Viscus: Racializing Assemblages, Biopolitics, and Black Feminist Theories of the Human (2014); Christina Sharpe, In the Wake: On Blackness and Being (2016); and Geraldine Heng, The Invention of Race in the European Middle Ages (2018). Helpful anthologies and collections of essays have emerged in recent decades, such as The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris (1997), and also their Concise Oxford Companion to African American Literature (2001); Unchained Voices: An Anthology of Black Authors in the English-Speaking World of the Eighteenth Century, ed. Vincent Carretta (1996; updated 2003); The Cambridge Companion to Jewish American Literature, ed. Hana Wirth-Nesher and Michael P. Kramer (2003); A Companion to African American Literature, ed. Gene Andrew Jarrett (2010); The Routledge Companion to Anglophone Caribbean Literature, ed. Michael A. Bucknor and Alison Donnell (2011); The Routledge Companion to Latino/a Literature, ed. Suzanne Bost and Frances R. Aparicio (2013); The Routledge Companion to Asian American and Pacific Islander Literature, ed. Rachel C. Lee (2014); The Cambridge Companion to Asian American Literature, ed. Crystal Parikh and Daniel Y. Kim (2015); and The Cambridge Companion to British Black and Asian Literature, 1945–2010, ed. Deirdre Osborne (2016).

Gay literature and queer studies are represented in collections including Inside/Out: Lesbian Theories, Gay Theories, ed. Diana Fuss (1991); The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader, ed. Henry Abelove, Michèle Aina Barale, and David Halperin (1993); The Columbia Anthology of Gay Literature: Readings from Western Antiquity to the Present Day, ed. Byrne R. S. Fone (1998); The Cambridge History of Gay and Lesbian Literature, ed. E. L. McCallum and Mikko Tuhkanen (2014); and The Cambridge Companion to Lesbian Literature, ed. Jodie Medd (2015), and by such books as Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick,

Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire (1985; 30th anniversary ed., 2015) and Epistemology of the Closet (1990; updated ed., 2008); Diana Fuss, Essentially Speaking: Feminism, Nature, and Difference (1989); Terry Castle, The Apparitional Lesbian: Female Homosexuality and Modern Culture (1993); Leo Bersani, Homos (1995); Gregory Woods, A History of Gay Literature: The Male Tradition (1998); David Halperin, How to Do the History of Homosexuality (2002); Judith Halberstam, In a Queer Time and Place: Transgender Bodies, Subcultural Lives (2005); Heather Love, Feeling Backward: Loss and the Politics of Queer History (2007); and Brian Glavey, The Wallflower Avant-garde: Modernism, Sexuality, and Queer Ekphrasis (2016).

New Historicism is represented in Stephen Greenblatt, Learning to Curse: Essays in Early Modern Culture (1990; new ed., 2007); New Historical Literary Study: Essays on Reproducing Texts, Representing History, ed. Jeffrey N. Cox and Larry J. Reynolds (1993); The New Historicism Reader, ed. H. Aram Veeser (1994); and Catherine Gallagher and Stephen Greenblatt, Practicing New Historicism (2000). The related social and historical dimension of texts is discussed in Jerome McGann, Critique of Modern Textual Criticism (1983), and Scholarly Editing: A Guide to Research, ed. D. C. Greetham (1995). Characteristic of New Historicism is an expansion of the field of literary interpretation still further in cultural studies; for a broad sampling of the range of interests, see Cultural Studies, ed. Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula A. Treichler (1992); A Cultural Studies Reader: History, Theory, Practice, ed. Jessica Munns and Gita Rajan (1995); and The Cultural Studies Reader, ed. Simon During (3rd ed., 2007).

This expansion of the field is similarly reflected in postcolonial studies: see Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (cited above) and The Wretched of the Earth (1961; trans. 1963, 60th anniversary ed. 2021); Edward Said, Orientalism (1978) and Culture and Imperialism (1993); Nation and Narration, ed. Homi K. Bhabha (1990); The Post-Colonial Studies Reader, ed. Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths and Helen Tiffin (2nd ed., 2006); and such influential books as Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths, and Helen Tiffin, The Empire Writes Back: Theory and Practice in Post-Colonial Literatures (1989; 2nd ed., 2002); Homi K. Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Elleke Boehmer, Colonial and Postcolonial Literature: Migrant Metaphors (1995; 2nd ed., 2005); Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (2000; new ed., 2008); and Robert J. C. Young, Postcolonialism: An Historical Introduction (2001; anniversary ed., 2016). Useful collections include The Cambridge History of Postcolonial Literature, ed. Ato Quayson (2 vols., 2011–12); The Cambridge Companion to the Postcolonial Novel, ed. Ato Quayson (2016); and The Cambridge Companion to Postcolonial Poetry, ed. Jahan Ramazani (2017).

In the wake of the theory revolution, critics have focused on a wide array of topics, which can be only briefly surveyed here. One current of work, focusing on the history of emotion, is represented in Brian Massumi, Parables for the Virtual: Movement, Affect, Sensation (2002); Sianne Ngai, Ugly Feelings (2005); The Affect Theory Reader, ed. Melissa Gregg and Gregory J. Seigworth (2010); and Judith Butler, Senses of the Subject (2015). A somewhat related current, examining the special role of traumatic memory in literature, is exemplified in Trauma: Explorations in Memory, ed. Cathy Caruth (1995), and Dominic LaCapra, Writing History, Writing Trauma (2001; new ed., 2014). Work on the literary implications of cognitive science may be glimpsed in Introduction to Cognitive Cultural Studies, ed. Lisa Zunshine (2010). Interest in quantitative approaches to literature was sparked by Franco Moretti's Graphs, Maps, Trees: Abstract Models for Literary History (2005). For the field of digital humanities, see Moretti, Distant Reading (2013); Defining Digital Humanities: A Reader, ed. Melissa Terras, Julianne Nyhan, and Edward Vanhoutte (2013); and A New Companion to Digital Humanities, ed. Susan Schreibman, Ray Siemens, and John Unsworth (2016). For ecocriticism, or studies of literature and the environment, see The Ecocriticism Reader: Landmarks in Literary Ecology, ed. Cheryll Glotfelty and Harold Fromm (1996); Writing the Environment: Ecocriticism and Literature, ed. Richard Kerridge and

Neil Sammells (1998); Jonathan Bate, The Song of the Earth (2000); Lawrence Buell, The Future of Environmental Criticism: Environmental Crisis and Literary Imagination (2005); Timothy Morton, Ecology Without Nature: Rethinking Environmental Aesthetics (2007); Jane Bennett, Vibrant Matter: A Political Ecology of Things (2010); Rob Nixon, Slow Violence and the Environmentalism of the Poor (2011); The Oxford Handbook of Ecocriticism, ed. Greg Garrard (2014); and Anthropocene Reading: Literary History in Geologic Times, ed. Tobias Menely and Jesse Oak Taylor (2017). Related are the fields of animal studies and posthumanism, whose key works include Bruno Latour, We Have Never Been Modern (1991; trans. 1993); Steve Baker, The Postmodern Animal (2000); Cary Wolfe, Animal Rites: American Culture, the Discourse of Species, and Posthumanist Theory (2003) and What Is Posthumanism? (2009); Jacques Derrida, The Animal That Therefore I Am (2006; trans. 2008); Kari Weil, Thinking Animals: Why Animal Studies Now? (2012); Animals and the Human Imagination: A Companion to Animal Studies, ed. Aaron Gross and Anne Vallely (2012); and Critical Animal Studies: Thinking the Unthinkable, ed. John Sorenson (2014). The relationship between literature and law is central to such works as Interpreting Law and Literature: A Hermeneutic Reader, ed. Sanford Levinson and Steven Mailloux (1988); Law's Stories: Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law, ed. Peter Brooks and Paul Gewirtz (1996); Literature and Legal Problem Solving: Law and Literature as Ethical Discourse, ed. Paul J. Heald (1998); and New Directions in Law and Literature, ed. Elizabeth S. Anker and Bernadette Meyler (2017). Ethical questions in literature have been usefully explored by, among others, Geoffrey Galt Harpham in Getting It Right: Language, Literature, and Ethics (1992) and Derek Attridge in The Singularity of Literature (2004). Finally, some approaches to literature, such as formalism and literary biography, that seemed superseded in the theoretical ferment of the late twentieth century have had a resurgence. A renewed interest in form is evident in Susan Stewart, Poetry and the Fate of the Senses (2002); Reading for Form, ed. Susan J. Wolfson and Marshall Brown (2006); and Caroline Levine, Forms: Whole, Rhythm, Hierarchy,

Network (2015). Interest in the history of the book was spearheaded by D. F. McKenzie's Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts (1986), Jerome J. McGann's The Textual Condition (1991), and Roger Chartier's The Order of Books: Readers, Authors, and Libraries in Europe Between the Fourteenth and Eighteenth Centuries (1992; trans. 1994). See also The Practice and Representation of Reading in England, ed. James Raven, Helen Small, and Naomi Tadmor (1996); The Cambridge History of the Book in Britain (7 vols., 1999–2019); The Book History Reader, ed. David Finkelstein and Alistair McCleery (2nd ed., 2006); and The Cambridge Companion to the History of the Book, ed. Leslie Howsam (2015). For studies in new media and digital or electronic literature, see N. Katherine Hayles, Electronic Literature: New Horizons for the Literary (2008); Matthew G. Kirschenbaum, Track Changes: A Literary History of Word Processing (2016); and Jessica Pressman's Bookishness: Loving Books in a Digital Age (2020).

Anthologies representing a range of recent approaches include Modern Criticism and Theory, ed. David Lodge with Nigel Wood (2nd ed., 2000); Contemporary Literary Criticism, ed. Robert Con Davis and Ronald Schleifer (4th ed., 1998); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism (cited above).

Literary Terminology*

Using simple technical terms can sharpen our understanding and streamline our discussion of literary works. Some terms, such as the ones in section A, below, help us address the internal style, structure, form, and kind of works. Other terms, such as those in section B, provide insight into the material forms in which literary works have been produced.

In analyzing what they called “rhetoric,” ancient Greek and Roman writers determined the elements of what we call “style” and “structure.” Most of our literary terms are derived, via medieval and Renaissance intermediaries, from the Greek and Latin sources. In the definitions that follow, the etymology, or root, of the word is given when it helps illuminate the word’s current usage.

Many of the examples are drawn from texts in The Norton Anthology of English Literature.

Words boldfaced within definitions are themselves defined in this appendix. Some terms are defined within definitions; such words are italicized.

A. Terms of Style, Structure, Form, and Kind

accent (synonym “stress”): a term of rhythm. The special force devoted to the voicing of one syllable in a word over others. In the noun “accent,” for example, the accent, or stress, is on the first syllable.

act: the major subdivision of a play, usually divided into scenes.

aesthetics (from Greek, “to feel, apprehend by the senses”): the philosophy of artistic meaning as a distinct mode of apprehending

untranslatable truth, defined as an alternative to rational enquiry, which is purely abstract. Developed in the late eighteenth century by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant especially.

Alexandrine: a term of meter. In French verse a line of twelve syllables, and, by analogy, in English verse a line of six stresses. See hexameter.

allegory (Greek "saying otherwise"): saying one thing (the "vehicle" of the allegory) and meaning another (the allegory's "tenor"). Allegories may be momentary aspects of a work, as in metaphor ("John is a lion"), or, through extended metaphor, may constitute the basis of narrative, as in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress: this second meaning is the dominant one. See also symbol and type. Allegory is one of the most significant figures of thought.

alliteration (from Latin "litera," alphabetic letter): a figure of speech. The repetition of an initial consonant sound or consonant cluster in consecutive or closely positioned words. This pattern is often an inseparable part of the meter in Germanic languages, where the tonic, or accented syllable, is usually the first syllable. Thus all Old English poetry and some varieties of Middle English poetry use alliteration as part of their basic metrical practice. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 1: "Once the siege and assault of Troy had ceased" (see vol. A, p. 415). Otherwise used for local effects; Stevie Smith, "Pretty," lines 4–5: "And in the pretty pool the pike stalks / He stalks his prey . . ." (see vol. F, p. 589).

allusion: Literary allusion is a passing but illuminating reference within a literary text to another, well-known text (often biblical or classical). Topical allusions are also, of course, common in certain modes, especially satire.

anagnorisis (Greek "recognition"): the moment of protagonist's recognition in a narrative, which is also often the moment of moral understanding.

anapest: a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two unstressed (uu) syllables followed by one stressed (/). Thus, for example, "Illinois."

anaphora (Greek "carrying back"): a figure of speech. The repetition of words or groups of words at the beginning of consecutive sentences, clauses, or phrases. Blake, "London," lines 5–8: "In every cry of every Man, / In every Infant's cry of fear, / In every voice, in every ban . . ." (see vol. D, p. 137); Louise Bennett, "Jamaica Oman," lines 17–20: "Some backa man a push, some side-a / Man a hole him han, / Some a lick sense eena him head, / Some a guide him pon him plan!" (see vol. F, p. 724).

animal fable: a genre. A short narrative of speaking animals, followed by moralizing comment, written in a low style and gathered into a collection. Robert Henryson, "The Cock and the Jasper" (see vol. A, p. 679).

antithesis (Greek "placing against"): a figure of thought. The juxtaposition of opposed terms in clauses or sentences that are next to or near each other. Milton, Paradise Lost 1.777–80: "They but now who seemed / In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons / Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room / Throng numberless" (see vol. B, p. 1448).

apostrophe (from Greek "turning away"): a figure of thought. An address, often to an absent person, a force, or a quality. For example, a poet makes an apostrophe to a Muse when invoking her for inspiration.

apposition: a term of syntax. The repetition of elements serving an identical grammatical function in one sentence. The effect of this repetition is to arrest the flow of the sentence, but in doing so to add extra semantic nuance to repeated elements. This is an especially important feature of Old English poetic style. See, for example, Caedmon's Hymn (vol. A, p. 31), where the phrases

assonance (Latin “sounding to”): a figure of speech. The repetition of identical or near identical stressed vowel sounds in words whose final consonants differ, producing half-rhyme. Tennyson, “The Lady of Shalott,” line 100: “His broad clear brow in sunlight glowed” (see vol. E, p. 210).

aubade (originally from Spanish “alba,” dawn): a genre. A lover’s dawn song or lyric bewailing the arrival of the day and the necessary separation of the lovers; Donne, “The Sun Rising” (see vol. B, p. 888). Larkin recasts the genre in “Aubade” (see vol. F, p. 795).

autobiography (Greek “self-life writing”): a genre. A narrative of a life written by the subject; Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391). There are subgenres, such as the spiritual autobiography, narrating the author’s path to conversion and subsequent spiritual trials, as in Bunyan’s Grace Abounding.

ballad stanza: a verse form. Usually a quatrain in alternating iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter lines, rhyming abcb. See “Sir Patrick Spens” (vol. D, p. 38); Louise Bennett’s poems (vol. F, pp. 719–24); Eliot, “Sweeney among the Nightingales” (vol. F, p. 501); Larkin, “This Be The Verse” (vol. F, p. 795).

ballade: a verse form. A form consisting usually of three stanzas followed by a four-line envoi (French, “send off”). The last line of the first stanza establishes a refrain, which is repeated, or subtly varied, as the last line of each stanza. The form was derived from French medieval poetry; English poets, from the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries especially, used it with varying stanza forms. Chaucer, “The Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse” (see vol. A, p. 575).

bathos (Greek “depth”): a figure of thought. A sudden and sometimes ridiculous descent of tone; Pope, The Rape of the Lock 3.157–58: “Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast, / When husbands, or when lapdogs breathe their last” (see vol. C, p. 549).

beast epic: a genre. A continuous, unmoralized narrative, in prose or verse, relating the victories of the wholly unscrupulous but brilliant strategist Reynard the Fox over all adversaries. Chaucer arouses, only to deflate, expectations of the genre in The Nun’s Priest’s Tale (see vol. A, p. 556).

biography (Greek “life-writing”): a genre. A life as the subject of an extended narrative.

blank verse: a verse form. Unrhymed iambic pentameter lines. Blank verse has no stanzas, but is broken up into uneven units (verse paragraphs) determined by sense rather than form. First devised in English by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, in his translation of two books of Virgil’s Aeneid, this very flexible verse type became the standard form for dramatic poetry in the seventeenth century, as in most of Shakespeare’s plays. Milton and Wordsworth, among many others, also used it to create an English equivalent to classical epic.

blazon: strictly, a heraldic shield; in rhetorical usage, a topos whereby the individual elements of a beloved’s face and body are singled out for hyperbolic admiration. Spenser, Epithalamion, lines 167–84 (see vol. B, p. 459). For an inversion of the topos, see Shakespeare, Sonnet 130 (vol. B, p. 637).

burlesque (French and Italian “mocking”): a work that adopts the conventions of a genre with the aim less of comically mocking the genre than of satirically mocking the society so represented (see satire). Thus Pope’s Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537) does not mock classical epic so much as contemporary mores.

caesura (Latin "cut") (plural "caesurae"): a term of meter. A pause or breathing space within a line of verse, generally occurring between syntactic units; Louise Bennett, "Colonization in Reverse," lines 5–8: "By de hundred, by de tousan, / From country an from town, / By de ship-load, by de plane-load, / Jamaica is Englan boun" (see vol. F, p. 722), where the caesurae occur in lines 5 and 7.

canon (Greek "rule"): the group of texts regarded as worthy of special respect or attention by a given institution. Also, the group of texts regarded as definitely having been written by a certain author.

catastrophe (Greek "overturning"): the decisive turn in tragedy by which the plot is resolved and, usually, the protagonist dies.

catharsis (Greek "cleansing"): According to Aristotle, the effect of tragedy on its audience, through their experience of pity and terror, was a kind of spiritual cleansing, or catharsis.

character (Greek "stamp, impression"): a person, personified animal, or other figure represented in a literary work, especially in narrative and drama. The more a character seems to generate the action of a narrative, and the less he or she seems merely to serve a preordained narrative pattern, the "fuller," or more "rounded," a character is said to be. A "stock" character, common particularly in many comic genres, will perform a predictable function in different works of a given genre.

chiasmus (Greek "crosswise"): a figure of speech. The inversion of an already established sequence. This can involve verbal echoes: Pope, "Eloisa to Abelard," line 104, "The crime was common, common be the pain" (see vol. C, p. 560); or it can be purely a matter of syntactic inversion: Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, line 8: "They pierce my thickets, through my grot they glide" (see vol. C, p. 575).

classical, classicism, classic: Each term can be widely applied, but in English literary discourse, "classical" primarily describes the works of either Greek or Roman antiquity. "Classicism" denotes the practice of art forms inspired by classical antiquity, in particular the observance of rhetorical norms of decorum and balance, as opposed to following the dictates of untutored inspiration, as in Romanticism. "Classic" denotes an especially famous work within a given canon.

climax (Greek "ladder"): a moment of great intensity and structural change, especially in drama. Also a figure of speech whereby a sequence of verbally linked clauses is made, in which each successive clause is of greater consequence than its predecessor. Bacon, Of Studies: "Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments, and for abilities. Their chief use for pastimes is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in judgement" (see vol. B, pp. 1167–68).

comedy: a genre. A term primarily applied to drama, and derived from ancient drama, in opposition to tragedy. Comedy deals with humorously confusing, sometimes ridiculous situations in which the ending is, nevertheless, happy. A comedy often ends in one or more marriages.

comic mode: Many genres (for example, romance, fabliau, comedy) involve a happy ending in which justice is done, the ravages of time are arrested, and that which is lost is found. Such genres participate in a comic mode.

connotation: To understand connotation, we need to understand denotation. While many words can denote the same concept—that is, have the same basic meaning—those words can evoke different associations, or connotations. Contrast, for example, the clinical-sounding term "depression" and the more colorful, musical, even poetic phrase "the blues."

consonance (Latin "sounding with"): a figure of speech. The repetition of final consonants in words or stressed syllables whose

convention: a repeatedly recurring feature (in either form or content) of works, occurring in combination with other recurring formal features, which constitutes a convention of a particular genre.

couplet: a verse form. In English verse two consecutive, rhyming lines usually containing the same number of stresses. Chaucer first introduced the iambic pentameter couplet into English (Canterbury Tales); the form was later used in many types of writing, including drama; imitations and translations of classical epic (thus heroic couplet); essays; and satire (see Dryden and Pope). The distich (Greek "two lines") is a couplet usually making complete sense; Aemilia Lanyer, Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, lines 5–6: "Read it fair queen, though it defective be, / Your excellence can grace both it and me" (see vol. B, p. 925).

dactyl (Greek "finger," because of the finger's three joints): a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of one stressed followed by two unstressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Oregon."

decorum (Latin "that which is fitting"): a rhetorical principle whereby each formal aspect of a work should be in keeping with its subject matter and/or audience.

deixis (Greek "pointing"): relevant to point of view. Every work has, implicitly or explicitly, a "here" and a "now" from which it is narrated. Words that refer to or imply this point from which the voice of the work is projected (such as "here," "there," "this," "that," "now," "then") are examples of deixis, or "deictics." This technique is especially important in drama, where it is used to create a sense of the events happening as the spectator witnesses them.

denotation: A word has a basic, "prosaic" (factual) meaning prior to the associations it connotes (see connotation). The word

denouement (French “unknotting”): the point at which a narrative can be resolved and so ended.

dialogue (Greek “conversation”): a genre. Dialogue is a feature of many genres, especially in both the novel and drama. As a genre itself, dialogue is used in philosophical traditions especially (most famously in Plato’s Dialogues), as the representation of a conversation in which a philosophical question is pursued among various speakers.

diction, or “lexis” (from, respectively, Latin dictio and Greek lexis, each meaning “word”): the actual words used in any utterance—speech, writing, and, for our purposes here, literary works. The choice of words contributes significantly to the style of a given work.

didactic mode (Greek “teaching mode”): Genres in a didactic mode are designed to instruct or teach, sometimes explicitly (for example, sermons, philosophical discourses, georgic), and sometimes through the medium of fiction (for example, animal fable, parable).

diegesis (Greek for “narration”): a term that simply means “narration,” but is used in literary criticism to distinguish one kind of story from another. In a mimetic story, the events are played out before us (see mimesis), whereas in diegesis someone recounts the story to us. Drama is for the most part mimetic, whereas the novel is for the most part diegetic. In novels the narrator is not, usually, part of the action of the narrative; s/he is therefore extradiegetic.

dimeter (Greek “two measure”): a term of meter. A two-stress line, rarely used as the meter of whole poems, though used with great frequency in single poems by Skelton, for example, “The Tunning of Elinour Rumming” (see vol. B, p. 41). Otherwise used for single lines, as in Herbert, "Discipline," line 3: "O my God" (see vol. B, p. 1197).

discourse (Latin "running to and fro"): broadly, any nonfictional speech or writing; as a more specific genre, a philosophical meditation on a set theme.

dramatic irony: a feature of narrative and drama, whereby the audience knows that the outcome of an action will be the opposite of that intended by a character.

dramatic monologue (Greek "single speaking"): a genre. A poem in which the voice of a historical or fictional character speaks, unmediated by any narrator, to an implied though silent audience. See Tennyson, "Ulysses" (vol. E, p. 217); Browning, "The Bishop Orders His Tomb" (vol. E, p. 416); Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (vol. F, p. 498); Carol Ann Duffy, "Medusa" and "Mrs Lazarus" (vol. F, pp. 1158–60).

ecphrasis (Greek "speaking out"): a topos whereby a work of visual art is represented in a literary work. Auden, "Musée des Beaux Arts" (see vol. F, p. 677).

elegy: a genre. In classical literature elegy was a form written in elegiac couplets (a hexameter followed by a pentameter) devoted to many possible topics. In Ovidian elegy a lover meditates on the trials of erotic desire (for example, Ovid's Amores). The sonnet sequences of both Sidney and Shakespeare exploit this genre, and, while it was still practiced in classical tradition by Donne ("On His Mistress" see vol. B, [p. 903]), by the later seventeenth century the term came to denote the poetry of loss, especially through the death of a loved person. See Tennyson, In Memoriam (vol. E, p. 231); Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats" (see vol. F, p. 677); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. F, p. 970).

end-stopping: the placement of a complete syntactic unit within a complete poetic line, fulfilling the metrical pattern; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," line 42: "Earth, receive an honoured guest" (see vol. F, p. 679). Compare enjambment.

enjambment (French "striding," encroaching): The opposite of end-stopping, enjambment occurs when the syntactic unit does not end with the end of the poetic line and the fulfillment of the metrical pattern. When the sense of the line overflows its meter and, therefore, the line break, we have enjambment; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," lines 44–45: "Let the Irish vessel lie / Emptied of its poetry" (see vol. F, p. 679).

epic (synonym, heroic poetry): a genre. An extended narrative poem celebrating martial heroes, invoking divine inspiration, beginning in medias res (see order), written in a high style (including the deployment of epic similes; on high style, see register), and divided into long narrative sequences. Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid were the prime models for English writers of epic verse. Thus Milton, Paradise Lost (see vol. B, p. 1427); Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391); and Walcott, Omeros (see vol. F, p. 808). With its precise repertoire of stylistic resources, epic lent itself easily to parodic and burlesque forms, known as mock epic; thus Pope, The Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537).

epigram: a genre. A short, pithy poem wittily expressed, often with wounding intent. See Jonson, Epigrams (see vol. B, p. 1049).

epigraph (Greek "inscription"): a genre. Any formal statement inscribed on stone; also the brief formulation on a book's title page, or a quotation at the beginning of a poem, introducing the work's themes in the most compressed form possible.

epistle (Latin "letter"): a genre. The letter can be shaped as a literary form, involving an intimate address often between equals.

The Epistles of Horace provided a model for English writers from the sixteenth century. Thus Wyatt, "Mine Own John Poins" (see vol. B, p. 131), or Leapor, "An Epistle to a Lady" (vol. C, p. 771). Letters can be shaped to form the matter of an extended fiction, as the eighteenth-century epistolary novel (for example, Samuel Richardson's Pamela).

epitaph: a genre. A pithy formulation to be inscribed on a funeral monument. Thus Raleigh, "The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself" (see vol. B, p. 479).

epithalamion (Greek "concerning the bridal chamber"): a genre. A wedding poem, celebrating the marriage and wishing the couple good fortune. Thus Spenser, Epithalamion (see vol. B, p. 455).

epyllion (plural "epyllia") (Greek: "little epic"): a genre. A relatively short poem in the meter of epic poetry. See, for example, Marlowe, Hero and Leander (vol. B, p. 562).

essay (French "trial, attempt"): a genre. An informal philosophical meditation, usually in prose and sometimes in verse. The journalistic periodical essay was developed in the early eighteenth century. Thus Addison and Steele, periodical essays (see vol. C, p. 281); Pope, An Essay on Criticism (see vol. C, p. 521).

euphemism (Greek "sweet saying"): a figure of thought. The figure by which something distasteful is described in alternative, less repugnant terms (for example, "he passed away").

exegesis (Greek "leading out"): interpretation, traditionally of the biblical text, but, by transference, of any text.

exemplum (Latin "example"): an example inserted into a usually nonfictional writing (for example, sermon or essay) to give extra force to an abstract thesis.

fabliau (French “little story,” plural fabliaux): a genre. A short, funny, often bawdy narrative in low style (see register) imitated and developed from French models, most subtly by Chaucer; see The Miller’s Prologue and Tale (vol. A, p. 494).

farce (French “stuffing”): a genre. A play designed to provoke laughter through the often humiliating antics of stock characters. Congreve’s The Way of the World (see vol. C, p. 221) draws on this tradition.

figures of speech: Literary language often employs patterns perceptible to the eye and/or to the ear. Such patterns are called “figures of speech”; in classical rhetoric they were called “schemes” (from Greek schema, meaning “form, figure”).

figures of thought: Language can also be patterned conceptually, even outside the rules that normally govern it. Literary language in particular exploits this licensed linguistic irregularity. Synonyms for figures of thought are “trope” (Greek “twisting,” referring to the irregularity of use) and “conceit” (Latin “concept,” referring to the fact that these figures are perceptible only to the mind). Be careful not to confuse trope with topos (a common error).

first-person narration: relevant to point of view, a narrative in which the voice narrating refers to itself with forms of the first-person pronoun (“I,” “me,” “my,” etc., or possibly “we,” “us,” “our”), and in which the narrative is determined by the limitations of that voice. Thus Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein.

frame narrative: Some narratives, particularly collections of narratives, involve a frame narrative that explains the genesis of, and/or gives a perspective on, the main narrative or narratives to follow. Thus Chaucer, Canterbury Tales; Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein; or Conrad, Heart of Darkness.

free indirect style: relevant to point of view, a narratorial voice that manages, without explicit reference, to imply, and often implicitly to comment on, the voice of a character in the narrative itself. Virginia Woolf, "A Sketch of the Past," where the voice, although strictly that of the adult narrator, manages to convey the child's manner of perception: "—I begin: the first memory. This was of red and purple flowers on a black background—my mother's dress."

genre and mode: The style, structure, and, often, length of a work, when coupled with a certain subject matter, raise expectations that a literary work conforms to a certain genre (French "kind"). Good writers might upset these expectations, but they remain aware of the expectations and thwart them purposefully. Works in different genres may nevertheless participate in the same mode, a broader category designating the fundamental perspectives governing various genres of writing. For mode, see tragic, comic, satiric, and didactic modes. Genres are fluid, sometimes very fluid (for example, the novel); the word "usually" should be added to almost every account of the characteristics of a given genre!

georgic (Greek "farming"): a genre. Virgil's Georgics treat agricultural and occasionally scientific subjects, giving instructions on the proper management of farms. Unlike pastoral, which treats the countryside as a place of recreational idleness among shepherds, the georgic treats it as a place of productive labor.

hermeneutics (from the Greek god Hermes, messenger between the gods and humankind): the science of interpretation, first formulated as such by the German philosophical theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher in the early nineteenth century.

hexameter (Greek "six measure"): a term of meter. The hexameter line (a six-stress line) is the meter of classical Latin epic; while not imitated in that form for epic verse in English, some instances of the hexameter exist. See, for example, the last line of a homily (Greek "discourse"): a genre. A sermon, to be preached in church; Book of Homilies (see vol. B, p. 164). Writers of literary fiction sometimes exploit the homily, or sermon, as in Chaucer, The Pardoner's Tale (see vol. A, p. 540).

Spenserian stanza, Faerie Queene 1.1.2: "O help thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong" (vol. B, p. 269), or Yeats, "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," line 1: "I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree" (vol. F, p. 221).

homophone (Greek "same sound"): a figure of speech. A word that sounds identical to another word but has a different meaning ("bear" / "bare").

hyperbaton (Greek "overstepping"): a term of syntax. The rearrangement, or inversion, of the expected word order in a sentence or clause. Gray, "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," line 38: "If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise" (vol. C, p. 899). Poets can suspend the expected syntax over many lines, as in the first sentences of the Canterbury Tales (vol. A, p. 474) and of Paradise Lost (vol. B, p. 1430).

hyperbole (Greek "throwing over"): a figure of thought. Overstatement, exaggeration; Marvell, "To His Coy Mistress," lines 11–12: "My vegetable love should grow / Vaster than empires, and more slow" (see vol. B, p. 1273); Auden, "As I Walked Out One Evening," lines 9–12: "I'll love you, dear, I'll love you / Till China and Africa meet / And the river jumps over the mountain / And the salmon sing in the street" (see vol. F, p. 675).

hypermetrical (adj.; Greek "over measured"): a term of meter; the word describes a breaking of the expected metrical pattern by at least one extra syllable.

hypotaxis, or subordination (respectively Greek and Latin "ordering under"): a term of syntax. The subordination, by the use of subordinate clauses, of different elements of a sentence to a single main verb. Milton, Paradise Lost 9.513–15: “As when a ship by skillful steersman wrought / Nigh river’s mouth or foreland, where the wind / Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail; So varied he” (vol. B, p. 1588). The contrary principle to parataxis.

iamb: a term of rhythm. The basic foot of English verse; two syllables following the rhythmic pattern of unstressed followed by stressed and producing a rising effect. Thus, for example, “Vermont.”

imitation: the practice whereby writers strive ideally to reproduce and yet renew the conventions of an older form, often derived from classical civilization. Such a practice will be praised in periods of classicism (for example, the eighteenth century) and repudiated in periods dominated by a model of inspiration (for example, Romanticism).

irony (Greek “dissimulation”): a figure of thought. In broad usage, irony designates the result of inconsistency between a statement and a context that undermines the statement. “It’s a beautiful day” is unironic if it’s a beautiful day; if, however, the weather is terrible, then the inconsistency between statement and context is ironic. The effect is often amusing; the need to be ironic is sometimes produced by censorship of one kind or another. Strictly, irony is a subset of allegory: whereas allegory says one thing and means another, irony says one thing and means its opposite. For an extended example of irony, see Swift’s “Modest Proposal” (vol. C, p. 511). See also dramatic irony.

journal (French “daily”): a genre. A diary, or daily record of ephemeral experience, whose perspectives are concentrated on, and limited by, the experiences of single days. Thus Pepys, Diary (see vol. C, p. 74).

lai: a genre. A short narrative, often characterized by images of great intensity; a French term, and a form practiced by Marie de France (see vol. A, p. 159).

legend (Latin “requiring to be read”): a genre. A narrative of a celebrated, possibly historical, but mortal protagonist. To be distinguished from myth. Thus the “Arthurian legend” but the “myth of Proserpine.”

lexical set: Words that habitually recur together (for example, January, February, March, etc.; or red, white, and blue) form a lexical set.

litotes (from Greek “smooth”): a figure of thought. Strictly, understatement by denying the contrary; More, Utopia: “differences of no slight import” (see vol. B, p. 49). More loosely, understatement; Stevie Smith, “Sunt Leones,” lines 11–12: “And if the Christians felt a little blue— / Well people being eaten often do” (see vol. F, p. 585).

lullaby: a genre. A bedtime, sleep-inducing song for children, in simple and regular meter. Adapted by Auden, “Lullaby” (see vol. F, p. 671).

lyric (from Greek “lyre”): Initially meaning a song, “lyric” refers to a short poetic form, without restriction of meter, in which the expression of personal emotion, often by a voice in the first person, is given primacy over narrative sequence. Thus “The Wife’s Lament” (see vol. A, p. 126); Yeats, “The Wild Swans at Coole” (see vol. F, p. 229).

masque: a genre. Costly entertainments of the Stuart court, involving dance, song, speech, and elaborate stage effects, in which courtiers themselves participated.

metaphor (Greek “carrying across,” etymologically parallel to Latin “translation”): One of the most significant figures of thought, metaphor designates identification or implicit identification of one thing with another with which it is not literally identifiable. Blake, “London,” lines 11–12: “And the hapless Soldier’s sigh / Runs in blood down Palace walls” (see vol. D, p. 137).

meter: Verse (from Latin versus, turned) is distinguished from prose (from Latin prorsus, "straightforward") as a more compressed form of expression, shaped by metrical norms. Meter (Greek "measure") refers to the regularly recurring sound pattern of verse lines. The means of producing sound patterns across lines differ in different poetic traditions. Verse may be quantitative, or determined by the quantities of syllables (set patterns of long and short syllables), as in Latin and Greek poetry. It may be syllabic, determined by fixed numbers of syllables in the line, as in the verse of Romance languages (for example, French and Italian). It may be accentual, determined by the number of accents, or stresses in the line, with variable numbers of syllables, as in Old English and some varieties of Middle English alliterative verse. Or it may be accentual-syllabic, determined by the numbers of accents, but possessing a regular pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables, so as to produce regular numbers of syllables per line. Since Chaucer, English verse has worked primarily within the many possibilities of accentual-syllabic meter. The unit of meter is the foot. In English verse the number of feet per line corresponds to the number of accents in a line. For the types and examples of different meters, see monometer, dimeter, trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter. In the definitions below, "u" designates one unstressed syllable, and "/" one stressed syllable.

metonymy (Greek "change of name"): one of the most significant figures of thought. Using a word to denote another concept or other concepts, by virtue of habitual association. Thus "The Press," designating printed news media. Fictional names often work by associations of this kind. Closely related to synecdoche.

mimesis (Greek for "imitation"): A central function of literature and drama has been to provide a plausible imitation of the reality of the world beyond the literary work; mimesis is the representation and imitation of what is taken to be reality.

mise-en-abyme (French for “cast into the abyss”): Some works of art represent themselves in themselves; if they do so effectively, the represented artifact also represents itself, and so ad infinitum. The effect achieved is called “mise-en-abyme.” Hoccleve’s Complaint, for example, represents a depressed man reading about a depressed man. This sequence threatens to become a mise-en-abyme.

monometer (Greek “one measure”): a term of meter. An entire line with just one stress; Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 15, “most (u) grand (/)” (see vol. A, p. 415).

myth: a genre. The narrative of protagonists with, or subject to, superhuman powers. A myth expresses some profound foundational truth, often by accounting for the origin of natural phenomena. To be distinguished from legend. Thus the “Arthurian legend” but the “myth of Proserpine.”

novel: an extremely flexible genre in both form and subject matter. Usually in prose, giving high priority to narration of events, with a certain expectation of length, novels are preponderantly rooted in a specific, and often complex, social world; sensitive to the realities of material life; and often focused on one character or a small circle of central characters. By contrast with chivalric romance (the main European narrative genre prior to the novel), novels tend to eschew the marvelous in favor of a recognizable social world and credible action. The novel’s openness allows it to participate in all modes, and to be co-opted for a huge variety of subgenres. In English literature the novel dates from the late seventeenth century and has been astonishingly successful in appealing to a huge readership, particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The English and Irish tradition of the novel includes, for example, Fielding, Austen, the Brontë sisters, Dickens, George Eliot, Conrad, Woolf, Lawrence, and Joyce, to name but a few very great exponents of the genre.

novella: a genre. A short novel, often characterized by imagistic intensity. Conrad, Heart of Darkness (see vol. F, p. 70).

occupatio (Latin “taking possession”): a figure of thought. Denying that one will discuss a subject while actually discussing it; also known as “praeteritio” (Latin “passing by”). See Chaucer, Nun’s Priest’s Tale, lines 414–31 (see vol. A, p. 565).

ode (Greek “song”): a genre. A lyric poem in elevated, or high style (see register), often addressed to a natural force, a person, or an abstract quality. The Pindaric ode in English is made up of stanzas of unequal length, while the Horatian ode has stanzas of equal length. For examples of both types, see, respectively, Wordsworth, “Ode: Intimations of Immortality” (vol. D, p. 381); and Marvell, “An Horatian Ode” (vol. B, p. 1282), or Keats, “Ode on Melancholy” (vol. D, p. 973). For a fuller discussion, see the headnote to Jonson’s “Ode on Cary and Morison” (vol. B, p. 1058).

omniscient narrator (Latin “all-knowing narrator”): relevant to point of view. A narrator who, in the fiction of the narrative, has complete access to both the deeds and the thoughts of all characters in the narrative. Thus Thomas Hardy, “On the Western Circuit” (see vol. F, p. 36).

onomatopoeia (Greek “name making”): a figure of speech. Verbal sounds that imitate and evoke the sounds they denote. Hopkins, “Binsey Poplars,” lines 10–12 (about some felled trees): “O if we but knew what we do / When we delve [dig] or hew— / Hack and rack the growing green!” (see vol. E, p. 726).

order: A story may be told in different narrative orders. A narrator might use the sequence of events as they happened, and thereby follow what classical rhetoricians called the natural order; alternatively, the narrator might reorder the sequence of events, beginning the narration either in the middle or at the end of the sequence of events, thereby following an artificial order. If a narrator begins in the middle of events, he or she is said to begin in medias res (Latin "in the middle of the matter"). For a brief discussion of these concepts, see Spenser, Faerie Queene, "A Letter of the Authors" (vol. B, p. 265). Modern narratology makes a related distinction, between histoire (French "story") for the natural order that readers mentally reconstruct, and discours (French, here "narration") for the narrative as presented. See also plot and story.

ottava rima: a verse form. An eight-line stanza form, rhyming abababcc, using iambic pentameter; Yeats, "Sailing to Byzantium" (see vol. F, p. 234). Derived from the Italian poet Boccaccio, an eight-line stanza was used by fifteenth-century English poets for inset passages (for example, Christ's speech from the Cross in Lydgate's Testament, lines 754–897). The form in this rhyme scheme was used in English poetry for long narrative by, for example, Byron (Don Juan; see vol. D, p. 690).

oxymoron (Greek "sharp blunt"): a figure of thought. The conjunction of normally incompatible terms; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.63: "darkness visible" (see vol. B, p. 1431).

panegyric: a genre. Demonstrative, or epideictic (Greek "showing"), rhetoric was a branch of classical rhetoric. Its own two main branches were the rhetoric of praise on the one hand and of vituperation on the other. Panegyric, or eulogy (Greek "sweet speaking"), or encomium (plural encomia), is the term used to describe the speeches or writings of praise.

parable: a genre. A simple story designed to provoke, and often accompanied by, allegorical interpretation, most famously by Christ as reported in the Gospels.

paradox (Greek "contrary to received opinion"): a figure of thought. An apparent contradiction that requires thought to reveal an inner consistency. Chaucer, "Troilus's Song," line 12: "O sweete harm so quainte" (see vol. A, p. 574).

parataxis, or coordination (respectively Greek and Latin “ordering beside”): a term of syntax. The coordination, by the use of coordinating conjunctions, of different main clauses in a single sentence. Malory, Morte Darthur: “So Sir Lancelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantel, that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy” (see vol. A, p. 607). The opposite principle to hypotaxis.

parody: a work that uses the conventions of a particular genre with the aim of comically mocking a topos, a genre, or a particular exponent of a genre. Shakespeare parodies the topos of blazon in Sonnet 130 (see vol. B, p. 637).

pastoral (from Latin pastor, “shepherd”): a genre. Pastoral is set among shepherds, making often refined allusion to other apparently unconnected subjects (sometimes politics) from the potentially idyllic world of highly literary if illiterate shepherds. Pastoral is distinguished from georgic by representing recreational rural idleness, whereas the georgic offers instruction on how to manage rural labor. English writers had classical models in the Idylls of Theocritus in Greek and Virgil’s Eclogues in Latin. Pastoral is also called bucolic (from the Greek word for “herdsman”). Thus Spenser, Shepheardes Calender (see vol. B, p. 257).

pathetic fallacy: the attribution of sentiment to natural phenomena, as if they were in sympathy with human feelings. Thus Milton, Lycidas, lines 146–47: “With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head, / And every flower that sad embroidery wears” (see vol. B, p. 1406). For critique of the practice, see Ruskin (who coined the term), “Of the Pathetic Fallacy” (vol. E, p. 467).

pentameter (Greek “five measure”): a term of meter. In English verse, a five-stress line. Between the late fourteenth and the nineteenth centuries, this meter, frequently employing an iambic rhythm, was the basic line of English verse. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, and Wordsworth each, for example, deployed this very flexible line as their primary resource; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.128: "O Prince, O Chief of many thronèd Powers" (see vol. B, p. 1433).

performative: Verbal expressions have many different functions. They can, for example, be descriptive, or constative (if they make an argument), or performative, for example. A performative utterance is one that makes something happen in the world by virtue of its utterance. "I hereby sentence you to ten years in prison," if uttered in the appropriate circumstances, itself performs an action; it makes something happen in the world. By virtue of its performing an action, it is called a "performative." See also speech act.

peripeteia (Greek "turning about"): the sudden reversal of fortune (in both directions) in a dramatic work.

periphrasis (Greek "declaring around"): a figure of thought. Circumlocution; the use of many words to express what could be expressed in few or one; Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 39.1–4.

persona (Latin "sound through"): originally the mask worn in the Roman theater to magnify an actor's voice; in literary discourse persona (plural personae) refers to the narrator or speaker of a text, whose voice is coherent and whose person need have no relation to the person of the actual author of a text. Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (see vol. F, p. 498).

personification, or prosopopoeia (Greek "person making"): a figure of thought. The attribution of human qualities to nonhuman forces or objects; Keats, "Ode on a Grecian Urn," lines 1–2: "Thou still unvanish'd bride of quietness, / Thou foster-child of silence and slow time" (see vol. D, p. 971).

plot: the sequence of events in a story as narrated, as distinct from story, which refers to the sequence of events as we reconstruct them from the plot. See also order.

point of view: All of the many kinds of writing involve a point of view from which a text is, or seems to be, generated. The presence of such a point of view may be powerful and explicit, as in many novels, or deliberately invisible, as in much drama. In some genres, such as the novel, the narrator does not necessarily tell the story from a position we can predict; that is, the needs of a particular story, not the conventions of the genre, determine the narrator's position. In other genres, the narrator's position is fixed by convention; in certain kinds of love poetry, for example, the narrating voice is always that of a suffering lover. Not only does the point of view significantly inform the style of a work, but it also informs the structure of that work.

protagonist (Greek "first actor"): the hero or heroine of a drama or narrative.

pun: a figure of thought. A sometimes irresolvable doubleness of meaning in a single word or expression; Shakespeare, Sonnet 135, line 1: "Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will" (see vol. B, p. 637).

quatrain: a verse form. A stanza of four lines, usually rhyming abcb, abab, or abba. Of many possible examples, see Crashaw, "On the Wounds of Our Crucified Lord" (see vol. B, p. 1214).

refrain: usually a single line repeated as the last line of consecutive stanzas, sometimes with subtly different wording and ideally with subtly different meaning as the poem progresses.

register: The register of a word is its stylistic level, which can be distinguished by degree of technicality but also by degree of formality. We choose our words from different registers according to context, that is, audience and/or environment. Thus a chemist in a laboratory will say "sodium chloride," a cook in a kitchen "salt." A formal register designates the kind of language used in polite society (for example, "Mr. President"), while an informal or colloquial

rhetoric: the art of verbal persuasion. Classical rhetoricians distinguished three areas of rhetoric: the forensic, to be used in law courts; the deliberative, to be used in political or philosophical deliberations; and the demonstrative, or epideictic, to be used for the purposes of public praise or blame. Rhetorical manuals covered all the skills required of a speaker, from the management of style and structure to delivery. These manuals powerfully influenced the theory of poetics as a separate branch of verbal practice, particularly in the matter of style.

rhyme: a figure of speech. The repetition of identical vowel sounds in stressed syllables whose initial consonants differ (“dead” / “head”). In poetry, rhyme often links the end of one line with another. Masculine rhyme: full rhyme on the final syllable of the line (“decays” / “days”). Feminine rhyme: full rhyme on syllables that are followed by unaccented syllables (“fountains” / “mountains”). Internal rhyme: full rhyme within a single line; Coleridge, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, line 7: “The guests are met, the feast is set” (see vol. D, p. 475). Rhyme riche: rhyming on homophones; Chaucer, General Prologue, lines 17–18: “seeke” / “seke.” Off rhyme (also known as half rhyme, near rhyme, or slant rhyme): differs from perfect rhyme in changing the vowel sound and/or the concluding consonants expected of perfect rhyme; Byron, “They say that Hope is Happiness,” lines 5–7: “most” / “lost.” Pararhyme: stressed vowel sounds differ but are flanked by identical or similar consonants; Owen, “Miners,” lines 9–11: “simmer” / “summer” (see vol. F, p. 169).

rhyme royal: a verse form. A stanza of seven iambic pentameter lines, rhyming ababbcc; first introduced by Chaucer

rhythm: Rhythm is not absolutely distinguishable from meter. One way of making a clear distinction between these terms is to say that rhythm (from the Greek “to flow”) denotes the patterns of sound within the feet of verse lines and the combination of those feet. Very often a particular meter will raise expectations that a given rhythm will be used regularly through a whole line or a whole poem. Thus in English verse the pentameter regularly uses an iambic rhythm. Rhythm, however, is much more fluid than meter, and many lines within the same poem using a single meter will frequently exploit different rhythmic possibilities. For examples of different rhythms, see iamb, trochee, anapest, spondee, and dactyl.

romance: a genre. From the twelfth to the sixteenth century, the main form of European narrative, in either verse or prose, was that of chivalric romance. Romance, like the later novel, is a very fluid genre, but romances are often characterized by (i) a tripartite structure of social integration, followed by disintegration, involving moral tests and often marvelous events, itself the prelude to reintegration in a happy ending, frequently of marriage; and (ii) aristocratic social milieux. Thus Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (see vol. A, p. 415); Spenser’s (unfinished) Faerie Queene (vol. B, p. 263). The immensely popular, fertile genre was absorbed, in both domesticated and undomesticated form, by the novel. For an adaptation of romance, see Chaucer, Wife of Bath’s Tale (vol. A, p. 512).

sarcasm (Greek “flesh tearing”): a figure of thought. A wounding expression, often expressed ironically; Boswell, Life of Johnson: Johnson [asked if any man of the modern age could have written the epic poem Fingal] replied, “Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children” (see vol. C, p. 891).

satire (Latin for “a bowl of mixed fruits”): a genre. In Roman literature (for example, Juvenal), the communication, in the form of a letter between equals, complaining of the ills of contemporary society. The genre in this form is characterized by a first-person narrator exasperated by social ills; the letter form; a high frequency of contemporary reference; and the use of invective in low-style language. Pope practices the genre thus in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (see vol. C, p. 573). Wyatt’s “Mine Own John Pains” (see vol. B, p. 131) draws ultimately on a gentler, Horatian model of the genre.

satiric mode: Works in a very large variety of genres are devoted to the more or less savage attack on social ills. Thus Swift’s travel narrative Gulliver’s Travels (see vol. C, p. 377), his essay “A Modest Proposal” (vol. C, p. 511), and Gay’s Beggar’s Opera (vol. C, p. 587), to look no further than the eighteenth century, are all within a satiric mode.

scene: a subdivision of an act, itself a subdivision of a dramatic performance and/or text. The action of a scene usually occurs in one place.

sensibility (from Latin, “capable of being perceived by the senses”): as a literary term, an eighteenth-century concept derived from moral philosophy that stressed the social importance of fellow feeling and particularly of sympathy in social relations. The concept generated a literature of “sensibility,” such as the sentimental novel (the most famous of which was Goethe’s Sorrows of the Young Werther [1774]), or sentimental poetry, such as Cowper’s passage on the stricken deer in The Task (see vol. C, p. 1076).

short story: a genre. Generically similar to, though shorter and more concentrated than, the novel; often published as part of a collection. Thus Mansfield, “The Daughters of the Late Colonel” (see vol. F, p. 542).

simile (Latin “like”): a figure of thought. Comparison, usually using the word “like” or “as,” of one thing with another so as to produce sometimes surprising analogies. Donne, “The Storm,” lines 29–30: “Sooner than you read this line did the gale, / Like shot, not feared till felt, our sails assail.” Frequently used, in extended form, in epic poetry; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.338–46 (see vol. B, p. 1438).

soliloquy (Latin “single speaking”): a topos of drama, in which a character, alone or thinking to be alone on stage, speaks so as to give the audience access to his or her private thoughts.

sonnet: a verse form. A form combining a variable number of units of rhymed lines to produce a fourteen-line poem, usually in rhyming iambic pentameter lines. In English there are two principal varieties: the Petrarchan sonnet, formed by an octave (an eight-line stanza, often broken into two quatrains having the same rhyme scheme, typically abba abba) and a sestet (a six-line stanza, typically cdecde or cdcdcd); and the Shakespearean sonnet, formed by three quatrains (abab cdcd efef) and a couplet (gg). The declaration of a sonnet can take a sharp turn, or “volta,” often at the decisive formal shift from octave to sestet in the Petrarchan sonnet, or in the final couplet of a Shakespearean sonnet, introducing a trenchant counterstatement. Derived from Italian poetry, and especially from the poetry of Petrarch, the sonnet was first introduced to English poetry by Wyatt, and initially used principally for the expression of unrequited erotic love, though later poets used the form for many other purposes. See Wyatt, “Whoso List to Hunt” (vol. B, p. 123); Sidney, Astrophil and Stella (vol. B, p. 541); Shakespeare, Sonnets (vol. B, p. 624); Wordsworth, “London, 1802” (vol. D, p. 390); McKay, “If We Must Die” (vol. F, p. 576); Heaney, “Clearances” (vol. F, p. 970).

speech act: Words and deeds are often distinguished, but words are often (perhaps always) themselves deeds. Utterances can perform different speech acts, such as promising, declaring, casting a spell, encouraging, persuading, denying, lying, and so on. See also performative.

Spenserian stanza: a verse form. The stanza developed by Spenser for The Faerie Queene; nine iambic lines, the first eight of which are pentameters, followed by one hexameter, rhyming ababbcbcc. See also, for example, Shelley, Adonais (vol. D, p. 851), and Keats, The Eve of St. Agnes (vol. D, p. 953).

spondee: a term of meter. A two-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two stressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Utah."

stanza (Italian "room"): groupings of two or more lines, though "stanza" is usually reserved for groupings of at least four lines. Stanzas are often joined by rhyme, often in sequence, where each group shares the same metrical pattern and, when rhymed, rhyme scheme. Stanzas can themselves be arranged into larger groupings. Poets often invent new verse forms, or they may work within established forms.

story: a narrative's sequence of events, which we reconstruct from those events as they have been recounted by the narrator (i.e., the plot). See also order.

stream of consciousness: usually a first-person narrative that seems to give the reader access to the narrator's mind as it perceives or reflects on events, prior to organizing those perceptions into a coherent narrative. Thus (though generated from a third-person narrative) Joyce, Ulysses, "Penelope" (see vol. F, p. 452).

style (from Latin for "writing instrument"): In literary works the manner in which something is expressed contributes substantially to its meaning. The expressions "sun," "mass of helium at the center of the solar system," "heaven's golden orb" all designate "sun," but do so in different manners, or styles, which produce different meanings. The manner of a literary work is its "style," the effect of which is its sublime: As a concept generating a literary movement, the sublime refers to the realm of experience beyond the measurable, and so beyond the rational, produced especially by the terrors and grandeur of natural phenomena. Derived especially from the first-century Greek treatise On the Sublime, sometimes attributed to Longinus, the notion of the sublime was in the later eighteenth century a spur to Romanticism.

syllable: the smallest unit of sound in a pronounced word. The syllable that receives the greatest stress is called the tonic syllable.

symbol (Greek “token”): a figure of thought. Something that stands for something else, and yet seems necessarily to evoke that other thing. In Neoplatonic, and therefore Romantic, theory, to be distinguished from allegory thus: whereas allegory involves connections between vehicle and tenor agreed by convention or made explicit, the meanings of a symbol are supposedly inherent to it.

synecdoche (Greek “to take with something else”): a figure of thought. Using a part to express the whole, or vice versa; for example, “all hands on deck.” Closely related to metonymy.

syntax (Greek “ordering with”): Syntax designates the rules by which sentences are constructed in a given language. Discussion of meter is impossible without some reference to syntax, since the overall effect of a poem is, in part, always the product of a subtle balance of meter and sentence construction. Syntax is also essential to the understanding of prose style, since prose writers, deprived of the full shaping possibilities of meter, rely all the more heavily on syntactic resources. A working command of syntactical practice requires an understanding of the parts of speech (nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs, conjunctions, pronouns, prepositions, and interjections), since writers exploit syntactic possibilities by using particular combinations and concentrations of the parts of speech.

taste (from Italian “touch”): Although medieval monastic traditions used eating and tasting as a metaphor for reading, the concept of taste as a personal ideal to be cultivated by, and applied to, the appreciation and judgment of works of art in general was developed in the eighteenth century.

tercet: a verse form. A stanza or group of three lines, used in larger forms such as terza rima, the Petrarchan sonnet, and the villanelle.

terza rima: a verse form. A sequence of rhymed tercets linked by rhyme thus: aba bcb cdc, etc. first used extensively by Dante in The Divine Comedy, the form was adapted in English iambic pentameters by Wyatt and revived in the nineteenth century. See Wyatt, “Mine Own John Poins” (vol. B, p. 131); Shelley, “Ode to the West Wind” (vol. D, p. 802); and Morris, “The Defence of Guinevere” (vol. E, p. 657). For modern adaptations see Eliot, lines 78–149 (though unrhymed) of “Little Gidding” (vol. F, pp. 523–25); Heaney, “Station Island” (vol. F, p. 968); Walcott, Omeros (vol. F, p. 806).

tetrameter (Greek “four measure”): a term of meter. A line with four stresses. Coleridge, Christabel, line 31: “She stole along, she nothing spoke” (see vol. D, p. 495).

theme (Greek “proposition”): In literary criticism the term designates what the work is about; the theme is the concept that unifies a given work of literature.

third-person narration: relevant to point of view. A narration in which the narrator recounts a narrative of characters referred to

topographical poem (Greek "place writing"): a genre. A poem devoted to the meditative description of particular places.

topos (Greek "place," plural topoi): a commonplace in the content of a given kind of literature. Originally, in classical rhetoric, the topoi were tried-and-tested stimuli to literary invention: lists of standard headings under which a subject might be investigated. In medieval narrative poems, for example, it was commonplace to begin with a description of spring. Writers did, of course, render the commonplace uncommon, as in Chaucer's spring scene at the opening of The Canterbury Tales (see vol. A, p. 474).

tradition (from Latin "passing on"): A literary tradition is whatever is passed on or revived from the past in a single literary culture, or drawn from others to enrich a writer's culture. "Tradition" is fluid in reference, ranging from small to large referents: thus it may refer to a relatively small aspect of texts (for example, the tradition of iambic pentameter), or it may, at the other extreme, refer to the body of texts that constitute a canon.

tragedy: a genre. A dramatic representation of the fall of kings or nobles, beginning in happiness and ending in catastrophe. Later transferred to other social milieux. The opposite of comedy; thus Shakespeare, Othello (see vol. B, p. 640).

tragic mode: Many genres (epic poetry, legendary chronicles, tragedy, the novel) either do or can participate in a tragic mode, by representing the fall of noble protagonists and the irreparable ravages of human society and history.

tragicomedy: a genre. A play in which potentially tragic events turn out to have a happy, or comic, ending. Thus Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

translation (Latin “carrying across”): the rendering of a text written in one language into another.

trimeter (Greek “three measure”): a term of meter. A line with three stresses. Herbert, “Discipline,” line 1: “Throw away thy rod” (see vol. B, p. 1197).

triplet: a verse form. A tercet rhyming on the same sound. Pope inserts triplets among heroic couplets to emphasize a particular thought; see Essay on Criticism, 315–17 (vol. C, p. 521).

trochee: a term of rhythm. A two-syllable foot following the pattern, in English verse, of stressed followed by unstressed syllable, producing a falling effect. Thus, for example, “Texas.”

type (Greek “impression, figure”): a figure of thought. In Christian allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament, pre-Christian figures were regarded as “types,” or foreshadowings, of Christ or the Christian dispensation. Typology has been the source of much visual and literary art in which the parallelisms between old and new are extended to nonbiblical figures; thus the virtuous plowman in Piers Plowman becomes a type of Christ.

unities: According to a theory supposedly derived from Aristotle’s Poetics, the events represented in a play should have unity of time, place, and action: that the play take up no more time than the time of the play, or at most a day; that the space of action should be within a single city; and that there should be no subplot. See Johnson, The Preface to Shakespeare (vol. C, p. 876).

vernacular (from Latin verna, “servant”): the language of the people, as distinguished from learned and arcane languages. From the later Middle Ages especially, the “vernacular” languages and literatures of Europe distinguished themselves from the learned languages and literatures of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

verse form: The terms related to meter and rhythm describe the shape of individual lines. Lines of verse are combined to produce larger groupings, called verse forms. These larger groupings are in the first instance stanzas. The combination of a certain meter and stanza shape constitutes the verse form, of which there are many standard kinds.

villanelle: a verse form. A fixed form of usually five tercets and a quatrain employing only two rhyme sounds altogether, rhyming aba for the tercets and abaa for the quatrain, with a complex pattern of two refrains. Derived from a French fixed form. Thomas, "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night" (see vol. F, p. 693).

wit: Originally a synonym for "reason" in Old and Middle English, "wit" became a literary ideal in the Renaissance as brilliant play of the full range of mental resources. For eighteenth-century writers, the notion necessarily involved pleasing expression, as in Pope's definition of true wit as "Nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed" (Essay on Criticism, lines 297–98; see vol. C, p. 527). Romantic theory of the imagination deprived wit of its full range of apprehension, whence the word came to be restricted to its modern sense, as the clever play of mind that produces laughter.

zeugma (Greek "a yoking"): a figure of thought. A figure whereby one word applies to two or more words in a sentence, and in which the applications are surprising, either because one is unusual, or because the applications are made in very different ways; Pope, Rape of the Lock 3.7–8, in which the word "take" is used in two senses: "Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey, / Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea" (see vol. C, p. 546).

B: Publishing History, Censorship

By the time we read texts in published books, they have already been treated—that is, changed by authors, editors, and printers—in many ways. Although there are differences across history, in each period literary works are subject to pressures of many kinds, which apply before, while, and after an author writes. The pressures might be financial, as in the relations of author and patron; commercial, as in the marketing of books; and legal, as in, during some periods, the negotiation through official and unofficial censorship. In addition, texts in all periods undergo technological processes, as they move from the material forms in which an author produced them to the forms in which they are presented to readers. Some of the terms below designate important material forms in which books were produced, disseminated, and surveyed across the historical span of this anthology. Others designate the skills developed to understand these processes. The anthology's introductions to individual periods discuss the particular forms these phenomena took in different eras.

bookseller: In England, and particularly in London, commercial bookmaking and -selling enterprises came into being in the early fourteenth century. These were loose organizations of artisans who usually lived in the same neighborhoods (around St. Paul's Cathedral in London). A bookseller or dealer would coordinate the production of hand-copied books for wealthy patrons (see patronage), who would order books to be custom-made. After the introduction of printing in the late fifteenth century, authors generally sold the rights to their work to booksellers, without any further royalties. Booksellers, who often had their own shops, belonged to the Stationers' Company. This system lasted into the eighteenth century. In 1710, however, authors were for the first time granted copyright, which tipped the commercial balance in their favor, against booksellers.

censorship: The term applies to any mechanism for restricting what can be published. Historically, the reasons for imposing censorship are heresy, sedition, blasphemy, libel, or obscenity. External censorship is imposed by institutions having legislative sanctions at their disposal. Thus the pre-Reformation Church imposed the Constitutions of Archbishop Arundel of 1409, aimed at repressing the Lollard “heresy.” After the Reformation, some key events in the history of censorship are as follows: 1547, when anti-Lollard legislation and legislation made by Henry VIII concerning treason by writing (1534) were abolished; the Licensing Order of 1643, which legislated that works be licensed, through the Stationers’ Company, prior to publication; and 1695, when the last such Act stipulating prepublication licensing lapsed. Postpublication censorship continued in different periods for different reasons. Thus, for example, British publication of D. H. Lawrence’s Lady Chatterley’s Lover (1928) was obstructed (though unsuccessfully) in 1960, under the Obscene Publications Act of 1959. Censorship can also be international: although not published in Iran, Salman Rushdie’s Satanic Verses (1988) was censored in that country, where the leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, proclaimed a fatwa (religious decree) promising the author’s execution. Very often censorship is not imposed externally, however: authors or publishers can censor work in anticipation of what will incur the wrath of readers or the penalties of the law. Victorian and Edwardian publishers of novels, for example, urged authors to remove potentially offensive material, especially for serial publication in popular magazines.

codex: the physical format of most modern books and medieval manuscripts, consisting of a series of separate leaves gathered into quires and bound together, often with a cover. In late antiquity, the codex largely replaced the scroll, the standard form of written documents in Roman culture.

copy text: the particular text of a work used by a textual editor as the basis of an edition of that work.

copyright: the legal protection afforded to authors for control of their work’s publication, in an attempt to ensure due financial reward. Some key dates in the history of copyright in the United Kingdom are as follows: 1710, when a statute gave authors the exclusive right to publish their work for fourteen years, and fourteen years more if the author were still alive when the first term had expired; 1842, when the period of authorial control was extended to forty-two years; and 1911, when the term was extended yet further, to fifty years after the author's death. In 1995 the period of protection was harmonized with the laws in other European countries to be the life of the author plus seventy years. In the United States no works first published before 1923 are in copyright. Works published since 1978 are, as in the United Kingdom, protected for the life of the author plus seventy years.

folio: the leaf formed by both sides of a single page. Each folio has two sides: a recto (the front side of the leaf, on the right side of a double-page spread in an open codex), and a verso (the back side of the leaf, on the left side of a double-page spread). Modern book pagination follows the pattern 1, 2, 3, 4, while medieval manuscript pagination follows the pattern 1r, 1v, 2r, 2v. "Folio" can also designate the size of a printed book. Books come in different shapes, depending originally on the number of times a standard sheet of paper is folded. One fold produces a large volume, a folio book; two folds produce a quarto, four an octavo, and six a very small duodecimo. Generally speaking, the larger the book, the grander and more expensive. Shakespeare's plays were, for example, first printed in quartos, but were gathered into a folio edition in 1623.

foul papers: versions of a work before an author has produced, if she or he has, a final copy (a "fair copy") with all corrections removed.

incunabulum (plural "incunabula"): any printed book produced in Europe before 1501. Famous incunabula include the Gutenberg Bible, printed in 1455.

manuscript (Latin, "written by hand"): Any text written physically by hand is a manuscript. Before the introduction of printing with moveable type in 1476, all texts in England were produced and reproduced by hand, in manuscript. This is an extremely labor-intensive task, using expensive materials (for example, vellum, or parchment); the cost of books produced thereby was, accordingly, very high. Even after the introduction of printing, many texts continued to be produced in manuscript. This is obviously true of letters, for example, but until the eighteenth century, poetry written within aristocratic circles was often transmitted in manuscript copies.

paleography (Greek “ancient writing”): the art of deciphering, describing, and dating forms of handwriting.

parchment: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also vellum.

patronage, patron (Latin “protector”): Many technological, legal, and commercial supports were necessary before professional authorship became possible. Although some playwrights (for example, Shakespeare) made a living by writing for the theater, other authors needed, principally, the large-scale reproductive capacities of printing and the security of copyright to make a living from writing. Before these conditions obtained, many authors had another main occupation, and most authors had to rely on patronage. In different periods, institutions or individuals offered material support, or patronage, to authors. Thus in Anglo-Saxon England, monasteries afforded the conditions of writing to monastic authors. Between the twelfth and the seventeenth centuries, the main source of patronage was the royal court. Authors offered patrons prestige and ideological support in return for financial support. Even as the conditions of professional authorship came into being at the beginning of the eighteenth century, older forms of direct patronage were not altogether displaced until the middle of the century.

periodical: Whereas journalism, strictly, applies to daily writing (from French jour, “day”), periodical writing appears at larger, but

printing: Printing, or the mechanical reproduction of books using moveable type, was invented in Germany in the mid-fifteenth century by Johannes Gutenberg; it quickly spread throughout Europe. William Caxton brought printing into England from the Low Countries in 1476. Much greater powers of reproduction at much lower prices transformed every aspect of literary culture.

publisher: the person or company responsible for the commissioning and publicizing of printed matter. In the early period of printing, publisher, printer, and bookseller were often the same person. This trend continued in the ascendancy of the Stationers' Company, between the middle of the sixteenth and the end of the seventeenth centuries. Toward the end of the seventeenth century, these three functions began to separate, leading to their modern distinctions.

quire: When medieval manuscripts were assembled, a few loose sheets of parchment or paper would first be folded together and sewn along the fold. This formed a quire (also known as a "gathering" or "signature"). Folded in this way, four large sheets of parchment would produce eight smaller manuscript leaves. Multiple quires could then be bound together to form a codex.

royalties: an agreed-upon proportion of the price of each copy of a work sold, paid by the publisher to the author, or an agreed-upon fee paid to the playwright for each performance of a play.

scribe: In manuscript culture, the scribe is the copyist who reproduces a text by hand.

scriptorium (plural "scriptoria"): a place for producing written documents and manuscripts.

serial publication: generally referring to the practice, especially common in the nineteenth century, of publishing novels a few chapters at a time, in periodicals.

Stationers' Company: The Stationers' Company was an English guild incorporating various tradesmen, including printers, publishers, and booksellers, skilled in the production and selling of books. It was formed in 1403, received its royal charter in 1557, and served as a means both of producing and of regulating books. Authors would sell the manuscripts of their books to individual stationers, who incurred the risks and took the profits of producing and selling the books. The stationers entered their rights over given books in the Stationers' Register. They also regulated the book trade and held their monopoly by licensing books and by being empowered to seize unauthorized books and imprison resisters. This system of licensing broke down in the social unrest of the Civil War and Interregnum (1640–60), and it ended in 1695. Even after the end of licensing, the Stationers' Company continued to be an intrinsic part of the copyright process, since the 1710 copyright statute directed that copyright had to be registered at Stationers' Hall.

subscription: An eighteenth-century system of bookselling somewhere between direct patronage and impersonal sales. A subscriber paid half the cost of a book before publication and half on delivery. The author received these payments directly. The subscriber's name appeared in the prefatory pages.

textual criticism: Works in all periods often exist in many subtly or not so subtly different forms. This is especially true with regard to manuscript textual reproduction, but it also applies to printed texts. Textual criticism is the art, developed from the fifteenth century in Italy but raised to new levels of sophistication from the eighteenth century, of deciphering different historical states of texts. This art involves the analysis of textual variants, often with the aim of distinguishing authorial from scribal forms.

vellum: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also parchment.

watermark: the trademark of a paper manufacturer, impressed into the paper but largely invisible unless held up to light.

Geographic Nomenclature

The British Isles refers to the prominent group of islands off the northwest coast of Europe, especially to the two largest, Great Britain and Ireland. At present these comprise two sovereign states: the Republic of Ireland, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland—known for short as the United Kingdom or the U.K. Most of the smaller islands are part of the U.K. but a few, like the Isle of Man and the tiny Channel Islands, are largely independent. The U.K. is often loosely referred to as “Britain” or “Great Britain” and is sometimes called simply, if inaccurately, “England.” For obvious reasons, the latter usage is rarely heard among the inhabitants of the other countries of the U.K.—Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (sometimes called Ulster). England is by far the most populous part of the kingdom, as well as the seat of its capital, London.

From the first to the fifth century C.E. most of what is now England and Wales was a province of the Roman Empire called Britain (in Latin, Britannia). After the fall of Rome, much of the island was invaded and settled by peoples from northern Germany and Denmark speaking what we now call Old English. These peoples are known as the Angles and the Saxons (the word England is related to Angles). By the time of the Norman Conquest (1066) most of the kingdoms founded by the Angles, the Saxons, and the subsequent Viking invaders had coalesced into the kingdom of England, which, in the latter Middle Ages, conquered and largely absorbed the neighboring Celtic kingdom of Wales. In 1603 James VI of Scotland inherited the island’s other throne as James I of England, and for the next hundred years—except for the two decades of Puritan rule—Scotland (both its English-speaking Lowlands and its Gaelic-speaking Highlands) and England (with Wales) were two kingdoms under a single king. In 1707 the Act of Union brought them together as the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Ireland, where English rule had begun in the twelfth century and been tightened in the sixteenth, was incorporated by the 1800–1801 Act of Union into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. With the division of Ireland and the establishment of the Irish Free State after World War I, this name was modified to its present form, and in 1949 the Irish Free State became the Republic of Ireland, or Éire. In 1999 Scotland elected a separate parliament it had relinquished in 1707, and Wales elected an assembly it lost in 1409; neither Scotland nor Wales ceased to be part of the United Kingdom.

The British Isles are further divided into counties, which in Great Britain are also known as shires. This word, with its vowel shortened in pronunciation, forms the suffix in the names of many counties, such as Yorkshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire.

The Latin names Britannia (Britain), Caledonia (Scotland), and Hibernia (Ireland) are sometimes used in poetic diction; so too is Britain's ancient Celtic name, Albion. Because of its accidental resemblance to albus (Latin for “white”), Albion is especially associated with the chalk cliffs that seem to gird much of the English coast like defensive walls.

The British Empire took its name from the British Isles because it was created not only by the English but also by the Irish, Scots, and Welsh, as well as by civilians and servicemen from other constituent countries of the empire. Some of the empire's overseas colonies, or crown colonies, were populated largely by settlers of European origin and their descendants. These predominantly White settler colonies, such as Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, were allowed significant self-government in the nineteenth century and recognized as dominions in the early twentieth century. The White dominions became members of the Commonwealth of Nations, also called the Commonwealth, the British Commonwealth, and “the Old Commonwealth” at different times, an association of sovereign states under the symbolic leadership of the British monarch.

Other overseas colonies of the empire had mostly Indigenous populations (or, in the Caribbean, the descendants of enslaved people, indentured servants, and others). These colonies were granted political independence after World War II, later than the dominions, and have often been referred to since as postcolonial nations. In South and Southeast Asia, India and Pakistan gained independence in 1947, followed by other countries including Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), Burma (now Myanmar), Malaya (now Malaysia), and Singapore. In West and East Africa, the Gold Coast was decolonized as Ghana in 1957, Nigeria in 1960, Sierra Leone in 1961, Uganda in 1962, Kenya in 1963, and so forth, while in southern Africa, the White minority government of South Africa was already independent in 1931, though majority rule did not come until 1994. In the Caribbean, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago became independent in 1962, followed by Barbados in 1966, and other islands of the British West Indies in the 1970s and '80s. Other regions from which nations emerged out of British colonial rule included Central America (British Honduras, now Belize), South America (British Guiana, now Guyana), the Pacific islands (Fiji), and Europe (Cyprus, Malta). After decolonization, many of these nations chose to remain within a newly conceived Commonwealth and are sometimes referred to as "New Commonwealth" countries. Some nations, such as Ireland, Pakistan, and South Africa, withdrew from the Commonwealth, though South Africa and Paki stan eventually rejoined, and others, such as Burma (now Myanmar), gained independence outside the Commonwealth. Britain's last major overseas colony, Hong Kong, was returned to Chinese sovereignty in 1997, but while Britain retains only a handful of dependent territories, such as Bermuda and Montserrat, the scope of the Commonwealth remains vast, with approximately 30 percent of the world's population.

British Money

One of the most dramatic changes to the system of British money came in 1971. In the system previously in place, the pound consisted of 20 shillings, each containing 12 pence, making 240 pence to the pound. Since 1971, British money has been calculated on the decimal system, with 100 pence to the pound. Britons' experience of paper money did not change very drastically: as before, 5- and 10-pound notes constitute the majority of bills passing through their hands (in addition, 20- and 50-pound notes have been added). But the shift necessitated a whole new way of thinking about and exchanging coins and marked the demise of the shilling, one of the fundamental units of British monetary history. Many other coins, still frequently encountered in literature, had already passed. These include the groat, worth 4 pence (the word "groat" is often used to signify a trifling sum); the angel (which depicted the archangel Michael triumphing over a dragon), valued at 10 shillings; the mark, worth in its day two-thirds of a pound or 13 shillings 4 pence; and the sovereign, a gold coin initially worth 22 shillings 6 pence, later valued at 1 pound, last circulated in 1932. One prominent older coin, the guinea, was worth a pound and a shilling; though it has not been minted since 1813, a very few quality items or prestige awards (like the purse in a horse race) may still be quoted in guineas. (The table below includes some other obsolete coins.) Colloquially, a pound was (and is) called a quid; a shilling a bob; sixpence, a tanner; a copper could refer to a penny, a half-penny, or a farthing (1/4 penny).

Throughout its tenure as a member of the European Union (1973–2020), Britain contemplated but did not make the change to the EU's common currency, the Euro, reflecting many Britons' strong identification of their country with its rich commercial history and view of their currency as a national symbol.

Even more challenging than sorting out the values of obsolete coins is calculating for any given period the purchasing power of money, which fluctuates over time by its very nature. As difficult as it is to generalize, it is clear that money used to be worth much more than it is currently. During the early Middle Ages, the most valuable circulating coin was the silver penny: four would buy a sheep. Beyond long-term inflationary trends, prices varied from times of plenty to those marked by poor harvests; from peacetime to wartime; from the country to the metropolis (life in London has always been very expensive); and wages varied according to the availability of labor (wages would sharply rise, for instance, during the devastating Black Death in the fourteenth century). The following chart provides a glimpse of some actual prices of given periods and their changes across time, though all the variables mentioned above prevent them from being definitive. Even from one year to the next, an added tax on gin or tea could drastically raise prices, and a lottery ticket could cost much more the night before the drawing than just a month earlier. Still, the prices quoted below do indicate important trends, such as the disparity of incomes in British society and the costs of basic commodities. In the chart on the following pages, the symbol £ is used for pound, s. for shilling, d. for a penny (from Latin denarius); a sum would normally be written £2.19.3—that is 2 pounds, 19 shillings, 3 pence. (This is Leopold Bloom's budget for the day depicted in Joyce's novel Ulysses [1922]; in the new currency, it would be about £2.96.)

The British Baronage

The English monarchy is in principle hereditary, though at times during the Middle Ages the rules were subject to dispute. As it stands now, authority passes from parent to eldest surviving child, to siblings in order of seniority if there are no children, and in default of direct descendants to collateral lines (cousins, nephews, nieces) in order of closeness. There have been breaks in the order of succession (1066, 1399, 1688), but so far as possible the usurpers have always sought to paper over the break with a legitimate, that is, hereditary, claim. When a queen succeeds to the throne and takes a husband, he does not become king unless he is in the line of blood succession; rather, he is named prince consort, as Albert was to Victoria. He may be the father of kings, but he is not one himself.

The original Saxon nobles were the king's thanes, ealdormen, or earls, who provided the king with military service and counsel in return for booty, gifts, or landed estates. William the Conqueror, arriving from France, where feudalism was fully developed, considerably expanded this group. In addition, as the king distributed the lands of his new kingdom, he also distributed dignities to men who became known collectively as "the baronage." "Baron" in its root meaning signifies simply "man," and barons were the king's men. As the title was common, a distinction was early made between greater and lesser barons, the former gradually assuming loftier and more impressive titles. The first English "duke" was created in 1337; the title of "marquess," or "marquis" (pronounced "markwis"), followed in 1385, and "viscount" ("vyekount") in 1440. Though "earl" is the oldest title of all, an earl now comes between a marquess and a viscount in order of dignity and precedence, and the old term "baron" now designates a rank just below viscount. "Baronets" were created in 1611 as a means of raising revenue for the crown (the title could be purchased for about

£1,000); they are marginal nobility and have never sat in the House of Lords.

Kings and queens are addressed as “Your Majesty,” princes and princesses as “Your Highness,” the other hereditary nobility as “My Lord” or “Your Lordship.” Peers receive their titles either by inheritance (like Lord Byron, the sixth baron of that line) or from the monarch (like Alfred, Lord Tennyson, created 1st Baron Tennyson by Victoria). The children, even of a duke, are commoners unless they are specifically granted some other title or inherit their father’s title from him. A peerage can be forfeited by act of attainder, as for example when a lord is convicted of treason; and, when forfeited, or lapsed for lack of a successor, can be bestowed on another family. Thus in 1605 Robert Cecil was made first Earl of Salisbury in the third creation, the first creation dating from 1149, the second from 1337, the title having been in abeyance since 1539. Titles descend by right of succession and do not depend on tenure of land; thus, a title does not always indicate where a lord dwells or holds power. Indeed, noble titles do not always refer to a real place at all. At Prince Edward’s marriage in 1999, the queen created him Earl of Wessex, although the old kingdom of Wessex has had no political existence since 1066, and the name was all but forgotten until it was resurrected by Thomas Hardy as the setting of his novels. (This is perhaps but one of many ways in which the world of the aristocracy increasingly resembles the realm of literature.)

Scottish peers sat in the parliament of Scotland, as English peers did in the parliament of England, till at the Act of Union (1707) Scottish peers were granted sixteen seats in the English House of Lords, to be filled by election. (In 1963, all Scottish lords were allowed to sit.) Similarly, Irish peers, when the Irish parliament was abolished in 1801, were granted the right to elect twenty-eight of their number to the House of Lords in Westminster. (Now that the Republic of Ireland is a separate nation, this no longer applies.) Women members (peeresses) were first allowed to sit in the House as nonhereditary Life Peers in 1958 (when that status was created for members of both genders); women first sat by their own hereditary right in 1963. Today the House of Lords still retains some power to influence or delay legislation, but its future is uncertain. In 1999, the hereditary peers (then amounting to 750) were reduced to 92

temporary members elected by their fellow peers. Holders of Life Peerages remain, as do senior bishops of the Church of England and high-court judges (the "Law Lords").

Below the peerage the chief title of honor is "knight." Knighthood, which is not hereditary, is generally a reward for services rendered. A knight (Sir John Black) is addressed, using his first name, as "Sir John"; his wife, using the last name, is "Lady Black"—unless she is the daughter of an earl or nobleman of higher rank, in which case she will be "Lady Arabella." The female equivalent of a knight bears the title of "Dame." Though the word knight itself comes from the Old English cniht, there is some doubt as to whether knighthood amounted to much before the arrival of the Normans. The feudal system required military service as a condition of land tenure, and a man who came to serve his king at the head of an army of tenants required a title of authority and badges of identity—hence the title of knighthood and the coat of arms. During the Crusades, when men were far removed from their land (or even sold it in order to go on crusade), more elaborate forms of fealty sprang up that soon expanded into orders of knighthood. The Templars, Hospitallers, Knights of the Teutonic Order, Knights of Malta, and Knights of the Golden Fleece were but a few of these companionships; not all of them were available at all times in England.

Gradually, with the rise of centralized government and the decline of feudal tenures, military knighthood became obsolete, and the rank largely honorific; sometimes, as under James I, it degenerated into a scheme of the royal government for making money. For hundreds of years after its establishment in the fourteenth century, the Order of the Garter was the only English order of knighthood, an exclusive courtly companionship. Then, during the late seventeenth, the eighteenth, and the nineteenth centuries, a number of additional orders were created, with names such as the Thistle, Saint Patrick, the Bath, Saint Michael, and Saint George, plus a number of special Victorian and Indian orders. They retain the terminology, ceremony, and dignity of knighthood, but the military implications are vestigial.

Although the British Empire now belongs to history, appointments to the Order of the British Empire continue to be conferred for services to that empire at home or abroad. Such honors (commonly referred to as "gongs") are granted by the monarch in New Year's and Birthday lists, but the decisions are now made by the government in power. In recent years there have been efforts to popularize and democratize the dispensation of honors, with recipients including celebrities of all types. But this does not prevent large sectors of British society from regarding both knighthood and the peerage as largely irrelevant to modern life.

Religions in Great Britain

In the late sixth century C.E., missionaries from Rome introduced Christianity to Britons—actually, reintroduced it, since it had briefly flourished in the southern parts of the British Isles during the Roman occupation, and even after the Roman withdrawal had persisted in the Celtic regions of Scotland and Wales. By the time the earliest poems included in The Norton Anthology of English Literature were composed (the seventh century), therefore, there had been a Christian presence in the British Isles for hundreds of years. The conversion of the Germanic occupiers of England can, however, be dated only from 597. Our knowledge of the religion of pre-Christian Britain is sketchy, but it is likely that vestiges of Germanic polytheism assimilated into, or coexisted with, the practice of Christianity: fertility rites were incorporated into the celebration of Easter resurrection, rituals commemorating the dead into All-Hallows Eve and All Saints Day, and elements of winter solstice festivals into the celebration of Christmas. The most durable polytheistic remains are the days of the week, each of which except “Saturday” derives from the name of a Germanic pagan god, and the word “Easter,” deriving, according to the great monastic scholar Bede (ca. 673–735), from the name of a Germanic pagan goddess, Eostre. In English literature such “folkloric” elements sometimes elicit romantic nostalgia. Geoffrey Chaucer’s “Wife of Bath” looks back to a magical time before the arrival of Christianity in which the land was “fulfild of fairye.” Hundreds of years later, the seventeenth-century writer Robert Herrick honors the amalgamation of Christian and pagan elements in agrarian British culture in such poems as “Corinna’s Gone A-Maying” and “The Hock Cart.”

Medieval Christianity was fairly uniform, if complex, across Western Europe—hence called “catholic,” or universally shared. The Church was composed of the so-called “regular” and “secular” orders, the regular orders being those who followed a rule in a community under an abbot or an abbess (that is, monks, nuns, friars, and canons), while the secular clergy of priests served parish communities under the governance of a bishop. In the unstable period from the sixth until the twelfth century, monasteries were the intellectual powerhouse of the Church. From the beginning of the thirteenth century, with the development of an urban Christian spirituality in Europe, friars dominated the recently invented institution of universities, as well as devoting themselves, in theory at least, to the urban poor.

The Catholic Church was also an international power structure. With its hierarchy of pope, cardinals, archbishops, and bishops, it offered a model of the centralized, bureaucratic state from the late eleventh century. That ecclesiastical power structure coexisted alongside a separate, often less centralized and feudal structure of lay authorities, with theoretically different and often competing spheres of social responsibilities. The sharing of lay and ecclesiastical authority in medieval England was sometimes a source of conflict. Chaucer's pilgrims are on their way to visit the memorial shrine to one victim of such exemplary struggle: Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, who opposed the policies of King Henry II, was assassinated by indirect suggestion of the king in 1170, and later made a saint. The Church, in turn, produced its own victims: Jews were subject to persecution in the late twelfth century in England, before being expelled in 1290. From the beginning of the fifteenth century, the English Church targeted Lollard heretics (see below) with capital punishment, for the first time.

As an international organization, the Church conducted its business in the universal language of Latin. Thus although in the period the largest segment of literate persons was made up of clerics, the clerical contribution to great literary writing in vernacular languages (for example, French and English) was, so far as we know, relatively modest, with some great exceptions in the later Middle Ages (for example, William Langland). Lay, vernacular writers of the period certainly reflect the importance of the Church as an institution and the pervasiveness of religion in the rituals that marked everyday life, as well as contesting institutional authority. From the late fourteenth century, indeed, England witnessed an active and articulate, proto-Protestant movement known as Lollardy, which attacked clerical hierarchy and promoted vernacular scriptures.

Beginning in 1517 the German monk Martin Luther, in Wittenberg, Germany, openly challenged many aspects of Catholic practice and by 1520 had completely repudiated the authority of the pope, setting in motion the Protestant Reformation. Luther argued that the Roman Catholic Church had strayed far from the pattern of Christianity laid out in scripture. He rejected Catholic doctrines for which no biblical authority was to be found, such as the belief in Purgatory, and translated the Bible into German, on the grounds that the importance of scripture for all Christians made its translation into the vernacular tongue essential. Luther was not the first to advance such views—Lollard followers of the Englishman John Wycliffe had translated the Bible in the late fourteenth century. But Luther, protected by powerful German rulers, was able to speak out without fear of punishment and convert others to his views, rather than suffer the persecution usually meted out to heretics. Soon other reformers were following in Luther's footsteps: of these, the Swiss Ulrich Zwingli and the French Jean Calvin would be especially influential for English religious thought.

At first England remained staunchly Catholic. Its king, Henry VIII, was so severe to heretics that the pope awarded him the title "Defender of the Faith," which British monarchs have retained to this day. In 1534, however, Henry rejected the authority of the pope to prevent his divorce from his queen, Catherine of Aragon, and his marriage to his mistress, Ann Boleyn. In doing so, Henry appropriated to himself ecclesiastical as well as secular authority. Thomas More, author of Utopia, was executed in 1535 for refusing to endorse Henry's right to govern the English church. Over the following six years, Henry consolidated his grip on the ecclesiastical establishment by dissolving the powerful, populous Catholic monasteries and redistributing their massive landholdings to his own lay followers. Yet Henry's church largely retained Catholic doctrine and liturgy. When Henry died and his young son, Edward, came to the throne in 1547, the English church embarked on a more Protestant path, a direction abruptly reversed when Edward died and his older sister Mary, the daughter of Catherine of Aragon, took the throne in 1553 and attempted to reintroduce Roman Catholicism. Mary's reign was also short, however, and her successor, Elizabeth I, the daughter of Ann Boleyn, was a Protestant. Elizabeth attempted to establish a "middle way" Christianity, compromising between Roman Catholic practices and beliefs and reformed ones.

The Church of England, though it laid claim to a national rather than pan-European authority, aspired like its predecessor to be the universal church of all English subjects. It retained the Catholic structure of parishes and dioceses and the Catholic hierarchy of bishops, though the ecclesiastical authority was now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Church's "Supreme Governor" was the monarch. Yet disagreement and controversy persisted. Some members of the Church of England wanted to retain many of the ritual and liturgical elements of Catholicism. Others, the Puritans, advocated a more thoroughgoing reformation. Most Puritans remained within the Church of England, but a minority, the "Separatists" or "Congregationalists," split from the established church altogether. These dissenters no longer thought of the ideal church as an organization to which everybody belonged; instead, they conceived it as a more exclusive group of likeminded people, one not necessarily attached to a larger body of believers.

In the seventeenth century, the succession of the Scottish king James to the English throne produced another problem. England and Scotland were separate nations, and in the sixteenth century Scotland had developed its own national Presbyterian church, or "kirk," under the leadership of the reformer John Knox. The kirk retained fewer Catholic liturgical elements than did the Church of England, and its authorities, or "presbyters," were elected by assemblies of their fellow clerics, rather than appointed by the king. James I and his son Charles I, especially the latter, wanted to bring the Scottish kirk into conformity with Church of England practices. The Scots violently resisted these efforts, with the collaboration of many English Puritans, in a conflict that eventually developed into the English Civil War in the mid-seventeenth century. The effect of these disputes is visible in the poetry of such writers as John Milton, Robert Herrick, Henry Vaughan, and Thomas Traherne, and in the prose of Thomas Browne, Lucy Hutchinson, and Dorothy Waugh. Just as in the mid-sixteenth century, when a succession of monarchs with different religious commitments destabilized the church, so the seventeenth century endured spiritual whiplash. King Charles I's highly ritualistic Church of England was violently overturned by the Puritan victors in the Civil War—until 1660, after the death of the Puritan leader, Oliver Cromwell, when the Church of England was restored along with the monarchy.

The religious and political upheavals of the seventeenth century produced Christian sects that de-emphasized the ceremony of the established church and rejected as well its top-down authority structure. Some of these groups were ephemeral, but the Baptists (founded in 1608 in Amsterdam by the English expatriate John Smyth) and Quakers, or Society of Friends (founded by George Fox in the 1640s), flourished outside the established church, sometimes despite cruel persecution. John Bunyan, a Baptist, wrote the Christian allegory Pilgrim's Progress while in prison. Some dissenters, like the Baptists, shared the reformed reverence for the absolute authority of scripture but interpreted the scriptural texts differently from their fellow Protestants. Others, like the Quakers, favored, even over the authority of the Bible, the "inner light" or voice of individual conscience, which they took to be the working of the Holy Spirit in the lives of individuals.

The Protestant dissenters were not England's only religious minorities. Despite crushing fines and the threat of imprisonment, a minority of Catholics under Elizabeth and James openly refused to give their allegiance to the new church, and others remained secret adherents to the old ways. John Donne was brought up in an ardently Catholic family, and several other writers converted to Catholicism as adults—Ben Jonson for a considerable part of his career, Elizabeth Carey and Richard Crashaw permanently, and at profound personal cost. In the eighteenth century, Catholics remained objects of suspicion as possible agents of sedition, especially after the “Glorious Revolution” in 1688 deposed the Catholic James II in favor of the Protestant William and Mary. Anti-Catholic prejudice affected John Dryden, a Catholic convert, as well as the lifelong Catholic Alexander Pope. By contrast, the English colony of Ireland remained overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, the fervor of its religious commitment at least partly inspired by resistance to English occupation. Starting in the reign of Elizabeth, England shored up its own authority in Ireland by encouraging Protestant immigrants from Scotland to settle in the north of Ireland, producing a virulent religious divide the effects of which are still felt today.

A small community of Jews had moved from France to London after 1066, when the Norman William the Conqueror came to the English throne. Although despised and persecuted by many Christians, they were allowed to remain as moneylenders to the Crown, until the thirteenth century, when the king developed alternative sources of credit. At this point, in 1290, the Jews were expelled from England. In 1655 Oliver Cromwell permitted a few to return, and in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries the Jewish population slowly increased, mainly by immigration from Germany. In the mid-eighteenth century some prominent Jews had their children brought up as Christians so as to facilitate their full integration into English society: thus the nineteenth-century writer and politician Benjamin Disraeli, although he and his father were members of the Church of England, was widely considered a Jew insofar as his ancestry was Jewish.

In the late seventeenth century, as the Church of England reasserted itself, Catholics, Jews, and dissenting Protestants found themselves subject to significant legal restrictions. The Corporation Act, passed in 1661, and the Test Act, passed in 1673, excluded all who refused to take communion in the Church of England from voting, attending university, or working in government or in the professions. Members of religious minorities, as well as Church of England communicants, paid mandatory taxes in support of Church of England ministers and buildings. In 1689 the dissenters gained the right to worship in public, but Jews and Catholics were not permitted to do so.

During the eighteenth century, political, intellectual, and religious history remained closely intertwined. The Church of England came to accommodate a good deal of variety. "Low church" services resembled those of the dissenting Protestant churches, minimizing ritual and emphasizing the sermon; the "high church" retained more elaborate ritual elements, yet its prestige was under attack on several fronts. Many Enlightenment thinkers subjected the Bible to rational critique and found it wanting: the philosopher David Hume, for instance, argued that the "miracles" described therein were more probably lies or errors than real breaches of the laws of nature. Within the Church of England, the "broad church" Latitudinarians welcomed this rationalism, advocating theological openness and an emphasis on ethics rather than dogma. More radically, the Unitarian movement rejected the divinity of Christ while professing to accept his ethical teachings. Taking a different tack, the preacher John Wesley, founder of Methodism, responded to the rationalists' challenge with a newly fervent call to evangelism and personal discipline; his movement was particularly successful in Wales. Revolutions in America and France at the end of the century generated considerable millenarian excitement and fostered more new religious ideas, often in conjunction with a radical social agenda. Many important writers of the Romantic period were indebted to traditions of protestant dissent: Unitarian and rationalist protestant ideas influenced William Hazlitt, Anna Barbauld, Mary Wollstonecraft, and the young Samuel Taylor Coleridge. William Blake created a highly idiosyncratic poetic mythology loosely indebted to radical strains of Christian mysticism. Others were even more heterodox: Lord Byron and Robert Burns, brought up as Scots

Presbyterians, rebelled fiercely, and Percy Shelley's writing of an atheistic pamphlet resulted in his expulsion from Oxford.

Great Britain never erected an American-style "wall of separation" between church and state, but in practice religion and secular affairs grew more and more distinct during the nineteenth century. In consequence, members of religious minorities no longer seemed to pose a threat to the commonweal. A movement to repeal the Test Act failed in the 1790s, but a renewed effort resulted in the extension of the franchise to dissenting Protestants in 1828 and to Catholics in 1829. The numbers of Roman Catholics in England were swelled by immigration from Ireland, but there were also some prominent English adherents. Among writers, the converts John Newman and Gerard Manley Hopkins are especially important. The political participation and social integration of Jews presented a thornier challenge. Lionel de Rothschild, repeatedly elected to represent London in Parliament during the 1840s and 1850s, was not permitted to take his seat there because he refused to take his oath of office "on the true faith of a Christian"; finally, in 1858, the Jewish Disabilities Act allowed him to omit these words. Only in 1871, however, were Oxford and Cambridge opened to non-Anglicans.

Meanwhile geological discoveries and Charles Darwin's evolutionary theories increasingly cast doubt on the literal truth of the Creation story, and close philological analysis of the biblical text suggested that its origins were human rather than divine. By the end of the nineteenth century, many writers were bearing witness to a world in which Christianity no longer seemed fundamentally plausible. In his poetry and prose, Thomas Hardy depicts a world devoid of benevolent providence. Matthew Arnold's poem "Dover Beach" is in part an elegy to lost spiritual assurance, as the "Sea of Faith" goes out like the tide: "But now I only hear / Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar / Retreating." For Arnold, literature must replace religion as a source of spiritual truth, and intimacy between individuals substitute for the lost communal solidarity of the universal church.

The work of many twentieth-century writers shows the influence of a religious upbringing or a religious conversion in adulthood. T. S. Eliot and W. H. Auden embrace Anglicanism, William Butler Yeats spiritualism. James Joyce repudiates Irish Catholicism but remains obsessed with it. Yet religion, or lack of it, is a matter of individual choice and conscience, not social or legal mandate. Over the past several decades, church attendance has plummeted in Great Britain. Only about 46 percent of the population identified itself as “Christian” on the 2021 census. Meanwhile, immigration from former British colonies as well as other countries has swelled the ranks of religions once uncommon in the British Isles—Muslim, Sikh, Hindu, Buddhist—though the numbers of adherents remain small relative to the total population.

The Universe According to Ptolemy

Ptolemy was a Roman astronomer of Greek descent, born in Egypt during the second century C.E.; for nearly fifteen hundred years after his death his account of the design of the universe was accepted as standard. During that time, the basic pattern underwent many detailed modifications and was fitted out with many astrological and pseudoscientific trappings. But in essence Ptolemy's followers portrayed the earth as the center of the universe, with the sun, planets, and fixed stars set in transparent spheres orbiting around it. In this scheme of things, as modified for Christian usage, Hell was usually placed under the earth's surface at the center of the cosmic globe, while Heaven, the abode of the blessed spirits, was in the outermost, uppermost circle, the empyrean. But in 1543 the Polish astronomer Copernicus proposed an alternative hypothesis—that the earth rotates around the sun, not vice versa; and despite theological opposition, observations with the new telescope and careful mathematical calculations insured ultimate acceptance of the new view.

The map of the Ptolemaic universe below is a simplified version of a diagram in Peter Apian's Cosmography (1584). In such a diagram, the Firmament is the sphere that contained the fixed stars; the Crystalline Sphere, which contained no heavenly bodies, is a late innovation, included to explain certain anomalies in the observed movement of the heavenly bodies; and the Prime Mover is the sphere that, itself put into motion by God, imparts rotation around the earth to all the other spheres.

Milton, writing in the mid-seventeenth century, used two universes. The Copernican universe, though he alludes to it, was too large, formless, and unfamiliar to be the setting for the war between Heaven and Hell in Paradise Lost. He therefore used the Ptolemaic cosmos, but placed Heaven well outside this smaller earth-centered universe, Hell far beneath it, and assigned the vast middle space to Chaos.

General Bibliography

This bibliography consists of a list of suggested general readings on English literature. Bibliographies for the authors and topical clusters in The Norton Anthology of English Literature are available online at the NAEL student site.

Histories of England and of English Literature

Even the most distinguished of the comprehensive general histories written in past generations have come to seem outmoded.

Innovative research in social, cultural, and political history has made it difficult to write a single coherent account of England from the Middle Ages to the present, let alone to accommodate in a unified narrative the complex histories of Scotland, Ireland, Wales, and the other nations where writing in English has flourished. Readers who wish to explore the historical matrix out of which the works of literature collected in this anthology emerged are advised to consult the studies of particular periods listed in the appropriate sections of this bibliography. The multivolume Oxford History of England (1934–65) and New Oxford History of England (1992–2009) are useful, as are the three-volume Peoples of the British Isles: A New History, by Stanford E. Lehmberg, Samantha A. Meigs, and Thomas William Heyck (3rd ed., 1992); the nine-volume Cambridge Cultural History of Britain, ed. Boris Ford (1992); the three-volume Cambridge Social History of Britain, 1750–1950, ed. F. M. L. Thompson (1990); and the multivolume Penguin History of Britain, gen. ed. David Cannadine (1996–). For Britain's imperial history, readers can consult the five-volume Oxford History of the British Empire, ed. Wm. Roger Louis (1998–99), as well as Gender and Empire, ed. Philippa Levine (2004). Also of interest is Lisa Lowe, The Intimacies of Four Continents (2015). Given the cultural centrality of London, readers may find particular interest in The London Encyclopaedia, ed. Ben Weinreb et al. (3rd ed., 2008); Roy Porter, London: A Social History (1994); and Jerry White, London in the Nineteenth Century: "A Human Awful Wonder of God" (2007) and London in the Twentieth Century: A City and Its People (2001).

Similar observations may be made about literary history. In the light of such initiatives as women's studies, New Historicism, and postcolonialism, the range of authors deemed significant has expanded, along with the geographical and conceptual boundaries of literature in English. Attempts to capture in a unified account the great sweep of literature from Beowulf to the early twenty-first century have largely given way to studies of individual genres, carefully delimited time periods, and specific authors. Among the large-scale literary surveys, The Cambridge Guide to Literature in English, ed. Dominic Head (3rd ed., 2006), is useful, as is the nine-volume Penguin History of Literature (1987–94) and the multivolume Oxford History of Poetry in English (2022–). The Feminist Companion to Literature in English: Women Writers from the Middle Ages to the Present, ed. Virginia Blain, Isobel Grundy, and Patricia Clements (1990), is an important resource, and the editorial materials in the two-volume The Norton Anthology of Literature by Women: The Traditions in English, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (3rd ed., 2007), constitute a concise history and set of biographies of women authors since the Middle Ages. Annals of English Literature, 1475–1950 (2nd ed., 1961), lists important publications year by year, together with the significant literary events for each year. Seven volumes have been published in The Oxford English Literary History, gen. eds. Jonathan Bate and Colin Burrow (2002–): Laura Ashe, 1000–1350: Conquest and Transformation; James Simpson, 1350–1547: Reform and Cultural Revolution; Margaret J. M. Ezell, 1645–1714: The Later Seventeenth Century; Philip Davis, 1830–1880: The Victorians; Chris Baldick, 1830–1880: The Modern Movement (1910–1940); Randall Stevenson, 1960–2000: The Last of England?; and Bruce King, 1948–2000: The Internationalization of English Literature. See also The Cambridge History of Medieval English Literature, ed. David Wallace (1999); The Cambridge History of Early Medieval English Literature, ed. Clare E. Lees (2013); The Cambridge History of Early Modern English Literature, ed. David Loewenstein and Janel Mueller (2002); The Cambridge History of English Literature, 1660–1780, ed. John Richetti (2005); The Cambridge History of English Romantic Literature, ed. James Chandler (2009);

The Cambridge History of Victorian Literature, ed. Kate Flint (2012); and The Cambridge History of Twentieth-Century English Literature, ed. Laura Marcus and Peter Nicholls (2004).

Helpful treatments and surveys of English meter, rhyme, and stanza forms are Paul Fussell Jr., Poetic Meter and Poetic Form (rev. ed., 1979); Donald Wesling, The Chances of Rhyme: Device and Modernity (1980); Charles O. Hartman, Free Verse: An Essay on Prosody (1980); Derek Attridge, Poetic Rhythm: An Introduction (1995); Robert Pinsky, The Sounds of Poetry: A Brief Guide (1998); The Making of a Poem: A Norton Anthology of Poetic Forms, ed. Mark Strand and Eavan Boland (2000); John Hollander, Rhyme's Reason: A Guide to English Verse (3rd ed., 2001); Poems, Poets, Poetry: An Introduction and Anthology, ed. Helen Vendler (3rd ed., 2010); The Lyric Theory Reader: A Critical Anthology, ed. Virginia Jackson and Yopie Prins (2014); and Jonathan Culler, Theory of the Lyric (2015).

On the development and functioning of the novel as a form, see Ian Watt, The Rise of the Novel: Studies in Defoe, Richardson, and Fielding (1957); Gérard Genette, Narrative Discourse: An Essay in Method (1970; trans. 1980); Theory of the Novel: A Historical Approach, ed. Michael McKeon (2000); The Novel, ed. Franco Moretti (2 vols.; 2001–03, trans. 2006); McKeon, The Origins of the English Novel, 1600–1740 (15th anniversary ed., 2002); The Cambridge History of the English Novel, ed. Robert L. Caserio and Clement Hawes (2012); A Companion to the English Novel, ed. Stephen Arata et al. (2015); and the ten volumes to date of The Oxford History of the Novel in English (2012–). On women novelists and readers, see Nancy Armstrong, Desire and Domestic Fiction: A Political History of the Novel (1987), and Catherine Gallagher, Nobody's Story: The Vanishing Acts of Women Writers in the Marketplace, 1670–1820 (1994).

On the history of playhouse design, see Richard Leacroft, The Development of the English Playhouse: An Illustrated Survey of Theatre Building in England from Medieval to Modern Times (1988). For a survey of the plays that have appeared on these and other stages, see Allardyce Nicoll, British Drama, rev. J. C. Trewin (6th ed., 1978); the eight-volume The Revels History of Drama in English, gen. eds. Clifford Leech and T. W. Craik (1975–83); Alfred Harbage, Annals of English Drama, 975–1700, rev. S. Schoenbaum and Sylvia Wagonheim (3rd ed., 1989); and the three volumes of The Cambridge History of British Theatre, ed. Jane Milling, Peter Thomson, Joseph Donohue, and Baz Kershaw (2004).

On some of the key intellectual currents that are at once reflected in and shaped by literature and contemporary literary criticism, Arthur O. Lovejoy's classic studies The Great Chain of Being (1936) and Essays in the History of Ideas (1948) remain valuable, along with such works as Georg Simmel, The Philosophy of Money (1900; trans. 1907; 3rd enl. ed., 2004); Ernst Cassirer, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms (4 vols., 1923–95; trans. 1953–96); Arthur O. Lovejoy and George Boas, Primitivism and Related Ideas in Antiquity (1935); Norbert Elias, The Civilizing Process (2 vols., 1939; trans. 1979–82); Simone de Beauvoir, The Second Sex (2 vols., 1949; trans. 1953, new trans. 2009); Frantz Fanon, Black Skin, White Masks (1952; trans. 1957, new trans. 2008); Ernst Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Mediaeval Political Theology (1957; new eds. 1997, 2016); Hannah Arendt, The Human Condition (1958; 2nd ed., 1998); Gaston Bachelard, The Poetics of Space (1958; trans. 1969, new ed. 1994); Richard Popkin, The History of Scepticism from Erasmus to Descartes (1960; rev. ed., 1964; rev. and expanded as The History of Scepticism: From Savonarola to Bayle, 2003); Hans Blumenberg, The Legitimacy of the Modern Age (1966; trans. 1983); M. ## Reference Works

The single most important tool for the study of literature in English is the Oxford English Dictionary (1884–1924; 2nd ed., 1989; 3rd ed. in process). The most current edition, updated quarterly, is available online to subscribers. The OED is written on historical principles: that is, it attempts not only to describe current word use but also to record the history and development of the language from its origins before the Norman Conquest to the present. It thus provides, for familiar as well as archaic and obscure words, the widest possible range of meanings and uses, organized chronologically and illustrated with quotations. The OED can be searched as a conventional dictionary arranged a–z and also by subject, usage, region, origin, and timeline (the first appearance of a word). Resources available for early forms of English include the online Old English and Middle English dictionaries at Lexilogos (https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english\_old.htm and https://www.lexilogos.com/english/english\_middle.htm); also valuable are the Dictionary of Old English (1986–) and the Middle English Dictionary (1952; digitized 2008). Beyond the OED there are many other valuable dictionaries, such as The American Heritage Dictionary (5th ed., 50th anniversary printing, 2018); The Oxford Dictionary of Abbreviations (1992); T. F. Hoad, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of English Etymology (1993); Bas Aarts, Sylvia Chalker, and Edmund Weiner, The Oxford Dictionary of English Grammar (2nd ed., 2014); Morton S. Freeman, A New Dictionary of Eponyms (1997); The Oxford Essential Dictionary of Foreign Terms in English (1999); The Oxford Dictionary of Idioms, ed. Judith Siefring (2nd ed., 2004); P. H. Matthews, The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Linguistics (3rd ed., 2014); Tom McArthur, The Oxford Guide to World English (2002); and The Concise Oxford Dictionary of Proverbs, ed. Jennifer Speake (4th ed., 2003). Other valuable reference works include The Cambridge Encyclopedia of the English Language, ed. David Crystal

(3rd ed., 2018); The Concise Oxford Companion to the English Language, ed. Tom McArthur (1998); Fowler's Concise Dictionary of Modern English Usage, ed. Jeremy Butterfield (3rd ed., 2016); and the numerous guides to specialized vocabularies, slang, regional dialects, and the like.

There is a steady flow of new editions of most major and many minor writers in English, along with the publication of critical appraisals and scholarship. James L. Harner's Literary Research Guide: An Annotated List of Reference Sources in English Literary Studies (6th ed., 2014; available online at www.mla.org/public) offers thorough, evaluative annotations of a wide range of sources. For the historical record of scholarship and critical discussion, The New Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. George Watson (5 vols., 1969–77), and the third edition in process, The Cambridge Bibliography of English Literature, ed. Joanne Shattock (1 vol. to date, 2000–), are useful. The MLA International Bibliography (also online) is a key resource for following critical discussion of literatures in English. Ranging from 1926 to the present, it includes journal articles, essays, chapters from collections, books, and dissertations, and covers folklore, linguistics, and film. The Annual Bibliography of English Language and Literature (ABELL), compiled by the Modern Humanities Research Association, lists monographs, periodical articles, critical editions of literary works, book reviews, and collections of essays published anywhere in the world; unpublished doctoral dissertations are covered for the period 1920–99 (available online to subscribers directly and as part of Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>).

For compact biographies of English authors, see the multivolume Oxford Dictionary of National Biography (DNB), ed. H. C. G. Matthew and Brian Harrison (2004); since 2004 the DNB has been extended online with updates (now monthly). Handy reference books of authors, works, and various literary terms and allusions include many volumes in the Cambridge Companion and Oxford Companion series: e.g., The Cambridge Companion to Narrative, ed. David Herman (2007); The Oxford Companion to English Literature, ed.

Dinah Birch (7th ed., 2009); and The Cambridge Companion to Allegory, ed. Rita Copeland and Peter Struck (2010). The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, editor-in-chief Roland Greene (4th ed., 2012), is available online to subscribers in Oxford Reference. Handbooks that define and illustrate literary concepts and terms include The Penguin Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory, ed. J. A. Cuddon and M. A. R. Habib (5th ed., 2015); William Harmon, A Handbook to Literature (12th ed., 2011); Critical Terms for Literary Study, ed. Frank Lentricchia and Thomas McLaughlin (2nd ed., 1995); and M. H. Abrams and Geoffrey Galt Harpham, A Glossary of Literary Terms (11th ed., 2014). Also useful are Richard A. Lanham, A Handlist of Rhetorical Terms (2nd ed., 1991); Arthur Quinn, Figures of Speech: 60 Ways to Turn a Phrase (1982); the Barnhart Concise Dictionary of Etymology, ed. Robert K. Barnhart (1995); and George A. Kennedy, A New History of Classical Rhetoric (1994).

On Greek and Roman backgrounds, see The Cambridge History of Classical Literature—vol. 1, Greek Literature, ed. P. E. Easterling and Bernard M. W. Knox (1985), and vol. 2, Latin Literature, ed. E. J. Kenney and W. V. Clausen (1982), both available to subscribers online; The Oxford Companion to Classical Literature, ed. M. C. Howatson (3rd ed., 2011); Gian Biagio Conte, Latin Literature: A History (1987; trans. 1994); The Oxford Classical Dictionary, ed. Simon Hornblower, Antony Spawforth, and Esther Eidinow (4th ed., 2012); Richard Rutherford, Classical Literature: A Concise History (2005); and Mark P. O. Morford, Robert J. Lenardon, and Michael Sham, Classical Mythology (11th ed., 2018). The Loeb Classical Library of Greek and Roman texts with facing-page English translations is now available online to subscribers at www.loebclassics.com.

Digital resources in the humanities continue to grow rapidly. Among the many useful electronic resources for the study of English literature are enormous digital archives, available to subscribers: Early English Books Online (EEBO), <http://eebo.chadwyck.com/home>; Literature Online, <http://literature.proquest.com/marketing/index.jsp>; and Eighteenth Century Collections Online (ECCO), www.gale.com/primary-sources/eighteenth-century-collections-online. There are also numerous free sites of variable quality. Many of the best of these are period- or author-specific and hence are listed in the period/author bibliographies on the NAEL website. Among the general sites, one of the most useful and wide-ranging is Voice of the Shuttle (<http://vos.ucsb.edu>), which includes links to Bartleby.com and Project Gutenberg.

Literary Criticism and Theory

The Cambridge History of Literary Criticism comprises nine volumes (1989–2013): Classical Criticism, ed. George A. Kennedy; The Middle Ages, ed. Alastair Minnis and Ian Johnson; The Renaissance, ed. Glyn P. Norton; The Eighteenth Century, ed. H. B. Nisbet and Claude Rawson; Romanticism, ed. Marshall Brown; The Nineteenth Century, c. 1830–1914, ed. M. A. R. Habib; Modernism and the New Criticism, ed. A. Walton Litz, Louis Menand, and Lawrence Rainey; From Formalism to Poststructuralism, ed. Raman Selden; and Twentieth-Century Historical, Philosophical and Psychological Perspectives, ed. Christa Knellwolf and Christopher Norris. See also M. H. Abrams, The Mirror and the Lamp: Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition (1953); William K. Wimsatt Jr. and Cleanth Brooks, Literary Criticism: A Short History (1957); René Wellek, A History of Modern Criticism: 1750–1950 (8 vols., 1955–92); Frank Lentricchia, After the New Criticism (1980); J. Hillis Miller, On Literature (2002); and John Frow, Character and Person (2014). Raman Selden, Peter Widdowson, and Peter Brooker have written A Reader's Guide to Contemporary Literary Theory (6th ed., 2017). Other useful resources include The Johns Hopkins Guide to Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Michael Groden, Martin Kreiswirth, and Imre Szeman (2nd ed., 2005); Literary Theory: An Anthology, ed. Julie Rivkin and Michael Ryan (3rd ed., 2017); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism, gen. ed. Vincent B. Leitch (3rd ed., 2018).

Modern approaches to English literature and literary theory were shaped by certain landmark works: William Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930; 3rd ed., 1953), Some Versions of Pastoral (1935), and The Structure of Complex Words (1951; 3rd ed., 1977); T. S. Eliot, Selected Essays (1932; 3rd ed., 1951) and On Poetry and Poets (1957); F. R. Leavis, Revaluation: Tradition and Development in English Poetry (1936) and The Great Tradition: George Eliot, Henry James, Joseph Conrad (1948); Erich Auerbach, Mimesis: The

Representation of Reality in Western Literature (1946; trans. 1953); Lionel Trilling, The Liberal Imagination: Essays on Literature and Society (1950); William K. Wimsatt Jr., The Verbal Icon: Studies in the Meaning of Poetry (1954); Northrop Frye, Anatomy of Criticism: Four Essays (1957); Wayne C. Booth, The Rhetoric of Fiction (1961; 2nd ed., 1983); and W. Jackson Bate, The Burden of the Past and the English Poet (1970). René Wellek and Austin Warren, Theory of Literature (3rd ed., 1963), is a useful introduction to the variety of scholarly and critical approaches to literature up to the time of its publication. Jonathan Culler's Literary Theory: A Very Short Introduction (2nd ed., 2011), discusses recurrent issues and debates. On the discipline of criticism, see John Guillory's Professing Criticism: Essays on the Organization of Literary Study (2022); Rita Felski's The Limits of Critique (2015) is a critical assessment of contemporary criticism.

Beginning in the late 1960s, interest in literary theory as a specific field markedly intensified. Certain forms of literary study had already been influenced by the work of the Russian linguist Roman Jakobson and the Russian formalist Viktor Shklovsky—and, still more, by conceptions that derived or claimed to derive from Marx and Engels—but the full impact of these theories was not felt until what became known as the “theory revolution” of the 1970s and ’80s. For Marxist literary criticism, see Georg Lukács, Theory of the Novel: A Historico-philosophical Essay on the Forms of Great Epic Literature (1920; trans. 1971), The Historical Novel (1937; trans. 1962), and Studies in European Realism: A Sociological Survey of the Writings of Balzac, Stendhal, Zola, Tolstoy, Gorki, and Others (trans. 1950); Walter Benjamin's essays from the 1920s and ’30s, represented in Illuminations (1955; trans. 1968) and Reflections: Essays, Aphorisms, Autobiographical Writings (1975; trans. 1978); Mikhail Bakhtin's essays from the 1930s represented in The Dialogic Imagination: Four Essays (trans. 1981) and Rabelais and His World (1965; trans. 1968); Selections from the Prison Notebooks of Antonio Gramsci, ed. and trans. Quintin Hoare and Geoffrey Nowell Smith (1971); Raymond Williams, Marxism and Literature (1977);

Tony Bennett, Formalism and Marxism (1979; 2nd ed., 2003); Fredric Jameson, The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act (1981); and Terry Eagleton, Literary Theory: An Introduction (1983; anniversary ed., 2008) and The Ideology of the Aesthetic (1990).

Structural linguistics and anthropology gave rise to a flowering of structuralist literary criticism; convenient introductions include Robert Scholes, Structuralism in Literature: An Introduction (1974), and Jonathan Culler, Structuralist Poetics: Structuralism, Linguistics and the Study of Literature (new ed., 2002). Poststructuralist challenges to this approach are epitomized in such influential works as Jacques Derrida, Writing and Difference (1967; trans. 1978), and Paul de Man, Blindness and Insight: Essays in the Rhetoric of Contemporary Criticism (1971; 2nd ed., 1983). Poststructuralism is discussed in Jonathan Culler, On Deconstruction: Theory and Criticism after Structuralism (1982; 25th anniversary ed., 2007); Slavoj Žižek, The Sublime Object of Ideology (1989); Fredric Jameson, Postmodernism; or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism (1991); John McGowan, Postmodernism and Its Critics (1991); and Beyond Structuralism: The Speculations of Theory and the Experience of Reading, ed. Wendell V. Harris (1996). A figure who greatly influenced both structuralism and poststructuralism is Roland Barthes, in Mythologies (1957; trans. 1972, new trans. 2012) and S/Z (1970; trans. 1974). Among other influential contributions to literary theory are the psychoanalytic approach in Harold Bloom, The Anxiety of Influence: A Theory of Poetry (1973; 2nd ed., 1997), and the reader-response approach in Stanley Fish, Is There a Text in This Class? The Authority of Interpretive Communities (1980). For a retrospect on these decades, see Terry Eagleton, After Theory (2003).

Influenced by these theoretical currents but not restricted to them, modern feminist literary criticism was fashioned by such works as Patricia Meyer Spacks, The Female Imagination (1975); Ellen Moers, Literary Women (1976; new ed., 1986); Elaine Showalter, A Literature of Their Own: British Women Novelists from Brontë to Lessing (1977; expanded ed., 1999); and Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, The Madwoman in the Attic: The Woman Writer and the Nineteenth-Century Literary Imagination (1979). Subsequent studies include Jane Gallop, The Daughter's Seduction: Feminism and Psychoanalysis (1982); Luce Irigaray, This Sex Which Is Not One (1977; trans. 1985); Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak, In Other Worlds: Essays in Cultural Politics (1987; new ed., 2006); Barbara Johnson, A World of Difference (1987); Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar, No Man's Land: The Place of the Woman Writer in the Twentieth Century (3 vols., 1988–94); Judith Butler, Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity (1990; 2nd ed., 1999); and the critical views sampled in The New Feminist Criticism: Essays on Women, Literature, and Theory, ed. Elaine Showalter (1985); Feminist Literary Theory: A Reader, ed. Mary Eagleton (1986; 3rd ed., 2011); and Feminisms: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism, ed. Robyn R. Warhol and Diane Price Herndl (1991; rev. in 2009 as Feminisms Redux: An Anthology of Literary Theory and Criticism); The Hélène Cixous Reader, ed. Susan Sellers (1994); The Cambridge Companion to Feminist Literary Theory, ed. Ellen Rooney (2006); and Feminist Literary Theory and Criticism: A Norton Reader, ed. Sandra M. Gilbert and Susan Gubar (2007).

Just as feminist critics used poststructuralist and psychoanalytic methods to place literature in conversation with gender theory, a new school emerged placing literature in conversation with critical race theory. Comprehensive introductions include Critical Race Theory: The Key Writings That Formed the Movement, ed. Kimberlé Crenshaw et al. (1995); and Richard Delgado and Jean Stefancic, Critical Race Theory: An Introduction (3rd ed., 2017); and The Routledge Companion to Race and Ethnicity, ed. Stephen M. Caliendo and Charlton D. McIlwain (2nd ed., 2021). For an important precursor in cultural studies, see Stuart Hall et al., Policing the Crisis: Mugging, the State and Law and Order (1978; 2nd ed., 2013). Seminal works include Henry Louis Gates Jr., The Signifying Monkey: A Theory of African-American Literary Criticism (1988; 25th anniversary ed., 2014); Patricia Williams, The Alchemy of Race and

Rights (1991); Toni Morrison, Playing in the Dark: Whiteness and the Literary Imagination (1992); Cornel West, Race Matters (1993; 25th anniversary ed., 2017); Gene Andrew Jarrett, Representing the Race: A New Political History of African American Literature (2011); Fred Moten, Black and Blur (2017); and Saidiya V. Hartman, Wayward Lives, Beautiful Experiments: Intimate Histories of Social Upheaval (2019). Other important works include Kathleen Davis, Periodization and Sovereignty: How Ideas of Feudalism and Secularization Govern the Politics of Time (2008; rpt. 2017); Alexander G. Weheliye, Habeas Viscus: Racializing Assemblages, Biopolitics, and Black Feminist Theories of the Human (2014); Christina Sharpe, In the Wake: On Blackness and Being (2016); and Geraldine Heng, The Invention of Race in the European Middle Ages (2018). Helpful anthologies and collections of essays have emerged in recent decades, such as The Oxford Companion to African American Literature, ed. William L. Andrews, Frances Smith Foster, and Trudier Harris (1997), and also their Concise Oxford Companion to African American Literature (2001); Unchained Voices: An Anthology of Black Authors in the English-Speaking World of the Eighteenth Century, ed. Vincent Carretta (1996; updated 2003); The Cambridge Companion to Jewish American Literature, ed. Hana Wirth-Nesher and Michael P. Kramer (2003); A Companion to African American Literature, ed. Gene Andrew Jarrett (2010); The Routledge Companion to Anglophone Caribbean Literature, ed. Michael A. Bucknor and Alison Donnell (2011); The Routledge Companion to Latino/a Literature, ed. Suzanne Bost and Frances R. Aparicio (2013); The Routledge Companion to Asian American and Pacific Islander Literature, ed. Rachel C. Lee (2014); The Cambridge Companion to Asian American Literature, ed. Crystal Parikh and Daniel Y. Kim (2015); and The Cambridge Companion to British Black and Asian Literature, 1945–2010, ed. Deirdre Osborne (2016).

Gay literature and queer studies are represented in collections including Inside/Out: Lesbian Theories, Gay Theories, ed. Diana Fuss (1991); The Lesbian and Gay Studies Reader, ed. Henry Abelove, Michèle Aina Barale, and David Halperin (1993); The Columbia

Anthology of Gay Literature: Readings from Western Antiquity to the Present Day, ed. Byrne R. S. Fone (1998); The Cambridge History of Gay and Lesbian Literature, ed. E. L. McCallum and Mikko Tuhkanen (2014); and The Cambridge Companion to Lesbian Literature, ed. Jodie Medd (2015), and by such books as Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Between Men: English Literature and Male Homosocial Desire (1985; 30th anniversary ed., 2015) and Epistemology of the Closet (1990; updated ed., 2008); Diana Fuss, Essentially Speaking: Feminism, Nature, and Difference (1989); Terry Castle, The Apparitional Lesbian: Female Homosexuality and Modern Culture (1993); Leo Bersani, Homos (1995); Gregory Woods, A History of Gay Literature: The Male Tradition (1998); David Halperin, How to Do the History of Homosexuality (2002); Judith Halberstam, In a Queer Time and Place: Transgender Bodies, Subcultural Lives (2005); Heather Love, Feeling Backward: Loss and the Politics of Queer History (2007); and Brian Glavey, The Wallflower Avant-garde: Modernism, Sexuality, and Queer Ekphrasis (2016).

New Historicism is represented in Stephen Greenblatt, Learning to Curse: Essays in Early Modern Culture (1990; new ed., 2007); New Historical Literary Study: Essays on Reproducing Texts, Representing History, ed. Jeffrey N. Cox and Larry J. Reynolds (1993); The New Historicism Reader, ed. H. Aram Veeser (1994); and Catherine Gallagher and Stephen Greenblatt, Practicing New Historicism (2000). The related social and historical dimension of texts is discussed in Jerome McGann, Critique of Modern Textual Criticism (1983), and Scholarly Editing: A Guide to Research, ed. D. C. Greetham (1995). Characteristic of New Historicism is an expansion of the field of literary interpretation still further in cultural studies; for a broad sampling of the range of interests, see Cultural Studies, ed. Lawrence Grossberg, Cary Nelson, and Paula A. Treichler (1992); A Cultural Studies Reader: History, Theory, Practice, ed. Jessica Munns and Gita Rajan (1995); and The Cultural Studies Reader, ed. Simon During (3rd ed., 2007).

and The Wretched of the Earth (1961; trans. 1963, 60th anniversary ed. 2021); Edward Said, Orientalism (1978) and Culture and Imperialism (1993); Nation and Narration, ed. Homi K. Bhabha (1990); The Post-Colonial Studies Reader, ed. Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths and Helen Tiffin (2nd ed., 2006); and such influential books as Bill Ashcroft, Gareth Griffiths, and Helen Tiffin, The Empire Writes Back: Theory and Practice in Post-Colonial Literatures (1989; 2nd ed., 2002); Homi K. Bhabha, The Location of Culture (1994; new ed., 2004); Elleke Boehmer, Colonial and Postcolonial Literature: Migrant Metaphors (1995; 2nd ed., 2005); Dipesh Chakrabarty, Provincializing Europe: Postcolonial Thought and Historical Difference (2000; new ed., 2008); and Robert J. C. Young, Postcolonialism: An Historical Introduction (2001; anniversary ed., 2016). Useful collections include The Cambridge History of Postcolonial Literature, ed. Ato Quayson (2 vols., 2011–12); The Cambridge Companion to the Postcolonial Novel, ed. Ato Quayson (2016); and The Cambridge Companion to Postcolonial Poetry, ed. Jahan Ramazani (2017).

In the wake of the theory revolution, critics have focused on a wide array of topics, which can be only briefly surveyed here. One current of work, focusing on the history of emotion, is represented in Brian Massumi, Parables for the Virtual: Movement, Affect, Sensation (2002); Sianne Ngai, Ugly Feelings (2005); The Affect Theory Reader, ed. Melissa Gregg and Gregory J. Seigworth (2010); and Judith Butler, Senses of the Subject (2015). A somewhat related current, examining the special role of traumatic memory in literature, is exemplified in Trauma: Explorations in Memory, ed. Cathy Caruth (1995), and Dominic LaCapra, Writing History, Writing Trauma (2001; new ed., 2014). Work on the literary implications of cognitive science may be glimpsed in Introduction to Cognitive Cultural Studies, ed. Lisa Zunshine (2010). Interest in quantitative approaches to literature was sparked by Franco Moretti's Graphs, Maps, Trees: Abstract Models for Literary History (2005). For the field of digital humanities, see Moretti, Distant Reading (2013); Defining Digital Humanities: A Reader, ed. Melissa Terras, Julianne Nyhan, and Edward Vanhoutte (2013); and A New Companion to

Digital Humanities, ed. Susan Schreibman, Ray Siemens, and John Unsworth (2016). For ecocriticism, or studies of literature and the environment, see The Ecocriticism Reader: Landmarks in Literary Ecology, ed. Cheryll Glotfelty and Harold Fromm (1996); Writing the Environment: Ecocriticism and Literature, ed. Richard Kerridge and Neil Sammells (1998); Jonathan Bate, The Song of the Earth (2000); Lawrence Buell, The Future of Environmental Criticism: Environmental Crisis and Literary Imagination (2005); Timothy Morton, Ecology Without Nature: Rethinking Environmental Aesthetics (2007); Jane Bennett, Vibrant Matter: A Political Ecology of Things (2010); Rob Nixon, Slow Violence and the Environmentalism of the Poor (2011); The Oxford Handbook of Ecocriticism, ed. Greg Garrard (2014); and Anthropocene Reading: Literary History in Geologic Times, ed. Tobias Menely and Jesse Oak Taylor (2017). Related are the fields of animal studies and posthumanism, whose key works include Bruno Latour, We Have Never Been Modern (1991; trans. 1993); Steve Baker, The Postmodern Animal (2000); Cary Wolfe, Animal Rites: American Culture, the Discourse of Species, and Posthumanist Theory (2003) and What Is Posthumanism? (2009); Jacques Derrida, The Animal That Therefore I Am (2006; trans. 2008); Kari Weil, Thinking Animals: Why Animal Studies Now? (2012); Animals and the Human Imagination: A Companion to Animal Studies, ed. Aaron Gross and Anne Vallely (2012); and Critical Animal Studies: Thinking the Unthinkable, ed. John Sorenson (2014). The relationship between literature and law is central to such works as Interpreting Law and Literature: A Hermeneutic Reader, ed. Sanford Levinson and Steven Mailloux (1988); Law's Stories: Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law, ed. Peter Brooks and Paul Gewirtz (1996); Literature and Legal Problem Solving: Law and Literature as Ethical Discourse, ed. Paul J. Heald (1998); and New Directions in Law and Literature, ed. Elizabeth S. Anker and Bernadette Meyler (2017). Ethical questions in literature have been usefully explored by, among others, Geoffrey Galt Harpham in Getting It Right: Language, Literature, and Ethics (1992) and Derek Attridge in The Singularity of Literature (2004). Finally, some approaches to literature, such as formalism and literary biography, that seemed superseded in the theoretical ferment of the late twentieth century have had a resurgence. A renewed interest in form is evident in Susan Stewart, Poetry and the Fate of the Senses (2002); Reading for Form, ed. Susan J. Wolfson and Marshall Brown (2006); and Caroline Levine, Forms: Whole, Rhythm, Hierarchy, Network (2015). Interest in the history of the book was spearheaded by D. F. McKenzie's Bibliography and the Sociology of Texts (1986), Jerome J. McGann's The Textual Condition (1991), and Roger Chartier's The Order of Books: Readers, Authors, and Libraries in Europe Between the Fourteenth and Eighteenth Centuries (1992; trans. 1994). See also The Practice and Representation of Reading in England, ed. James Raven, Helen Small, and Naomi Tadmor (1996); The Cambridge History of the Book in Britain (7 vols., 1999–2019); The Book History Reader, ed. David Finkelstein and Alistair McCleery (2nd ed., 2006); and The Cambridge Companion to the History of the Book, ed. Leslie Howsam (2015). For studies in new media and digital or electronic literature, see N. Katherine Hayles, Electronic Literature: New Horizons for the Literary (2008); Matthew G. Kirschenbaum, Track Changes: A Literary History of Word Processing (2016); and Jessica Pressman's Bookishness: Loving Books in a Digital Age (2020).

Anthologies representing a range of recent approaches include Modern Criticism and Theory, ed. David Lodge with Nigel Wood (2nd ed., 2000); Contemporary Literary Criticism, ed. Robert Con Davis and Ronald Schleifer (4th ed., 1998); and The Norton Anthology of Theory and Criticism (cited above).

Literary Terminology*

Using simple technical terms can sharpen our understanding and streamline our discussion of literary works. Some terms, such as the ones in section A, below, help us address the internal style, structure, form, and kind of works. Other terms, such as those in section B, provide insight into the material forms in which literary works have been produced.

In analyzing what they called “rhetoric,” ancient Greek and Roman writers determined the elements of what we call “style” and “structure.” Most of our literary terms are derived, via medieval and Renaissance intermediaries, from the Greek and Latin sources. In the definitions that follow, the etymology, or root, of the word is given when it helps illuminate the word’s current usage.

Many of the examples are drawn from texts in The Norton Anthology of English Literature.

Words boldfaced within definitions are themselves defined in this appendix. Some terms are defined within definitions; such words are italicized.

A. Terms of Style, Structure, Form, and Kind

accent (synonym "stress"): a term of rhythm. The special force devoted to the voicing of one syllable in a word over others. In the noun "accent," for example, the accent, or stress, is on the first syllable.

act: the major subdivision of a play, usually divided into scenes.

aesthetics (from Greek, "to feel, apprehend by the senses"): the philosophy of artistic meaning as a distinct mode of apprehending untranslatable truth, defined as an alternative to rational enquiry, which is purely abstract. Developed in the late eighteenth century by the German philosopher Immanuel Kant especially.

Alexandrine: a term of meter. In French verse a line of twelve syllables, and, by analogy, in English verse a line of six stresses. See hexameter.

a llegory (Greek "saying otherwise"): saying one thing (the "vehicle" of the allegory) and meaning another (the allegory's "tenor"). Allegories may be momentary aspects of a work, as in metaphor ("John is a lion"), or, through extended metaphor, may constitute the basis of narrative, as in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress: this second meaning is the dominant one. See also symbol and type. Allegory is one of the most significant figures of thought.

a lliteration (from Latin "litera," alphabetic letter): a figure of speech. The repetition of an initial consonant sound or consonant cluster in consecutive or closely positioned words. This pattern is often an inseparable part of the meter in Germanic languages, where the tonic, or accented syllable, is usually the first syllable.

Thus all Old English poetry and some varieties of Middle English poetry use alliteration as part of their basic metrical practice. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 1: "Once the siege and assault of Troy had ceased" (see vol. A, p. 415). Otherwise used for local effects; Stevie Smith, "Pretty," lines 4–5: "And in the pretty pool the pike stalks / He stalks his prey . . ." (see vol. F, p. 589).

allusion: Literary allusion is a passing but illuminating reference within a literary text to another, well-known text (often biblical or classical). Topical allusions are also, of course, common in certain modes, especially satire.

anagnorisis (Greek "recognition"): the moment of protagonist's recognition in a narrative, which is also often the moment of moral understanding.

anapest: a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two unstressed (uu) syllables followed by one stressed (/). Thus, for example, "Illinois."

anaphora (Greek "carrying back"): a figure of speech. The repetition of words or groups of words at the beginning of consecutive sentences, clauses, or phrases. Blake, "London," lines 5–8: "In every cry of every Man, / In every Infant's cry of fear, / In every voice, in every ban . . ." (see vol. D, p. 137); Louise Bennett, "Jamaica Oman," lines 17–20: "Some backa man a push, some side-a / Man a hole him han, / Some a lick sense eena him head, / Some a guide him pon him plan!" (see vol. F, p. 724).

a nimal fable: a genre. A short narrative of speaking animals, followed by moralizing comment, written in a low style and gathered into a collection. Robert Henryson, "The Cock and the Jasper" (see vol. A, p. 679).

a ntithesis (Greek "placing against"): a figure of thought. The juxtaposition of opposed terms in clauses or sentences that are next to or near each other. Milton, Paradise Lost 1.777–80: "They but now who seemed / In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons / Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room / Throng numberless" (see vol. B, p. 1448).

a postrophe (from Greek "turning away"): a figure of thought.

An address, often to an absent person, a force, or a quality. For example, a poet makes an apostrophe to a Muse when invoking her for inspiration.

apposition: a term of syntax. The repetition of elements serving an identical grammatical function in one sentence. The effect of this repetition is to arrest the flow of the sentence, but in doing so to add extra semantic nuance to repeated elements. This is an especially important feature of Old English poetic style. See, for example, Caedmon's Hymn (vol. A, p. 31), where the phrases "heaven-kingdom's Guardian," "the Measurer's might," "his mind-plans," and "the work of the Glory-Father" each serve an identical syntactic function as the direct objects of "praise."

a ubade (originally from Spanish "alba," dawn): a genre. A lover's dawn song or lyric bewailing the arrival of the day and the necessary separation of the lovers; Donne, "The Sun Rising" (see vol. B, p. 888). Larkin recasts the genre in "Aubade" (see vol. F, p. 795).

a utobiography (Greek "self-life writing"): a genre. A narrative of a life written by the subject; Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391). There are subgenres, such as the spiritual autobiography, narrating the author's path to conversion and subsequent spiritual trials, as in Bunyan's Grace Abounding.

ballad stanza: a verse form. Usually a quatrain in alternating iambic tetrameter and iambic trimeter lines, rhyming abcb. See "Sir Patrick Spens" (vol. D, p. 38 ); Louise Bennett's poems (vol. F, pp. 719–24); Eliot, "Sweeney among the Nightingales" (vol. F, p. 501 ); Larkin, "This Be The Verse" (vol. F, p. 795 ).

ballade: a verse form. A form consisting usually of three stanzas followed by a four-line envoi (French, "send off"). The last line of the first stanza establishes a refrain, which is repeated, or subtly varied, as the last line of each stanza. The form was derived from French medieval poetry; English poets, from the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries especially, used it with varying stanza forms. Chaucer, "The Complaint of Chaucer to His Purse" (see vol. A, p. 575).

bathos (Greek "depth"): a figure of thought. A sudden and sometimes ridiculous descent of tone; Pope, The Rape of the Lock 3.157–58: "Not louder shrieks to pitying heaven are cast, / When husbands, or when lapdogs breathe their last" (see vol. C, p. 549).

beast epic: a genre. A continuous, unmoralized narrative, in prose or verse, relating the victories of the wholly unscrupulous but brilliant strategist Reynard the Fox over all adversaries. Chaucer arouses, only to deflate, expectations of the genre in The Nun's Priest's Tale (see vol. A, p. 556).

biography (Greek "life-writing"): a genre. A life as the subject of an extended narrative.

blank verse: a verse form. Unrhymed iambic pentameter lines. Blank verse has no stanzas, but is broken up into uneven units (verse paragraphs) determined by sense rather than form. First devised in English by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, in his translation of two books of Virgil's Aeneid, this very flexible verse type became the standard form for dramatic poetry in the seventeenth century, as in most of Shakespeare's plays. Milton and Wordsworth, among many others, also used it to create an English equivalent to classical epic.

blazon: strictly, a heraldic shield; in rhetorical usage, a topos whereby the individual elements of a beloved's face and body are singled out for hyperbolic admiration. Spenser, Epithalamion, lines 167–84 (see vol. B, p. 459). For an inversion of the topos, see Shakespeare, Sonnet 130 (vol. B, p. 637).

burlesque (French and Italian "mocking"): a work that adopts the conventions of a genre with the aim less of comically mocking the genre than of satirically mocking the society so represented (see satire). Thus Pope's Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537) does not mock classical epic so much as contemporary mores.

caesura (Latin "cut") (plural "caesurae"): a term of meter. A pause or breathing space within a line of verse, generally occurring between syntactic units; Louise Bennett, "Colonization in Reverse," lines 5–8: "By de hundred, by de tousan, / From country an from town, / By de ship-load, by de plane-load, / Jamaica is Englan boun" (see vol. F, p. 722), where the caesurae occur in lines 5 and 7.

canon (Greek "rule"): the group of texts regarded as worthy of special respect or attention by a given institution. Also, the group of texts regarded as definitely having been written by a certain author.

catastrophe (Greek "overturning"): the decisive turn in tragedy by which the plot is resolved and, usually, the protagonist dies.

catharsis (Greek "cleansing"): According to Aristotle, the effect of tragedy on its audience, through their experience of pity and terror, was a kind of spiritual cleansing, or catharsis.

character (Greek "stamp, impression"): a person, personified animal, or other figure represented in a literary work, especially in narrative and drama. The more a character seems to generate the action of a narrative, and the less he or she seems merely to serve a preordained narrative pattern, the “fuller,” or more “rounded,” a character is said to be. A “stock” character, common particularly in many comic genres, will perform a predictable function in different works of a given genre.

chiasmus (Greek “crosswise”): a figure of speech. The inversion of an already established sequence. This can involve verbal echoes: Pope, “Eloisa to Abelard,” line 104, “The crime was common, common be the pain” (see vol. C, p. 560); or it can be purely a matter of syntactic inversion: Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, line 8: “They pierce my thickets, through my grot they glide” (see vol. C, p. 575).

classical, classicism, classic: Each term can be widely applied, but in English literary discourse, “classical” primarily describes the works of either Greek or Roman antiquity. “Classicism” denotes the practice of art forms inspired by classical antiquity, in particular the observance of rhetorical norms of decorum and balance, as opposed to following the dictates of untutored inspiration, as in Romanticism. “Classic” denotes an especially famous work within a given canon.

climax (Greek “ladder”): a moment of great intensity and structural change, especially in drama. Also a figure of speech whereby a sequence of verbally linked clauses is made, in which each successive clause is of greater consequence than its predecessor. Bacon, Of Studies: “Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments, and for abilities. Their chief use for pastimes is in privateness and retiring; for ornament, is in discourse; and for ability, is in judgement” (see vol. B, pp. 1167–68).

comedy: a genre. A term primarily applied to drama, and derived from ancient drama, in opposition to tragedy. Comedy deals with humorously confusing, sometimes ridiculous situations in which the ending is, nevertheless, happy. A comedy often ends in one or more marriages.

comic mode: Many genres (for example, romance, fabliau, comedy) involve a happy ending in which justice is done, the ravages of time are arrested, and that which is lost is found. Such genres participate in a comic mode.

connotation: To understand connotation, we need to understand denotation. While many words can denote the same concept—that is, have the same basic meaning—those words can evoke different associations, or connotations. Contrast, for example, the clinical-sounding term “depression” and the more colorful, musical, even poetic phrase “the blues.”

consonance (Latin “sounding with”): a figure of speech. The repetition of final consonants in words or stressed syllables whose vowel sounds are different. Herbert, “Easter,” line 13: “Consort, both heart and lute . . .” (see vol. B, p. 1183).

convention: a repeatedly recurring feature (in either form or content) of works, occurring in combination with other recurring formal features, which constitutes a convention of a particular genre.

couplet: a verse form. In English verse two consecutive, rhyming lines usually containing the same number of stresses. Chaucer first introduced the iambic pentameter couplet into English (Canterbury Tales); the form was later used in many types of writing, including drama; imitations and translations of classical epic (thus heroic couplet); essays; and satire (see Dryden and Pope). The distich (Greek “two lines”) is a couplet usually making complete sense; Aemilia Lanyer, Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum, lines 5–6: “Read it fair queen, though it defective be, / Your excellence can grace both it and me” (see vol. B, p. 925).

dactyl (Greek “finger,” because of the finger’s three joints): a term of rhythm. A three-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of one stressed followed by two unstressed syllables. Thus, for example, “Oregon.”

decorum (Latin “that which is fitting”): a rhetorical principle whereby each formal aspect of a work should be in keeping with its subject matter and/or audience.

deixis (Greek “pointing”): relevant to point of view. Every work has, implicitly or explicitly, a “here” and a “now” from which it is narrated. Words that refer to or imply this point from which the voice of the work is projected (such as “here,” “there,” “this,” “that,” “now,” “then”) are examples of deixis, or “deictics.” This technique is especially important in drama, where it is used to create a sense of the events happening as the spectator witnesses them.

denotation: A word has a basic, “prosaic” (factual) meaning prior to the associations it connotes (see connotation). The word “steed,” for example, might call to mind a horse fitted with battle gear, to be ridden by a warrior, but its denotation is simply “horse.”

d enouement (French “unknotting”): the point at which a narrative can be resolved and so ended.

dialogue (Greek “conversation”): a genre. Dialogue is a feature of many genres, especially in both the novel and drama. As a genre itself, dialogue is used in philosophical traditions especially (most famously in Plato’s Dialogues), as the representation of a conversation in which a philosophical question is pursued among various speakers.

d iction, or “lexis” (from, respectively, Latin dictio and Greek lexis, each meaning “word”): the actual words used in any utterance—speech, writing, and, for our purposes here, literary works. The choice of words contributes significantly to the style of a given work.

d idactic mode (Greek “teaching mode”): Genres in a didactic mode are designed to instruct or teach, sometimes explicitly (for example, sermons, philosophical discourses, georgic), and sometimes through the medium of fiction (for example, animal fable, parable).

diegesis (Greek for "narration"): a term that simply means "narration," but is used in literary criticism to distinguish one kind of story from another. In a mimetic story, the events are played out before us (see mimesis), whereas in diegesis someone recounts the story to us. Drama is for the most part mimetic, whereas the novel is for the most part diegetic. In novels the narrator is not, usually, part of the action of the narrative; s/he is therefore extradiegetic.

dimeter (Greek "two measure"): a term of meter. A two-stress line, rarely used as the meter of whole poems, though used with great frequency in single poems by Skelton, for example, "The Tunning of Elinour Rummung" (see vol. B, p. 41). Otherwise used for single lines, as in Herbert, "Discipline," line 3: "O my God" (see vol. B, p. 1197).

discourse (Latin "running to and fro"): broadly, any nonfictional speech or writing; as a more specific genre, a philosophical meditation on a set theme.

dramatic irony: a feature of narrative and drama, whereby the audience knows that the outcome of an action will be the opposite of that intended by a character.

dramatic monologue (Greek "single speaking"): a genre. A poem in which the voice of a historical or fictional character speaks, unmediated by any narrator, to an implied though silent audience. See Tennyson, "Ulysses" (vol. E, p. 217 ); Browning, "The Bishop Orders His Tomb" (vol. E, p. 416 ); Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (vol. F, p. 498 ); Carol Ann Duffy, "Medusa" and "Mrs Lazarus" (vol. F).

ecphrasis (Greek "speaking out"): a topos whereby a work of visual art is represented in a literary work. Auden, "Musée des Beaux Arts" (see vol. F, p. 677).

elegy: a genre. In classical literature elegy was a form written in elegiac couplets (a hexameter followed by a pentameter) devoted to many possible topics. In Ovidian elegy a lover meditates on the trials of erotic desire (for example, Ovid's Amores). The sonnet sequences of both Sidney and Shakespeare exploit this genre, and, while it was still practiced in classical tradition by Donne ("On His Mistress" see vol. B, [p. 903]), by the later seventeenth century the term came to denote the poetry of loss, especially through the death of a loved person. See Tennyson, In Memoriam (vol. E, p. 231); Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats" (see vol. F, p. 677); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. F).

emblem (Greek "an insertion"): a figure of thought. A picture allegorically expressing a moral, or a verbal picture open to such interpretation.

end-stopping: the placement of a complete syntactic unit within a complete poetic line, fulfilling the metrical pattern; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," line 42: "Earth, receive an honoured guest" (see vol. F, p. 679). Compare enjambment.

enjambment (French "striding," encroaching): The opposite of end-stopping, enjambment occurs when the syntactic unit does not end with the end of the poetic line and the fulfillment of the metrical pattern. When the sense of the line overflows its meter and, therefore, the line break, we have enjambment; Auden, "In Memory of W. B. Yeats," lines 44–45: "Let the Irish vessel lie / Emptied of its poetry" (see vol. F, p. 679).

epic (synonym, heroic poetry): a genre. An extended narrative poem celebrating martial heroes, invoking divine inspiration, beginning in medias res (see order), written in a high style (including the deployment of epic similes; on high style, see register), and divided into long narrative sequences. Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Aeneid were the prime models for English writers of epic verse. Thus Milton, Paradise Lost (see vol. B, p. 1429); Wordsworth, The Prelude (see vol. D, p. 391); and Walcott, Omeros (see vol. F, p. 808). With its precise repertoire of stylistic resources, epic lent itself easily to parodic and burlesque forms, known as mock epic; thus Pope, The Rape of the Lock (see vol. C, p. 537).

epigram: a genre. A short, pithy poem wittily expressed, often with wounding intent. See Jonson, Epigrams (see vol. B, p. 1049).

epigraph (Greek “inscription”): a genre. Any formal statement inscribed on stone; also the brief formulation on a book’s title page, or a quotation at the beginning of a poem, introducing the work’s themes in the most compressed form possible.

epistle (Latin “letter”): a genre. The letter can be shaped as a literary form, involving an intimate address often between equals. The Epistles of Horace provided a model for English writers from the sixteenth century. Thus Wyatt, “Mine Own John Pains” (see vol. B, p. 131), or Leapor, “An Epistle to a Lady” (vol. C, p. 771). Letters can be shaped to form the matter of an extended fiction, as the eighteenth-century epistolary novel (for example, Samuel Richardson’s Pamela).

epithalamion (Greek “concerning the bridal chamber”): a genre. A wedding poem, celebrating the marriage and wishing the couple good fortune. Thus Spenser, Epithalamion (see vol. B, p. 455).

epyllion (plural “epyllia”) (Greek: “little epic”): a genre. A relatively short poem in the meter of epic poetry. See, for example, Marlowe, Hero and Leander (vol. B, p. 562).

essay (French “trial, attempt”): a genre. An informal philosophical meditation, usually in prose and sometimes in verse. The journalistic periodical essay was developed in the early eighteenth century. Thus Addison and Steele, periodical essays (see vol. C, p. 281); Pope, An Essay on Criticism (see vol. C, p. 521).

euphemism (Greek “sweet saying”): a figure of thought. The figure by which something distasteful is described in alternative, less repugnant terms (for example, “he passed away”).

exegesis (Greek “leading out”): interpretation, traditionally of the biblical text, but, by transference, of any text.

exemplum (Latin “example”): an example inserted into a usually nonfictional writing (for example, sermon or essay) to give extra force to an abstract thesis.

fabliau (French “little story,” plural fabliaux): a genre. A short, funny, often bawdy narrative in low style (see register) imitated and developed from French models, most subtly by Chaucer; see The Miller’s Prologue and Tale (vol. A, p. 494).

farce (French “stuffing”): a genre. A play designed to provoke laughter through the often humiliating antics of stock characters. Congreve’s The Way of the World (see vol. C, p. 221) draws on this tradition.

figures of speech: Literary language often employs patterns perceptible to the eye and/or to the ear. Such patterns are called “figures of speech”; in classical rhetoric they were called “schemes” (from Greek schema, meaning “form, figure”).

figures of thought: Language can also be patterned conceptually, even outside the rules that normally govern it. Literary language in particular exploits this licensed linguistic irregularity. Synonyms for figures of thought are “trope” (Greek “twisting,” referring to the irregularity of use) and “conceit” (Latin “concept,” referring to the fact that these figures are perceptible only to the mind). Be careful not to confuse trope with topos (a common error).

first-person narration: relevant to point of view, a narrative in which the voice narrating refers to itself with forms of the first-person pronoun (“I,” “me,” “my,” etc., or possibly “we,” “us,” “our”),

and in which the narrative is determined by the limitations of that voice. Thus Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein.

frame narrative: Some narratives, particularly collections of narratives, involve a frame narrative that explains the genesis of, and/or gives a perspective on, the main narrative or narratives to follow. Thus Chaucer, Canterbury Tales; Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley, Frankenstein; or Conrad, Heart of Darkness.

free indirect style: relevant to point of view, a narratorial voice that manages, without explicit reference, to imply, and often implicitly to comment on, the voice of a character in the narrative itself. Virginia Woolf, "A Sketch of the Past," where the voice, although strictly that of the adult narrator, manages to convey the child's manner of perception: "—I begin: the first memory. This was of red and purple flowers on a black background—my mother's dress."

genre and mode: The style, structure, and, often, length of a work, when coupled with a certain subject matter, raise expectations that a literary work conforms to a certain genre (French "kind"). Good writers might upset these expectations, but they remain aware of the expectations and thwart them purposefully. Works in different genres may nevertheless participate in the same mode, a broader category designating the fundamental perspectives governing various genres of writing. For mode, see tragic, comic, satiric, and didactic modes. Genres are fluid, sometimes very fluid (for example, the novel); the word "usually" should be added to almost every account of the characteristics of a given genre!

georgic (Greek "farming"): a genre. Virgil's Georgics treat agricultural and occasionally scientific subjects, giving instructions on the proper management of farms. Unlike pastoral, which treats the countryside as a place of recreational idleness among shepherds, the georgic treats it as a place of productive labor.

hermeneutics (from the Greek god Hermes, messenger between the gods and humankind): the science of interpretation, first formulated as such by the German philosophical theologian Friedrich Schleiermacher in the early nineteenth century.

hexameter (Greek "six measure"): a term of meter. The hexameter line (a six-stress line) is the meter of classical Latin epic; while not imitated in that form for epic verse in English, some instances of the hexameter exist. See, for example, the last line of a Spenserian stanza, Faerie Queene 1.1.2: "O help thou my weake wit, and sharpen my dull tong" (vol. B, p. 269), or Yeats, "The Lake Isle of Innisfree," line 1: "I will arise and go now, and go to Innisfree" (vol. F, p. 221 ).

homily (Greek "discourse"): a genre. A sermon, to be preached in church; Book of Homilies (see vol. B, p. 164). Writers of literary fiction sometimes exploit the homily, or sermon, as in Chaucer, The Pardoner's Tale (see vol. A, p. 540).

homophone (Greek "same sound"): a figure of speech. A word that sounds identical to another word but has a different meaning ("bear" / "bare").

hyperbaton (Greek "overstepping"): a term of syntax. The rearrangement, or inversion, of the expected word order in a sentence or clause. Gray, "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," line 38: "If Memory o'er their tomb no trophies raise" (vol. C, p. 899). Poets can suspend the expected syntax over many lines, as in the first sentences of the Canterbury Tales (vol. A, p. 474) and of Paradise Lost (vol. B, p. 1430).

hyperbole (Greek "throwing over"): a figure of thought. Overstatement, exaggeration; Marvell, "To His Coy Mistress," lines 11–12: "My vegetable love should grow / Vaster than empires, and more slow" (see vol. B, p. 1273); Auden, "As I Walked Out One Evening," lines 9–12: " 'I'll love you, dear, I'll love you / Till China and Africa meet / And the river jumps over the mountain / And the salmon sing in the street" (see vol. F, p. 675).

hypermetrical (adj.; Greek "over measured"): a term of meter; the word describes a breaking of the expected metrical pattern by at least one extra syllable.

hypotaxis, or subordination (respectively Greek and Latin "ordering under"): a term of syntax. The subordination, by the use of subordinate clauses, of different elements of a sentence to a single main verb. Milton, Paradise Lost 9.513–15: "As when a ship by skillful steersman wrought / Nigh river's mouth or foreland, where the wind / Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail; So varied he" (vol. B, p. 1588). The contrary principle to parataxis.

iamb: a term of rhythm. The basic foot of English verse; two syllables following the rhythmic pattern of unstressed followed by stressed and producing a rising effect. Thus, for example, "Vermont."

imitation: the practice whereby writers strive ideally to reproduce and yet renew the conventions of an older form, often derived from classical civilization. Such a practice will be praised in periods of classicism (for example, the eighteenth century) and repudiated in periods dominated by a model of inspiration (for example, Romanticism).

irony (Greek "dissimulation"): a figure of thought. In broad usage, irony designates the result of inconsistency between a statement and a context that undermines the statement. "It's a beautiful day" is unironic if it's a beautiful day; if, however, the weather is terrible, then the inconsistency between statement and context is ironic. The effect is often amusing; the need to be ironic is sometimes produced by censorship of one kind or another. Strictly, irony is a subset of allegory: whereas allegory says one thing and means another, irony says one thing and means its opposite. For an extended example of irony, see Swift's "Modest Proposal" (vol. C, p. 511). See also dramatic irony.

journal (French "daily"): a genre. A diary, or daily record of ephemeral experience, whose perspectives are concentrated on, and limited by, the experiences of single days. Thus Pepys, Diary (see vol. C, p. 74).

lai: a genre. A short narrative, often characterized by images of great intensity; a French term, and a form practiced by Marie de France (see vol. A, p. 159).

legend (Latin "requiring to be read"): a genre. A narrative of a celebrated, possibly historical, but mortal protagonist. To be distinguished from myth. Thus the "Arthurian legend" but the "myth of Proserpine."

lexical set: Words that habitually recur together (for example, January, February, March, etc.; or red, white, and blue) form a lexical set.

litotes (from Greek "smooth"): a figure of thought. Strictly, understatement by denying the contrary; More, Utopia: "differences of no slight import" (see vol. B, p. 49). More loosely, understatement; Stevie Smith, "Sunt Leones," lines 11–12: "And if the Christians felt a little blue— / Well people being eaten often do" (see vol. F, p. 585).

lullaby: a genre. A bedtime, sleep-inducing song for children, in simple and regular meter. Adapted by Auden, "Lullaby" (see vol. F, p. 671).

lyric (from Greek "lyre"): Initially meaning a song, "lyric" refers to a short poetic form, without restriction of meter, in which the expression of personal emotion, often by a voice in the first person, is given primacy over narrative sequence. Thus "The Wife's Lament"

(see vol. A, p. 126); Yeats, "The Wild Swans at Coole" (see vol. F, p. 229).

masque: a genre. Costly entertainments of the Stuart court, involving dance, song, speech, and elaborate stage effects, in which courtiers themselves participated.

metaphor (Greek "carrying across," etymologically parallel to Latin "translation"): One of the most significant figures of thought, metaphor designates identification or implicit identification of one thing with another with which it is not literally identifiable. Blake, "London," lines 11–12: "And the hapless Soldier's sigh / Runs in blood down Palace walls" (see vol. D, p. 137).

meter: Verse (from Latin versus, turned) is distinguished from prose (from Latin prorsus, "straightforward") as a more compressed form of expression, shaped by metrical norms. Meter (Greek "measure") refers to the regularly recurring sound pattern of verse lines. The means of producing sound patterns across lines differ in different poetic traditions. Verse may be quantitative, or determined by the quantities of syllables (set patterns of long and short syllables), as in Latin and Greek poetry. It may be syllabic, determined by fixed numbers of syllables in the line, as in the verse of Romance languages (for example, French and Italian). It may be accentual, determined by the number of accents, or stresses in the line, with variable numbers of syllables, as in Old English and some varieties of Middle English alliterative verse. Or it may be accentual-syllabic, determined by the numbers of accents, but possessing a regular pattern of stressed and unstressed syllables, so as to produce regular numbers of syllables per line. Since Chaucer, English verse has worked primarily within the many possibilities of accentual-syllabic meter. The unit of meter is the foot. In English verse the number of feet per line corresponds to the number of accents in a line. For the types and examples of different meters, see monometer, dimeter, trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, and

hexameter. In the definitions below, “u” designates one unstressed syllable, and “/” one stressed syllable.

metonymy (Greek “change of name”): one of the most significant figures of thought. Using a word to denote another concept or other concepts, by virtue of habitual association. Thus “The Press,” designating printed news media. Fictional names often work by associations of this kind. Closely related to synecdoche.

mimesis (Greek for “imitation”): A central function of literature and drama has been to provide a plausible imitation of the reality of the world beyond the literary work; mimesis is the representation and imitation of what is taken to be reality.

mise-en-abyme (French for “cast into the abyss”): Some works of art represent themselves in themselves; if they do so effectively, the represented artifact also represents itself, and so ad infinitum. The effect achieved is called “mise-en-abyme.” Hoccleve’s Complaint, for example, represents a depressed man reading about a depressed man. This sequence threatens to become a mise-en-abyme.

monometer (Greek “one measure”): a term of meter. An entire line with just one stress; Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, line 15, “most (u) grand (/)” (see vol. A, p. 415).

myth: a genre. The narrative of protagonists with, or subject to, superhuman powers. A myth expresses some profound foundational truth, often by accounting for the origin of natural phenomena. To be distinguished from legend. Thus the “Arthurian legend” but the “myth of Proserpine.”

novel: an extremely flexible genre in both form and subject matter. Usually in prose, giving high priority to narration of events, with a certain expectation of length, novels are preponderantly rooted in a specific, and often complex, social world; sensitive to the realities of material life; and often focused on one character or a small circle of central characters. By contrast with chivalric romance (the main European narrative genre prior to the novel), novels tend to eschew the marvelous in favor of a recognizable social world and credible action. The novel's openness allows it to participate in all modes, and to be co-opted for a huge variety of subgenres. In English literature the novel dates from the late seventeenth century and has been astonishingly successful in appealing to a huge readership, particularly in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The English and Irish tradition of the novel includes, for example, Fielding, Austen, the Brontë sisters, Dickens, George Eliot, Conrad, Woolf, Lawrence, and Joyce, to name but a few very great exponents of the genre.

novella: a genre. A short novel, often characterized by imagistic intensity. Conrad, Heart of Darkness (see vol. F, p. 70).

occupatio (Latin "taking possession"): a figure of thought. Denying that one will discuss a subject while actually discussing it; also known as "praeteritio" (Latin "passing by"). See Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, lines 414–31 (see vol. A, p. 565).

ode (Greek "song"): a genre. A lyric poem in elevated, or high style (see register), often addressed to a natural force, a person, or an abstract quality. The Pindaric ode in English is made up of stanzas of unequal length, while the Horatian ode has stanzas of equal length. For examples of both types, see, respectively, Wordsworth, "Ode: Intimations of Immortality" (vol. D, p. 381 ); and Marvell, "An Horatian Ode" (vol. B, p. 1282), or Keats, "Ode on Melancholy" (vol. D, p. 973 ). For a fuller discussion, see the headnote to Jonson's "Ode on Cary and Morison" (vol. B, p. 1058–59).

omniscient narrator (Latin "all-knowing narrator"): relevant to point of view. A narrator who, in the fiction of the narrative, has complete access to both the deeds and the thoughts of all characters in the narrative. Thus Thomas Hardy, "On the Western Circuit" (see vol. F, p. 36).

onomatopoeia (Greek “name making”): a figure of speech.

Verbal sounds that imitate and evoke the sounds they denote.

Hopkins, “Binsey Poplars,” lines 10–12 (about some felled trees): “O if we but knew what we do / When we delve [dig] or hew— / Hack and rack the growing green!” (see vol. E, p. 726).

order: A story may be told in different narrative orders. A narrator might use the sequence of events as they happened, and thereby follow what classical rhetoricians called the natural order; alternatively, the narrator might reorder the sequence of events, beginning the narration either in the middle or at the end of the sequence of events, thereby following an artificial order. If a narrator begins in the middle of events, he or she is said to begin in medias res (Latin “in the middle of the matter”). For a brief discussion of these concepts, see Spenser, Faerie Queene, “A Letter of the Authors” (vol. B, p. 265). Modern narratology makes a related distinction, between histoire (French “story”) for the natural order that readers mentally reconstruct, and discours (French, here “narration”) for the narrative as presented. See also plot and story.

ottava rima: a verse form. An eight-line stanza form, rhyming abababcc, using iambic pentameter; Yeats, “Sailing to Byzantium” (see vol. F, p. 234). Derived from the Italian poet Boccaccio, an eight-line stanza was used by fifteenth-century English poets for inset passages (for example, Christ’s speech from the Cross in Lydgate’s Testament, lines 754–897). The form in this rhyme scheme was used in English poetry for long narrative by, for example, Byron (Don Juan; see vol. D, p. 690).

oxymoron (Greek “sharp blunt”): a figure of thought. The conjunction of normally incompatible terms; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.63: “darkness visible” (see vol. B, p. 1431).

panegyric: a genre. Demonstrative, or epideictic (Greek “showing”), rhetoric was a branch of classical rhetoric. Its own two main branches were the rhetoric of praise on the one hand and of vituperation on the other. Panegyric, or eulogy (Greek “sweet speaking”), or encomium (plural encomia), is the term used to describe the speeches or writings of praise.

parable: a genre. A simple story designed to provoke, and often accompanied by, allegorical interpretation, most famously by Christ as reported in the Gospels.

paradox (Greek “contrary to received opinion”): a figure of thought. An apparent contradiction that requires thought to reveal an inner consistency. Chaucer, “Troilus’s Song,” line 12: “O sweete harm so quainte” (see vol. A, p. 574).

parataxis, or coordination (respectively Greek and Latin “ordering beside”): a term of syntax. The coordination, by the use of coordinating conjunctions, of different main clauses in a single sentence. Malory, Morte Darthur: “So Sir Lancelot departed and took his sword under his arm, and so he walked in his mantel, that noble knight, and put himself in great jeopardy” (see vol. A, p. 607). The opposite principle to hypotaxis.

parody: a work that uses the conventions of a particular genre with the aim of comically mocking a topos, a genre, or a particular exponent of a genre. Shakespeare parodies the topos of blazon in Sonnet 130 (see vol. B, p. 637).

pastoral (from Latin pastor, “shepherd”): a genre. Pastoral is set among shepherds, making often refined allusion to other apparently unconnected subjects (sometimes politics) from the potentially idyllic world of highly literary if illiterate shepherds. Pastoral is distinguished from georgic by representing recreational rural idleness, whereas the georgic offers instruction on how to manage rural labor. English writers had classical models in the Idylls of Theocritus in Greek and Virgil’s Eclogues in Latin. Pastoral is also called bucolic (from the Greek word for “herdsman”). Thus Spenser, Shepherd’s Calendar (see vol. B, p. 257).

pathetic fallacy: the attribution of sentiment to natural phenomena, as if they were in sympathy with human feelings. Thus Milton, Lycidas, lines 146–47: “With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head, / And every flower that sad embroidery wears” (see vol. B, p. 1406). For critique of the practice, see Ruskin (who coined the term), “Of the Pathetic Fallacy” (vol. E, p. 467 ).

pentameter (Greek “five measure”): a term of meter. In English verse, a five-stress line. Between the late fourteenth and the nineteenth centuries, this meter, frequently employing an iambic rhythm, was the basic line of English verse. Chaucer, Shakespeare, Milton, and Wordsworth each, for example, deployed this very flexible line as their primary resource; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.128: “O Prince, O Chief of many thronèd Powers” (see vol. B, p. 1433).

performative: Verbal expressions have many different functions. They can, for example, be descriptive, or constative (if they make an argument), or performative, for example. A performative utterance is one that makes something happen in the world by virtue of its utterance. “I hereby sentence you to ten years in prison,” if uttered in the appropriate circumstances, itself performs an action; it makes something happen in the world. By virtue of its performing an action, it is called a “performative.” See also speech act.

peripeteia (Greek “turning about”): the sudden reversal of fortune (in both directions) in a dramatic work.

periphrasis (Greek “declaring around”): a figure of thought. Circumlocution; the use of many words to express what could be expressed in few or one; Sidney, Astrophil and Stella 39.1–4.

persona (Latin “sound through”): originally the mask worn in the Roman theater to magnify an actor’s voice; in literary discourse persona (plural personae) refers to the narrator or speaker of a text, whose voice is coherent and whose person need have no relation to the person of the actual author of a text. Eliot, "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" (see vol. F, p. 498).

personification, or prosopopoeia (Greek "person making"): a figure of thought. The attribution of human qualities to nonhuman forces or objects; Keats, "Ode on a Grecian Urn," lines 1–2: "Thou still unvanish'd bride of quietness, / Thou foster-child of silence and slow time" (see vol. D, p. 971).

plot: the sequence of events in a story as narrated, as distinct from story, which refers to the sequence of events as we reconstruct them from the plot. See also order.

point of view: All of the many kinds of writing involve a point of view from which a text is, or seems to be, generated. The presence of such a point of view may be powerful and explicit, as in many novels, or deliberately invisible, as in much drama. In some genres, such as the novel, the narrator does not necessarily tell the story from a position we can predict; that is, the needs of a particular story, not the conventions of the genre, determine the narrator's position. In other genres, the narrator's position is fixed by convention; in certain kinds of love poetry, for example, the narrating voice is always that of a suffering lover. Not only does the point of view significantly inform the style of a work, but it also informs the structure of that work.

protagonist (Greek "first actor"): the hero or heroine of a drama or narrative.

pun: a figure of thought. A sometimes irresolvable doubleness of meaning in a single word or expression; Shakespeare, Sonnet 135, line 1: "Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will" (see vol. B, p. 637).

quatrain: a verse form. A stanza of four lines, usually rhyming abcb, abab, or abba. Of many possible examples, see Crashaw, "On the Wounds of Our Crucified Lord" (see vol. B, p. 1214).

refrain: usually a single line repeated as the last line of consecutive stanzas, sometimes with subtly different wording and ideally with subtly different meaning as the poem progresses.

register: The register of a word is its stylistic level, which can be distinguished by degree of technicality but also by degree of formality. We choose our words from different registers according to context, that is, audience and/or environment. Thus a chemist in a laboratory will say "sodium chloride," a cook in a kitchen "salt." A formal register designates the kind of language used in polite society (for example, "Mr. President"), while an informal or colloquial register is used in less formal or more relaxed social situations (for example, "the boss"). In classical and medieval rhetoric, these registers of formality were called high style and low style. A middle style was defined as the style fit for narrative, not drawing attention to itself.

rhetoric: the art of verbal persuasion. Classical rhetoricians distinguished three areas of rhetoric: the forensic, to be used in law courts; the deliberative, to be used in political or philosophical deliberations; and the demonstrative, or epideictic, to be used for the purposes of public praise or blame. Rhetorical manuals covered all the skills required of a speaker, from the management of style and structure to delivery. These manuals powerfully influenced the theory of poetics as a separate branch of verbal practice, particularly in the matter of style.

rhyme: a figure of speech. The repetition of identical vowel sounds in stressed syllables whose initial consonants differ ("dead" / "head"). In poetry, rhyme often links the end of one line with another. Masculine rhyme: full rhyme on the final syllable of the line ("decays" / "days"). Feminine rhyme: full rhyme on syllables that are followed by unaccented syllables ("fountains" / "mountains"). Internal rhyme: full rhyme within a single line; Coleridge, The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, line 7: "The guests are met, the feast is set" (see vol. D, p. 475). Rhyme riche: rhyming on homophones;

Chaucer, General Prologue, lines 17–18: “seeke” / “seke.” Off rhyme (also known as half rhyme, near rhyme, or slant rhyme): differs from perfect rhyme in changing the vowel sound and/or the concluding consonants expected of perfect rhyme; Byron, “They say that Hope is Happiness,” lines 5–7: “most” / “lost.” Pararhyme: stressed vowel sounds differ but are flanked by identical or similar consonants; Owen, “Miners,” lines 9–11: “simmer” / “summer” (see vol. F, p. 169).

rhyme royal: a verse form. A stanza of seven iambic pentameter lines, rhyming ababbcc; first introduced by Chaucer and called “royal” because the form was used by James I of Scotland for his Kingis Quair in the early fifteenth century. Chaucer, “Troilus’s Song” (see vol. A, p. 574).

rhythm: Rhythm is not absolutely distinguishable from meter. One way of making a clear distinction between these terms is to say that rhythm (from the Greek “to flow”) denotes the patterns of sound within the feet of verse lines and the combination of those feet. Very often a particular meter will raise expectations that a given rhythm will be used regularly through a whole line or a whole poem. Thus in English verse the pentameter regularly uses an iambic rhythm. Rhythm, however, is much more fluid than meter, and many lines within the same poem using a single meter will frequently exploit different rhythmic possibilities. For examples of different rhythms, see iamb, trochee, anapest, spondee, and dactyl.

romance: a genre. From the twelfth to the sixteenth century, the main form of European narrative, in either verse or prose, was that of chivalric romance. Romance, like the later novel, is a very fluid genre, but romances are often characterized by (i) a tripartite structure of social integration, followed by disintegration, involving moral tests and often marvelous events, itself the prelude to reintegration in a happy ending, frequently of marriage; and (ii) aristocratic social milieux. Thus Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (see vol. A, p. 415); Spenser’s (unfinished) Faerie Queene (vol. B, p.

sarcasm (Greek "flesh tearing"): a figure of thought. A wounding expression, often expressed ironically; Boswell, Life of Johnson: Johnson [asked if any man of the modern age could have written the epic poem Fingal] replied, "Yes, Sir, many men, many women, and many children" (see vol. C, p. 891).

satire (Latin for "a bowl of mixed fruits"): a genre. In Roman literature (for example, Juvenal), the communication, in the form of a letter between equals, complaining of the ills of contemporary society. The genre in this form is characterized by a first-person narrator exasperated by social ills; the letter form; a high frequency of contemporary reference; and the use of invective in low-style language. Pope practices the genre thus in the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (see vol. C, p. 573). Wyatt's "Mine Own John Poins" (see vol. B, p. 131) draws ultimately on a gentler, Horatian model of the genre.

satiric mode: Works in a very large variety of genres are devoted to the more or less savage attack on social ills. Thus Swift's travel narrative Gulliver's Travels (see vol. C, p. 377), his essay "A Modest Proposal" (vol. C, p. 511), and Gay's Beggar's Opera (vol. C, p. 587), to look no further than the eighteenth century, are all within a satiric mode.

scene: a subdivision of an act, itself a subdivision of a dramatic performance and/or text. The action of a scene usually occurs in one place.

sensibility (from Latin, "capable of being perceived by the senses"): as a literary term, an eighteenth-century concept derived from moral philosophy that stressed the social importance of fellow feeling and particularly of sympathy in social relations. The concept generated a literature of "sensibility," such as the sentimental novel (the most famous of which was Goethe's Sorrows of the Young Werther [1774]), or sentimental poetry, such as Cowper's passage on the stricken deer in The Task (see vol. C, p. 1076).

short story: a genre. Generically similar to, though shorter and more concentrated than, the novel; often published as part of a collection. Thus Mansfield, "The Daughters of the Late Colonel" (see vol. F, p. 542).

simile (Latin "like"): a figure of thought. Comparison, usually using the word "like" or "as," of one thing with another so as to produce sometimes surprising analogies. Donne, "The Storm," lines 29–30: "Sooner than you read this line did the gale, / Like shot, not feared till felt, our sails assail." Frequently used, in extended form, in epic poetry; Milton, Paradise Lost 1.338–46 (see vol. B, p. 1438).

soliloquy (Latin "single speaking"): a topos of drama, in which a character, alone or thinking to be alone on stage, speaks so as to give the audience access to his or her private thoughts.

sonnet: a verse form. A form combining a variable number of units of rhymed lines to produce a fourteen-line poem, usually in rhyming iambic pentameter lines. In English there are two principal varieties: the Petrarchan sonnet, formed by an octave (an eight-line stanza, often broken into two quatrains having the same rhyme scheme, typically abba abba) and a sestet (a six-line stanza, typically cdecde or cdcdcd); and the Shakespearean sonnet, formed by three quatrains (abab cdcd efef) and a couplet (gg). The declaration of a sonnet can take a sharp turn, or "volta," often at the decisive formal shift from octave to sestet in the Petrarchan sonnet, or in the final couplet of a Shakespearean sonnet, introducing a trenchant counterstatement. Derived from Italian poetry, and especially from the poetry of Petrarch, the sonnet was first introduced to English poetry by Wyatt, and initially used principally for the expression of unrequited erotic love, though later poets used the form for many other purposes. See Wyatt, "Whoso List to Hunt" (vol. B, p. 123); Sidney, Astrophil and Stella (vol. B, p. 541); Shakespeare, Sonnets (vol. B, p. 624); Wordsworth, "London, 1802" (vol. D, p. 390 ); McKay, "If We Must Die" (vol. F, p. 576 ); Heaney, "Clearances" (vol. F).

speech act: Words and deeds are often distinguished, but words are often (perhaps always) themselves deeds. Utterances can perform different speech acts, such as promising, declaring, casting a spell, encouraging, persuading, denying, lying, and so on. See also performative.

Spenserian stanza: a verse form. The stanza developed by Spenser for The Faerie Queene; nine iambic lines, the first eight of which are pentameters, followed by one hexameter, rhyming ababbcbcc. See also, for example, Shelley, Adonais (vol. D, p. 851 ), and Keats, The Eve of St. Agnes (vol. D, p. 953 ).

spondee: a term of meter. A two-syllable foot following the rhythmic pattern, in English verse, of two stressed syllables. Thus, for example, "Utah."

stanza (Italian "room"): groupings of two or more lines, though "stanza" is usually reserved for groupings of at least four lines. Stanzas are often joined by rhyme, often in sequence, where each group shares the same metrical pattern and, when rhymed, rhyme scheme. Stanzas can themselves be arranged into larger groupings. Poets often invent new verse forms, or they may work within established forms.

story: a narrative's sequence of events, which we reconstruct from those events as they have been recounted by the narrator (i.e., the plot). See also order.

stream of consciousness: usually a first-person narrative that seems to give the reader access to the narrator's mind as it perceives or reflects on events, prior to organizing those perceptions into a coherent narrative. Thus (though generated from a third-person narrative) Joyce, Ulysses, "Penelope" (see vol. F, p. 452).

style (from Latin for "writing instrument"): In literary works the manner in which something is expressed contributes substantially to its meaning. The expressions "sun," "mass of helium at the center of the solar system," "heaven's golden orb" all designate "sun," but do so in different manners, or styles, which produce different meanings. The manner of a literary work is its "style," the effect of which is its "tone." We often can intuit the tone of a text; from that intuition of tone we can analyze the stylistic resources by which it was produced. We can analyze the style of literary works through consideration of different elements of style; for example, diction, figures of thought, figures of speech, meter and rhythm, verse form, syntax, point of view.

sublime: As a concept generating a literary movement, the sublime refers to the realm of experience beyond the measurable, and so beyond the rational, produced especially by the terrors and grandeur of natural phenomena. Derived especially from the first-century Greek treatise On the Sublime, sometimes attributed to Longinus, the notion of the sublime was in the later eighteenth century a spur to Romanticism.

syllable: the smallest unit of sound in a pronounced word. The syllable that receives the greatest stress is called the tonic syllable.

symbol (Greek "token"): a figure of thought. Something that stands for something else, and yet seems necessarily to evoke that other thing. In Neoplatonic, and therefore Romantic, theory, to be distinguished from allegory thus: whereas allegory involves connections between vehicle and tenor agreed by convention or made explicit, the meanings of a symbol are supposedly inherent to it.

synecdoche (Greek “to take with something else”): a figure of thought. Using a part to express the whole, or vice versa; for example, “all hands on deck.” Closely related to metonymy.

syntax (Greek “ordering with”): Syntax designates the rules by which sentences are constructed in a given language. Discussion of meter is impossible without some reference to syntax, since the overall effect of a poem is, in part, always the product of a subtle balance of meter and sentence construction. Syntax is also essential to the understanding of prose style, since prose writers, deprived of the full shaping possibilities of meter, rely all the more heavily on syntactic resources. A working command of syntactical practice requires an understanding of the parts of speech (nouns, verbs, adjectives, adverbs, conjunctions, pronouns, prepositions, and interjections), since writers exploit syntactic possibilities by using particular combinations and concentrations of the parts of speech.

taste (from Italian “touch”): Although medieval monastic traditions used eating and tasting as a metaphor for reading, the concept of taste as a personal ideal to be cultivated by, and applied to, the appreciation and judgment of works of art in general was developed in the eighteenth century.

tercet: a verse form. A stanza or group of three lines, used in larger forms such as terza rima, the Petrarchan sonnet, and the villanelle.

terza rima: a verse form. A sequence of rhymed tercets linked by rhyme thus: aba bcb cdc, etc. first used extensively by Dante in The Divine Comedy, the form was adapted in English iambic pentameters by Wyatt and revived in the nineteenth century. See Wyatt, “Mine Own John Poins” (vol. B, p. 131); Shelley, “Ode to the West Wind” (vol. D, p. 802 ); and Morris, “The Defence of Guinevere” (vol. E, p. 657 ). For modern adaptations see Eliot, lines 78–149 (though unrhymed) of “Little Gidding” (vol. F, pp. 523–25); Heaney, “Station Island” (vol. F); Walcott, Omeros (vol. F, p. 808 ).

tetrameter (Greek “four measure”): a term of meter. A line with four stresses. Coleridge, Christabel, line 31: “She stole along, she nothing spoke” (see vol. D, p. 495).

theme (Greek “proposition”): In literary criticism the term designates what the work is about; the theme is the concept that unifies a given work of literature.

third-person narration: relevant to point of view. A narration in which the narrator recounts a narrative of characters referred to explicitly or implicitly by third-person pronouns (“he,” “she,” etc.), without the limitation of a first-person narration. Thus Johnson, The History of Rasselas.

topographical poem (Greek “place writing”): a genre. A poem devoted to the meditative description of particular places.

topos (Greek “place,” plural topoi): a commonplace in the content of a given kind of literature. Originally, in classical rhetoric, the topoi were tried-and-tested stimuli to literary invention: lists of standard headings under which a subject might be investigated. In medieval narrative poems, for example, it was commonplace to begin with a description of spring. Writers did, of course, render the commonplace uncommon, as in Chaucer’s spring scene at the opening of The Canterbury Tales (see vol. A, p. 474).

tradition (from Latin “passing on”): A literary tradition is whatever is passed on or revived from the past in a single literary culture, or drawn from others to enrich a writer’s culture. “Tradition” is fluid in reference, ranging from small to large referents: thus it may refer to a relatively small aspect of texts (for example, the tradition of iambic pentameter), or it may, at the other extreme, refer to the body of texts that constitute a canon.

tragedy: a genre. A dramatic representation of the fall of kings or nobles, beginning in happiness and ending in catastrophe. Later transferred to other social milieux. The opposite of comedy; thus Shakespeare, Othello (see vol. B, p. 640).

tragic mode: Many genres (epic poetry, legendary chronicles, tragedy, the novel) either do or can participate in a tragic mode, by representing the fall of noble protagonists and the irreparable ravages of human society and history.

tragicomedy: a genre. A play in which potentially tragic events turn out to have a happy, or comic, ending. Thus Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.

translation (Latin "carrying across"): the rendering of a text written in one language into another.

trimeter (Greek "three measure"): a term of meter. A line with three stresses. Herbert, "Discipline," line 1: "Throw away thy rod" (see vol. B, p. 1197).

triplet: a verse form. A tercet rhyming on the same sound. Pope inserts triplets among heroic couplets to emphasize a particular thought; see Essay on Criticism, 315–17 (vol. C, p. 521).

trochee: a term of rhythm. A two-syllable foot following the pattern, in English verse, of stressed followed by unstressed syllable, producing a falling effect. Thus, for example, "Texas."

type (Greek "impression, figure"): a figure of thought. In Christian allegorical interpretation of the Old Testament, pre-Christian figures were regarded as "types," or foreshadowings, of Christ or the Christian dispensation. Typology has been the source of much visual and literary art in which the parallelisms between old and new are extended to nonbiblical figures; thus the virtuous plowman in Piers Plowman becomes a type of Christ.

unities: According to a theory supposedly derived from Aristotle's Poetics, the events represented in a play should have unity of time, place, and action: that the play take up no more time than the time of the play, or at most a day; that the space of action should be within a single city; and that there should be no subplot. See Johnson, The Preface to Shakespeare (vol. C, p. 876).

vernacular (from Latin verna, “servant”): the language of the people, as distinguished from learned and arcane languages. From the later Middle Ages especially, the “vernacular” languages and literatures of Europe distinguished themselves from the learned languages and literatures of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

verse form: The terms related to meter and rhythm describe the shape of individual lines. Lines of verse are combined to produce larger groupings, called verse forms. These larger groupings are in the first instance stanzas. The combination of a certain meter and stanza shape constitutes the verse form, of which there are many standard kinds.

villanelle: a verse form. A fixed form of usually five tercets and a quatrain employing only two rhyme sounds altogether, rhyming aba for the tercets and abaa for the quatrain, with a complex pattern of two refrains. Derived from a French fixed form. Thomas, “Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night” (see vol. F, p. 693).

wit: Originally a synonym for “reason” in Old and Middle English, “wit” became a literary ideal in the Renaissance as brilliant play of the full range of mental resources. For eighteenth-century writers, the notion necessarily involved pleasing expression, as in Pope’s definition of true wit as “Nature to advantage dressed, / What oft was thought, but ne’er so well expressed” (Essay on Criticism, lines 297–98; see vol. C, p. 527). Romantic theory of the imagination deprived wit of its full range of apprehension, whence the word came to be restricted to its modern sense, as the clever play of mind that produces laughter.

zeugma (Greek “a yoking”): a figure of thought. A figure whereby one word applies to two or more words in a sentence, and in which the applications are surprising, either because one is unusual, or because the applications are made in very different ways; Pope, Rape of the Lock 3.7–8, in which the word “take” is used in two senses: “Here thou, great Anna! whom three realms obey, / Dost sometimes counsel take—and sometimes tea” (see vol. C, p. 546).

B: Publishing History, Censorship

By the time we read texts in published books, they have already been treated—that is, changed by authors, editors, and printers—in many ways. Although there are differences across history, in each period literary works are subject to pressures of many kinds, which apply before, while, and after an author writes. The pressures might be financial, as in the relations of author and patron; commercial, as in the marketing of books; and legal, as in, during some periods, the negotiation through official and unofficial censorship. In addition, texts in all periods undergo technological processes, as they move from the material forms in which an author produced them to the forms in which they are presented to readers. Some of the terms below designate important material forms in which books were produced, disseminated, and surveyed across the historical span of this anthology. Others designate the skills developed to understand these processes. The anthology's introductions to individual periods discuss the particular forms these phenomena took in different eras.

bookseller: In England, and particularly in London, commercial bookmaking and -selling enterprises came into being in the early fourteenth century. These were loose organizations of artisans who usually lived in the same neighborhoods (around St. Paul's Cathedral in London). A bookseller or dealer would coordinate the production of hand-copied books for wealthy patrons (see patronage), who would order books to be custom-made. After the introduction of printing in the late fifteenth century, authors generally sold the rights to their work to booksellers, without any further royalties. Booksellers, who often had their own shops, belonged to the Stationers' Company. This system lasted into the eighteenth century. In 1710, however, authors were for the first time granted copyright, which tipped the commercial balance in their favor, against booksellers.

censorship: The term applies to any mechanism for restricting what can be published. Historically, the reasons for imposing censorship are heresy, sedition, blasphemy, libel, or obscenity. External censorship is imposed by institutions having legislative sanctions at their disposal. Thus the pre-Reformation Church imposed the Constitutions of Archbishop Arundel of 1409, aimed at repressing the Lollard “heresy.” After the Reformation, some key events in the history of censorship are as follows: 1547, when anti-Lollard legislation and legislation made by Henry VIII concerning treason by writing (1534) were abolished; the Licensing Order of 1643, which legislated that works be licensed, through the Stationers’ Company, prior to publication; and 1695, when the last such Act stipulating prepublication licensing lapsed. Postpublication censorship continued in different periods for different reasons. Thus, for example, British publication of D. H. Lawrence’s Lady Chatterley’s Lover (1928) was obstructed (though unsuccessfully) in 1960, under the Obscene Publications Act of 1959. Censorship can also be international: although not published in Iran, Salman Rushdie’s Satanic Verses (1988) was censored in that country, where the leader, Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, proclaimed a fatwa (religious decree) promising the author’s execution. Very often censorship is not imposed externally, however: authors or publishers can censor work in anticipation of what will incur the wrath of readers or the penalties of the law. Victorian and Edwardian publishers of novels, for example, urged authors to remove potentially offensive material, especially for serial publication in popular magazines.

codex: the physical format of most modern books and medieval manuscripts, consisting of a series of separate leaves gathered into quires and bound together, often with a cover. In late antiquity, the codex largely replaced the scroll, the standard form of written documents in Roman culture.

copyright: the legal protection afforded to authors for control of their work's publication, in an attempt to ensure due financial reward. Some key dates in the history of copyright in the United Kingdom are as follows: 1710, when a statute gave authors the exclusive right to publish their work for fourteen years, and fourteen years more if the author were still alive when the first term had expired; 1842, when the period of authorial control was extended to forty-two years; and 1911, when the term was extended yet further, to fifty years after the author's death. In 1995 the period of protection was harmonized with the laws in other European countries to be the life of the author plus seventy years. In the United States no works first published before 1923 are in copyright. Works published since 1978 are, as in the United Kingdom, protected for the life of the author plus seventy years.

folio: the leaf formed by both sides of a single page. Each folio has two sides: a recto (the front side of the leaf, on the right side of a double-page spread in an open codex), and a verso (the back side of the leaf, on the left side of a double-page spread). Modern book pagination follows the pattern 1, 2, 3, 4, while medieval manuscript pagination follows the pattern 1r, 1v, 2r, 2v. "Folio" can also designate the size of a printed book. Books come in different shapes, depending originally on the number of times a standard sheet of paper is folded. One fold produces a large volume, a folio book; two folds produce a quarto, four an octavo, and six a very small duodecimo. Generally speaking, the larger the book, the grander and more expensive. Shakespeare's plays were, for example, first printed in quartos, but were gathered into a folio edition in 1623.

incunabulum (plural "incunabula"): any printed book produced in Europe before 1501. Famous incunabula include the Gutenberg Bible, printed in 1455.

manuscript (Latin, “written by hand”): Any text written physically by hand is a manuscript. Before the introduction of printing with moveable type in 1476, all texts in England were produced and reproduced by hand, in manuscript. This is an extremely labor-intensive task, using expensive materials (for example, vellum, or parchment); the cost of books produced thereby was, accordingly, very high. Even after the introduction of printing, many texts continued to be produced in manuscript. This is obviously true of letters, for example, but until the eighteenth century, poetry written within aristocratic circles was often transmitted in manuscript copies.

paleography (Greek “ancient writing”): the art of deciphering, describing, and dating forms of handwriting.

parchment: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also vellum.

patronage, patron (Latin “protector”): Many technological, legal, and commercial supports were necessary before professional authorship became possible. Although some playwrights (for example, Shakespeare) made a living by writing for the theater, other authors needed, principally, the large-scale reproductive capacities of printing and the security of copyright to make a living from writing. Before these conditions obtained, many authors had another main occupation, and most authors had to rely on patronage. In different periods, institutions or individuals offered material support, or patronage, to authors. Thus in Anglo-Saxon England, monasteries afforded the conditions of writing to monastic authors. Between the twelfth and the seventeenth centuries, the main source of patronage was the royal court. Authors offered patrons prestige and ideological support in return for financial support. Even as the conditions of professional authorship came into being at the beginning of the eighteenth century, older forms of direct patronage were not altogether displaced until the middle of the century.

p eriodical: Whereas journalism, strictly, applies to daily writing (from French jour, “day”), periodical writing appears at larger, but still frequent, intervals, characteristically in the form of the essay. Periodicals were developed especially in the eighteenth century.

p rinting: Printing, or the mechanical reproduction of books using moveable type, was invented in Germany in the mid-fifteenth century by Johannes Gutenberg; it quickly spread throughout Europe. William Caxton brought printing into England from the Low Countries in 1476. Much greater powers of reproduction at much lower prices transformed every aspect of literary culture.

p ublisher: the person or company responsible for the commissioning and publicizing of printed matter. In the early period of printing, publisher, printer, and bookseller were often the same person. This trend continued in the ascendancy of the Stationers’ Company, between the middle of the sixteenth and the end of the seventeenth centuries. Toward the end of the seventeenth century, these three functions began to separate, leading to their modern distinctions.

quire: When medieval manuscripts were assembled, a few loose sheets of parchment or paper would first be folded together and sewn along the fold. This formed a quire (also known as a “gathering” or “signature”). Folded in this way, four large sheets of parchment would produce eight smaller manuscript leaves. Multiple quires could then be bound together to form a codex.

royalties: an agreed-upon proportion of the price of each copy of a work sold, paid by the publisher to the author, or an agreed-upon fee paid to the playwright for each performance of a play.

scribe: In manuscript culture, the scribe is the copyist who reproduces a text by hand.

s criptorium (plural “scriptoria”): a place for producing written documents and manuscripts.

serial publication: generally referring to the practice, especially common in the nineteenth century, of publishing novels a few chapters at a time, in periodicals.

Stationers' Company: The Stationers' Company was an English guild incorporating various tradesmen, including printers, publishers, and booksellers, skilled in the production and selling of books. It was formed in 1403, received its royal charter in 1557, and served as a means both of producing and of regulating books. Authors would sell the manuscripts of their books to individual stationers, who incurred the risks and took the profits of producing and selling the books. The stationers entered their rights over given books in the Stationers' Register. They also regulated the book trade and held their monopoly by licensing books and by being empowered to seize unauthorized books and imprison resisters. This system of licensing broke down in the social unrest of the Civil War and Interregnum (1640–60), and it ended in 1695. Even after the end of licensing, the Stationers' Company continued to be an intrinsic part of the copyright process, since the 1710 copyright statute directed that copyright had to be registered at Stationers' Hall.

subscription: An eighteenth-century system of bookselling somewhere between direct patronage and impersonal sales. A subscriber paid half the cost of a book before publication and half on delivery. The author received these payments directly. The subscriber's name appeared in the prefatory pages.

textual criticism: Works in all periods often exist in many subtly or not so subtly different forms. This is especially true with regard to manuscript textual reproduction, but it also applies to printed texts. Textual criticism is the art, developed from the fifteenth century in Italy but raised to new levels of sophistication from the eighteenth century, of deciphering different historical states of texts. This art involves the analysis of textual variants, often with the aim of distinguishing authorial from scribal forms.

vellum: animal skin, used as the material for handwritten books before the introduction of paper. See also parchment.

watermark: the trademark of a paper manufacturer, impressed into the paper but largely invisible unless held up to light.

Geographic Nomenclature

The British Isles refers to the prominent group of islands off the northwest coast of Europe, especially to the two largest, Great Britain and Ireland. At present these comprise two sovereign states: the Republic of Ireland, and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland—known for short as the United Kingdom or the U.K. Most of the smaller islands are part of the U.K. but a few, like the Isle of Man and the tiny Channel Islands, are largely independent. The U.K. is often loosely referred to as “Britain” or “Great Britain” and is sometimes called simply, if inaccurately, “England.” For obvious reasons, the latter usage is rarely heard among the inhabitants of the other countries of the U.K.—Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland (sometimes called Ulster). England is by far the most populous part of the kingdom, as well as the seat of its capital, London.

From the first to the fifth century C.E. most of what is now England and Wales was a province of the Roman Empire called Britain (in Latin, Britannia). After the fall of Rome, much of the island was invaded and settled by peoples from northern Germany and Denmark speaking what we now call Old English. These peoples are known as the Angles and the Saxons (the word England is related to Angles). By the time of the Norman Conquest (1066) most of the kingdoms founded by the Angles, the Saxons, and the subsequent Viking invaders had coalesced into the kingdom of England, which, in the latter Middle Ages, conquered and largely absorbed the neighboring Celtic kingdom of Wales. In 1603 James VI of Scotland inherited the island’s other throne as James I of England, and for the next hundred years—except for the two decades of Puritan rule—Scotland (both its English-speaking Lowlands and its Gaelic-speaking Highlands) and England (with Wales) were two kingdoms under a single king. In 1707 the Act of Union brought them together as the United Kingdom of Great Britain. Ireland, where English rule had begun in the twelfth century and been tightened in the sixteenth, was incorporated by the 1800–1801 Act of Union into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. With the division of Ireland and the establishment of the Irish Free State after World War I, this name was modified to its present form, and in 1949 the Irish Free State became the Republic of Ireland, or Éire. In 1999 Scotland elected a separate parliament it had relinquished in 1707, and Wales elected an assembly it lost in 1409; neither Scotland nor Wales ceased to be part of the United Kingdom.

The British Isles are further divided into counties, which in Great Britain are also known as shires. This word, with its vowel shortened in pronunciation, forms the suffix in the names of many counties, such as Yorkshire, Wiltshire, Somersetshire.

The Latin names Britannia (Britain), Caledonia (Scotland), and Hibernia (Ireland) are sometimes used in poetic diction; so too is Britain's ancient Celtic name, Albion. Because of its accidental resemblance to albus (Latin for “white”), Albion is especially associated with the chalk cliffs that seem to gird much of the English coast like defensive walls.

The British Empire took its name from the British Isles because it was created not only by the English but also by the Irish, Scots, and Welsh, as well as by civilians and servicemen from other constituent countries of the empire. Some of the empire's overseas colonies, or crown colonies, were populated largely by settlers of European origin and their descendants. These predominantly White settler colonies, such as Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, were allowed significant self-government in the nineteenth century and recognized as dominions in the early twentieth century. The White dominions became members of the Commonwealth of Nations, also called the Commonwealth, the British Commonwealth, and “the Old Commonwealth” at different times, an association of sovereign states under the symbolic leadership of the British monarch.

Other overseas colonies of the empire had mostly Indigenous populations (or, in the Caribbean, the descendants of enslaved people, indentured servants, and others). These colonies were granted political independence after World War II, later than the dominions, and have often been referred to since as postcolonial nations. In South and Southeast Asia, India and Pakistan gained independence in 1947, followed by other countries including Sri Lanka (formerly Ceylon), Burma (now Myanmar), Malaya (now Malaysia), and Singapore. In West and East Africa, the Gold Coast was decolonized as Ghana in 1957, Nigeria in 1960, Sierra Leone in 1961, Uganda in 1962, Kenya in 1963, and so forth, while in southern Africa, the White minority government of South Africa was already independent in 1931, though majority rule did not come until 1994. In the Caribbean, Jamaica and Trinidad and Tobago became independent in 1962, followed by Barbados in 1966, and other islands of the British West Indies in the 1970s and '80s. Other regions from which nations emerged out of British colonial rule included Central America (British Honduras, now Belize), South America (British Guiana, now Guyana), the Pacific islands (Fiji), and Europe (Cyprus, Malta). After decolonization, many of these nations chose to remain within a newly conceived Commonwealth and are sometimes referred to as "New Commonwealth" countries. Some nations, such as Ireland, Pakistan, and South Africa, withdrew from the Commonwealth, though South Africa and Paki stan eventually rejoined, and others, such as Burma (now Myanmar), gained independence outside the Commonwealth. Britain's last major overseas colony, Hong Kong, was returned to Chinese sovereignty in 1997, but while Britain retains only a handful of dependent territories, such as Bermuda and Montserrat, the scope of the Commonwealth remains vast, with approximately 30 percent of the world's population.

British Money

One of the most dramatic changes to the system of British money came in 1971. In the system previously in place, the pound consisted of 20 shillings, each containing 12 pence, making 240 pence to the pound. Since 1971, British money has been calculated on the decimal system, with 100 pence to the pound. Britons' experience of paper money did not change very drastically: as before, 5- and 10-pound notes constitute the majority of bills passing through their hands (in addition, 20- and 50-pound notes have been added). But the shift necessitated a whole new way of thinking about and exchanging coins and marked the demise of the shilling, one of the fundamental units of British monetary history. Many other coins, still frequently encountered in literature, had already passed. These include the groat, worth 4 pence (the word "groat" is often used to signify a trifling sum); the angel (which depicted the archangel Michael triumphing over a dragon), valued at 10 shillings; the mark, worth in its day two-thirds of a pound or 13 shillings 4 pence; and the sovereign, a gold coin initially worth 22 shillings 6 pence, later valued at 1 pound, last circulated in 1932. One prominent older coin, the guinea, was worth a pound and a shilling; though it has not been minted since 1813, a very few quality items or prestige awards (like the purse in a horse race) may still be quoted in guineas. (The table below includes some other obsolete coins.) Colloquially, a pound was (and is) called a quid; a shilling a bob; sixpence, a tanner; a copper could refer to a penny, a half-penny, or a farthing (1/4 penny).

Throughout its tenure as a member of the European Union (1973–2020), Britain contemplated but did not make the change to the EU's common currency, the Euro, reflecting many Britons' strong identification of their country with its rich commercial history and view of their currency as a national symbol.

Even more challenging than sorting out the values of obsolete coins is calculating for any given period the purchasing power of money, which fluctuates over time by its very nature. As difficult as it is to generalize, it is clear that money used to be worth much more than it is currently. During the early Middle Ages, the most valuable circulating coin was the silver penny: four would buy a sheep. Beyond long-term inflationary trends, prices varied from times of plenty to those marked by poor harvests; from peacetime to wartime; from the country to the metropolis (life in London has always been very expensive); and wages varied according to the availability of labor (wages would sharply rise, for instance, during the devastating Black Death in the fourteenth century). The following chart provides a glimpse of some actual prices of given periods and their changes across time, though all the variables mentioned above prevent them from being definitive. Even from one year to the next, an added tax on gin or tea could drastically raise prices, and a lottery ticket could cost much more the night before the drawing than just a month earlier. Still, the prices quoted below do indicate important trends, such as the disparity of incomes in British society and the costs of basic commodities. In the chart on the following pages, the symbol £ is used for pound, s. for shilling, d. for a penny (from Latin denarius); a sum would normally be written £2.19.3—that is 2 pounds, 19 shillings, 3 pence. (This is Leopold Bloom's budget for the day depicted in Joyce's novel Ulysses [1922]; in the new currency, it would be about £2.96.)

The British Baronage

The English monarchy is in principle hereditary, though at times during the Middle Ages the rules were subject to dispute. As it stands now, authority passes from parent to eldest surviving child, to siblings in order of seniority if there are no children, and in default of direct descendants to collateral lines (cousins, nephews, nieces) in order of closeness. There have been breaks in the order of succession (1066, 1399, 1688), but so far as possible the usurpers have always sought to paper over the break with a legitimate, that is, hereditary, claim. When a queen succeeds to the throne and takes a husband, he does not become king unless he is in the line of blood succession; rather, he is named prince consort, as Albert was to Victoria. He may be the father of kings, but he is not one himself.

The original Saxon nobles were the king's thanes, ealdormen, or earls, who provided the king with military service and counsel in return for booty, gifts, or landed estates. William the Conqueror, arriving from France, where feudalism was fully developed, considerably expanded this group. In addition, as the king distributed the lands of his new kingdom, he also distributed dignities to men who became known collectively as "the baronage." "Baron" in its root meaning signifies simply "man," and barons were the king's men. As the title was common, a distinction was early made between greater and lesser barons, the former gradually assuming loftier and more impressive titles. The first English "duke" was created in 1337; the title of "marquess," or "marquis" (pronounced "markwis"), followed in 1385, and "viscount" ("vyekount") in 1440. Though "earl" is the oldest title of all, an earl now comes between a marquess and a viscount in order of dignity and precedence, and the old term "baron" now designates a rank just below viscount. "Baronets" were created in 1611 as a means of raising revenue for the crown (the title could be purchased for about

£1,000); they are marginal nobility and have never sat in the House of Lords.

Kings and queens are addressed as “Your Majesty,” princes and princesses as “Your Highness,” the other hereditary nobility as “My Lord” or “Your Lordship.” Peers receive their titles either by inheritance (like Lord Byron, the sixth baron of that line) or from the monarch (like Alfred, Lord Tennyson, created 1st Baron Tennyson by Victoria). The children, even of a duke, are commoners unless they are specifically granted some other title or inherit their father’s title from him. A peerage can be forfeited by act of attainder, as for example when a lord is convicted of treason; and, when forfeited, or lapsed for lack of a successor, can be bestowed on another family. Thus in 1605 Robert Cecil was made first Earl of Salisbury in the third creation, the first creation dating from 1149, the second from 1337, the title having been in abeyance since 1539. Titles descend by right of succession and do not depend on tenure of land; thus, a title does not always indicate where a lord dwells or holds power. Indeed, noble titles do not always refer to a real place at all. At Prince Edward’s marriage in 1999, the queen created him Earl of Wessex, although the old kingdom of Wessex has had no political existence since 1066, and the name was all but forgotten until it was resurrected by Thomas Hardy as the setting of his novels. (This is perhaps but one of many ways in which the world of the aristocracy increasingly resembles the realm of literature.)

Scottish peers sat in the parliament of Scotland, as English peers did in the parliament of England, till at the Act of Union (1707) Scottish peers were granted sixteen seats in the English House of Lords, to be filled by election. (In 1963, all Scottish lords were allowed to sit.) Similarly, Irish peers, when the Irish parliament was abolished in 1801, were granted the right to elect twenty-eight of their number to the House of Lords in Westminster. (Now that the Republic of Ireland is a separate nation, this no longer applies.) Women members (peeresses) were first allowed to sit in the House as nonhereditary Life Peers in 1958 (when that status was created for members of both genders); women first sat by their own hereditary right in 1963. Today the House of Lords still retains some power to influence or delay legislation, but its future is uncertain. In 1999, the hereditary peers (then amounting to 750) were reduced to 92

temporary members elected by their fellow peers. Holders of Life Peerages remain, as do senior bishops of the Church of England and high-court judges (the "Law Lords").

Below the peerage the chief title of honor is "knight." Knighthood, which is not hereditary, is generally a reward for services rendered. A knight (Sir John Black) is addressed, using his first name, as "Sir John"; his wife, using the last name, is "Lady Black"—unless she is the daughter of an earl or nobleman of higher rank, in which case she will be "Lady Arabella." The female equivalent of a knight bears the title of "Dame." Though the word knight itself comes from the Old English cniht, there is some doubt as to whether knighthood amounted to much before the arrival of the Normans. The feudal system required military service as a condition of land tenure, and a man who came to serve his king at the head of an army of tenants required a title of authority and badges of identity—hence the title of knighthood and the coat of arms. During the Crusades, when men were far removed from their land (or even sold it in order to go on crusade), more elaborate forms of fealty sprang up that soon expanded into orders of knighthood. The Templars, Hospitallers, Knights of the Teutonic Order, Knights of Malta, and Knights of the Golden Fleece were but a few of these companionships; not all of them were available at all times in England.

Gradually, with the rise of centralized government and the decline of feudal tenures, military knighthood became obsolete, and the rank largely honorific; sometimes, as under James I, it degenerated into a scheme of the royal government for making money. For hundreds of years after its establishment in the fourteenth century, the Order of the Garter was the only English order of knighthood, an exclusive courtly companionship. Then, during the late seventeenth, the eighteenth, and the nineteenth centuries, a number of additional orders were created, with names such as the Thistle, Saint Patrick, the Bath, Saint Michael, and Saint George, plus a number of special Victorian and Indian orders. They retain the terminology, ceremony, and dignity of knighthood, but the military implications are vestigial.

Although the British Empire now belongs to history, appointments to the Order of the British Empire continue to be conferred for services to that empire at home or abroad. Such honors (commonly referred to as "gongs") are granted by the monarch in New Year's and Birthday lists, but the decisions are now made by the government in power. In recent years there have been efforts to popularize and democratize the dispensation of honors, with recipients including celebrities of all types. But this does not prevent large sectors of British society from regarding both knighthood and the peerage as largely irrelevant to modern life.

Religions in Great Britain

In the late sixth century C.E., missionaries from Rome introduced Christianity to Britons—actually, reintroduced it, since it had briefly flourished in the southern parts of the British Isles during the Roman occupation, and even after the Roman withdrawal had persisted in the Celtic regions of Scotland and Wales. By the time the earliest poems included in The Norton Anthology of English Literature were composed (the seventh century), therefore, there had been a Christian presence in the British Isles for hundreds of years. The conversion of the Germanic occupiers of England can, however, be dated only from 597. Our knowledge of the religion of pre-Christian Britain is sketchy, but it is likely that vestiges of Germanic polytheism assimilated into, or coexisted with, the practice of Christianity: fertility rites were incorporated into the celebration of Easter resurrection, rituals commemorating the dead into All-Hallows Eve and All Saints Day, and elements of winter solstice festivals into the celebration of Christmas. The most durable polytheistic remains are the days of the week, each of which except “Saturday” derives from the name of a Germanic pagan god, and the word “Easter,” deriving, according to the great monastic scholar Bede (ca. 673–735), from the name of a Germanic pagan goddess, Eostre. In English literature such “folkloric” elements sometimes elicit romantic nostalgia. Geoffrey Chaucer’s “Wife of Bath” looks back to a magical time before the arrival of Christianity in which the land was “fulfild of fairye.” Hundreds of years later, the seventeenth-century writer Robert Herrick honors the amalgamation of Christian and pagan elements in agrarian British culture in such poems as “Corinna’s Gone A-Maying” and “The Hock Cart.”

Medieval Christianity was fairly uniform, if complex, across Western Europe—hence called “catholic,” or universally shared. The Church was composed of the so-called “regular” and “secular” orders, the regular orders being those who followed a rule in a community under an abbot or an abbess (that is, monks, nuns, friars, and canons), while the secular clergy of priests served parish communities under the governance of a bishop. In the unstable period from the sixth until the twelfth century, monasteries were the intellectual powerhouse of the Church. From the beginning of the thirteenth century, with the development of an urban Christian spirituality in Europe, friars dominated the recently invented institution of universities, as well as devoting themselves, in theory at least, to the urban poor.

The Catholic Church was also an international power structure. With its hierarchy of pope, cardinals, archbishops, and bishops, it offered a model of the centralized, bureaucratic state from the late eleventh century. That ecclesiastical power structure coexisted alongside a separate, often less centralized and feudal structure of lay authorities, with theoretically different and often competing spheres of social responsibilities. The sharing of lay and ecclesiastical authority in medieval England was sometimes a source of conflict. Chaucer's pilgrims are on their way to visit the memorial shrine to one victim of such exemplary struggle: Thomas à Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury, who opposed the policies of King Henry II, was assassinated by indirect suggestion of the king in 1170, and later made a saint. The Church, in turn, produced its own victims: Jews were subject to persecution in the late twelfth century in England, before being expelled in 1290. From the beginning of the fifteenth century, the English Church targeted Lollard heretics (see below) with capital punishment, for the first time.

As an international organization, the Church conducted its business in the universal language of Latin. Thus although in the period the largest segment of literate persons was made up of clerics, the clerical contribution to great literary writing in vernacular languages (for example, French and English) was, so far as we know, relatively modest, with some great exceptions in the later Middle Ages (for example, William Langland). Lay, vernacular writers of the period certainly reflect the importance of the Church as an institution and the pervasiveness of religion in the rituals that marked everyday life, as well as contesting institutional authority. From the late fourteenth century, indeed, England witnessed an active and articulate, proto-Protestant movement known as Lollardy, which attacked clerical hierarchy and promoted vernacular scriptures.

Beginning in 1517 the German monk Martin Luther, in Wittenberg, Germany, openly challenged many aspects of Catholic practice and by 1520 had completely repudiated the authority of the pope, setting in motion the Protestant Reformation. Luther argued that the Roman Catholic Church had strayed far from the pattern of Christianity laid out in scripture. He rejected Catholic doctrines for which no biblical authority was to be found, such as the belief in Purgatory, and translated the Bible into German, on the grounds that the importance of scripture for all Christians made its translation into the vernacular tongue essential. Luther was not the first to advance such views—Lollard followers of the Englishman John Wycliffe had translated the Bible in the late fourteenth century. But Luther, protected by powerful German rulers, was able to speak out without fear of punishment and convert others to his views, rather than suffer the persecution usually meted out to heretics. Soon other reformers were following in Luther's footsteps: of these, the Swiss Ulrich Zwingli and the French Jean Calvin would be especially influential for English religious thought.

At first England remained staunchly Catholic. Its king, Henry VIII, was so severe to heretics that the pope awarded him the title "Defender of the Faith," which British monarchs have retained to this day. In 1534, however, Henry rejected the authority of the pope to prevent his divorce from his queen, Catherine of Aragon, and his marriage to his mistress, Ann Boleyn. In doing so, Henry appropriated to himself ecclesiastical as well as secular authority. Thomas More, author of Utopia, was executed in 1535 for refusing to endorse Henry's right to govern the English church. Over the following six years, Henry consolidated his grip on the ecclesiastical establishment by dissolving the powerful, populous Catholic monasteries and redistributing their massive landholdings to his own lay followers. Yet Henry's church largely retained Catholic doctrine and liturgy. When Henry died and his young son, Edward, came to the throne in 1547, the English church embarked on a more Protestant path, a direction abruptly reversed when Edward died and his older sister Mary, the daughter of Catherine of Aragon, took the throne in 1553 and attempted to reintroduce Roman Catholicism. Mary's reign was also short, however, and her successor, Elizabeth I, the daughter of Ann Boleyn, was a Protestant. Elizabeth attempted to establish a "middle way" Christianity, compromising between Roman Catholic practices and beliefs and reformed ones.

The Church of England, though it laid claim to a national rather than pan-European authority, aspired like its predecessor to be the universal church of all English subjects. It retained the Catholic structure of parishes and dioceses and the Catholic hierarchy of bishops, though the ecclesiastical authority was now the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Church's "Supreme Governor" was the monarch. Yet disagreement and controversy persisted. Some members of the Church of England wanted to retain many of the ritual and liturgical elements of Catholicism. Others, the Puritans, advocated a more thoroughgoing reformation. Most Puritans remained within the Church of England, but a minority, the "Separatists" or "Congregationalists," split from the established church altogether. These dissenters no longer thought of the ideal church as an organization to which everybody belonged; instead, they conceived it as a more exclusive group of likeminded people, one not necessarily attached to a larger body of believers.

In the seventeenth century, the succession of the Scottish king James to the English throne produced another problem. England and Scotland were separate nations, and in the sixteenth century Scotland had developed its own national Presbyterian church, or "kirk," under the leadership of the reformer John Knox. The kirk retained fewer Catholic liturgical elements than did the Church of England, and its authorities, or "presbyters," were elected by assemblies of their fellow clerics, rather than appointed by the king. James I and his son Charles I, especially the latter, wanted to bring the Scottish kirk into conformity with Church of England practices. The Scots violently resisted these efforts, with the collaboration of many English Puritans, in a conflict that eventually developed into the English Civil War in the mid-seventeenth century. The effect of these disputes is visible in the poetry of such writers as John Milton, Robert Herrick, Henry Vaughan, and Thomas Traherne, and in the prose of Thomas Browne, Lucy Hutchinson, and Dorothy Waugh. Just as in the mid-sixteenth century, when a succession of monarchs with different religious commitments destabilized the church, so the seventeenth century endured spiritual whiplash. King Charles I's highly ritualistic Church of England was violently overturned by the Puritan victors in the Civil War—until 1660, after the death of the Puritan leader, Oliver Cromwell, when the Church of England was restored along with the monarchy.

The religious and political upheavals of the seventeenth century produced Christian sects that de-emphasized the ceremony of the established church and rejected as well its top-down authority structure. Some of these groups were ephemeral, but the Baptists (founded in 1608 in Amsterdam by the English expatriate John Smyth) and Quakers, or Society of Friends (founded by George Fox in the 1640s), flourished outside the established church, sometimes despite cruel persecution. John Bunyan, a Baptist, wrote the Christian allegory Pilgrim's Progress while in prison. Some dissenters, like the Baptists, shared the reformed reverence for the absolute authority of scripture but interpreted the scriptural texts differently from their fellow Protestants. Others, like the Quakers, favored, even over the authority of the Bible, the "inner light" or voice of individual conscience, which they took to be the working of the Holy Spirit in the lives of individuals.

The Protestant dissenters were not England's only religious minorities. Despite crushing fines and the threat of imprisonment, a minority of Catholics under Elizabeth and James openly refused to give their allegiance to the new church, and others remained secret adherents to the old ways. John Donne was brought up in an ardently Catholic family, and several other writers converted to Catholicism as adults—Ben Jonson for a considerable part of his career, Elizabeth Carey and Richard Crashaw permanently, and at profound personal cost. In the eighteenth century, Catholics remained objects of suspicion as possible agents of sedition, especially after the “Glorious Revolution” in 1688 deposed the Catholic James II in favor of the Protestant William and Mary. Anti-Catholic prejudice affected John Dryden, a Catholic convert, as well as the lifelong Catholic Alexander Pope. By contrast, the English colony of Ireland remained overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, the fervor of its religious commitment at least partly inspired by resistance to English occupation. Starting in the reign of Elizabeth, England shored up its own authority in Ireland by encouraging Protestant immigrants from Scotland to settle in the north of Ireland, producing a virulent religious divide the effects of which are still felt today.

A small community of Jews had moved from France to London after 1066, when the Norman William the Conqueror came to the English throne. Although despised and persecuted by many Christians, they were allowed to remain as moneylenders to the Crown, until the thirteenth century, when the king developed alternative sources of credit. At this point, in 1290, the Jews were expelled from England. In 1655 Oliver Cromwell permitted a few to return, and in the late seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries the Jewish population slowly increased, mainly by immigration from Germany. In the mid-eighteenth century some prominent Jews had their children brought up as Christians so as to facilitate their full integration into English society: thus the nineteenth-century writer and politician Benjamin Disraeli, although he and his father were members of the Church of England, was widely considered a Jew insofar as his ancestry was Jewish.

In the late seventeenth century, as the Church of England reasserted itself, Catholics, Jews, and dissenting Protestants found themselves subject to significant legal restrictions. The Corporation Act, passed in 1661, and the Test Act, passed in 1673, excluded all who refused to take communion in the Church of England from voting, attending university, or working in government or in the professions. Members of religious minorities, as well as Church of England communicants, paid mandatory taxes in support of Church of England ministers and buildings. In 1689 the dissenters gained the right to worship in public, but Jews and Catholics were not permitted to do so.

During the eighteenth century, political, intellectual, and religious history remained closely intertwined. The Church of England came to accommodate a good deal of variety. "Low church" services resembled those of the dissenting Protestant churches, minimizing ritual and emphasizing the sermon; the "high church" retained more elaborate ritual elements, yet its prestige was under attack on several fronts. Many Enlightenment thinkers subjected the Bible to rational critique and found it wanting: the philosopher David Hume, for instance, argued that the "miracles" described therein were more probably lies or errors than real breaches of the laws of nature. Within the Church of England, the "broad church" Latitudinarians welcomed this rationalism, advocating theological openness and an emphasis on ethics rather than dogma. More radically, the Unitarian movement rejected the divinity of Christ while professing to accept his ethical teachings. Taking a different tack, the preacher John Wesley, founder of Methodism, responded to the rationalists' challenge with a newly fervent call to evangelism and personal discipline; his movement was particularly successful in Wales. Revolutions in America and France at the end of the century generated considerable millenarian excitement and fostered more new religious ideas, often in conjunction with a radical social agenda. Many important writers of the Romantic period were indebted to traditions of protestant dissent: Unitarian and rationalist protestant ideas influenced William Hazlitt, Anna Barbauld, Mary Wollstonecraft, and the young Samuel Taylor Coleridge. William Blake created a highly idiosyncratic poetic mythology loosely indebted to radical strains of Christian mysticism. Others were even more heterodox: Lord Byron and Robert Burns, brought up as Scots

Presbyterians, rebelled fiercely, and Percy Shelley's writing of an atheistic pamphlet resulted in his expulsion from Oxford.

Great Britain never erected an American-style "wall of separation" between church and state, but in practice religion and secular affairs grew more and more distinct during the nineteenth century. In consequence, members of religious minorities no longer seemed to pose a threat to the commonweal. A movement to repeal the Test Act failed in the 1790s, but a renewed effort resulted in the extension of the franchise to dissenting Protestants in 1828 and to Catholics in 1829. The numbers of Roman Catholics in England were swelled by immigration from Ireland, but there were also some prominent English adherents. Among writers, the converts John Newman and Gerard Manley Hopkins are especially important. The political participation and social integration of Jews presented a thornier challenge. Lionel de Rothschild, repeatedly elected to represent London in Parliament during the 1840s and 1850s, was not permitted to take his seat there because he refused to take his oath of office "on the true faith of a Christian"; finally, in 1858, the Jewish Disabilities Act allowed him to omit these words. Only in 1871, however, were Oxford and Cambridge opened to non-Anglicans.

Meanwhile geological discoveries and Charles Darwin's evolutionary theories increasingly cast doubt on the literal truth of the Creation story, and close philological analysis of the biblical text suggested that its origins were human rather than divine. By the end of the nineteenth century, many writers were bearing witness to a world in which Christianity no longer seemed fundamentally plausible. In his poetry and prose, Thomas Hardy depicts a world devoid of benevolent providence. Matthew Arnold's poem "Dover Beach" is in part an elegy to lost spiritual assurance, as the "Sea of Faith" goes out like the tide: "But now I only hear / Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar / Retreating." For Arnold, literature must replace religion as a source of spiritual truth, and intimacy between individuals substitute for the lost communal solidarity of the universal church.

The work of many twentieth-century writers shows the influence of a religious upbringing or a religious conversion in adulthood. T. S. Eliot and W. H. Auden embrace Anglicanism, William Butler Yeats spiritualism. James Joyce repudiates Irish Catholicism but remains obsessed with it. Yet religion, or lack of it, is a matter of individual choice and conscience, not social or legal mandate. Over the past several decades, church attendance has plummeted in Great Britain. Only about 46 percent of the population identified itself as “Christian” on the 2021 census. Meanwhile, immigration from former British colonies as well as other countries has swelled the ranks of religions once uncommon in the British Isles—Muslim, Sikh, Hindu, Buddhist—though the numbers of adherents remain small relative to the total population.

The Universe According to Ptolemy

Ptolemy was a Roman astronomer of Greek descent, born in Egypt during the second century C.E.; for nearly fifteen hundred years after his death his account of the design of the universe was accepted as standard. During that time, the basic pattern underwent many detailed modifications and was fitted out with many astrological and pseudoscientific trappings. But in essence Ptolemy's followers portrayed the earth as the center of the universe, with the sun, planets, and fixed stars set in transparent spheres orbiting around it. In this scheme of things, as modified for Christian usage, Hell was usually placed under the earth's surface at the center of the cosmic globe, while Heaven, the abode of the blessed spirits, was in the outermost, uppermost circle, the empyrean. But in 1543 the Polish astronomer Copernicus proposed an alternative hypothesis—that the earth rotates around the sun, not vice versa; and despite theological opposition, observations with the new telescope and careful mathematical calculations insured ultimate acceptance of the new view.

The map of the Ptolemaic universe below is a simplified version of a diagram in Peter Apian's Cosmography (1584). In such a diagram, the Firmament is the sphere that contained the fixed stars; the Crystalline Sphere, which contained no heavenly bodies, is a late innovation, included to explain certain anomalies in the observed movement of the heavenly bodies; and the Prime Mover is the sphere that, itself put into motion by God, imparts rotation around the earth to all the other spheres.

Milton, writing in the mid-seventeenth century, used two universes. The Copernican universe, though he alludes to it, was too large, formless, and unfamiliar to be the setting for the war between Heaven and Hell in Paradise Lost. He therefore used the Ptolemaic cosmos, but placed Heaven well outside this smaller earth-centered universe, Hell far beneath it, and assigned the vast middle space to Chaos.
